NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR! The wish never grows stale among friends, and THE INQUIRER reaches out the quiet hand of a warm friendship to many, in many lands, and rejoices to feel the cordial grip in return. This year we offer at the same time a small New Year's gift. Yes—"wired and cut!" It is, of course, a little thing, but let it be accepted as as a token of good will.

WE want to keep on good terms with friends, and we want to be read. This we are told is one way to secure it, and we intend during the year to redouble efforts to be worth the reading. We have no revolution to announce in the main features of our paper, only the earnest desire to do better than ever what we have been trying to do in the past, and to secure more general co-operation both of readers and writers, to make THE INQUIRER a genuine meeting place for the best thought and energy and inspiration in our churches, and in that wider circle of liberal religious thinkers and workers in many lands, in which it is our delight to have a place.

Copies for Free Libraries. Several friends in the past have generously paid for copies of THE INQUIRER to be placed in Free Libraries in different parts of the country; but while we should be very unwilling to curtail the number of copies so placed at public disposal, but would much rather greatly increase it, we have to confess that last year hardly half the number so given were paid for by our friends. May we ask for a renewal of that generous participation in our work, and for a considerable addition to it for the present year?

ON Tuesday morning Archbishop Francis Bourne, the new Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, was enthroned with stately ritual in the new cathedral, and, having celebrated High Mass, read his first pastoral from the chancel steps. Succeeding Manning and Vaughan, he confessed distrust of himself and his lack of their gifts. His first care, he said, would be for education; and next, the battle against drink called for all his energies.

No definite news is obtainable at the moment of writing as to the prospects of a peaceful settlement of the differences between Russia and Japan. It is officially denied that the Japanese Government has fixed a time limit to its acceptance of a reply from Russia to its latest demands. But should war be regarded as inevitable it is recognised that Japan cannot afford to sit still while Russia matures her present extensive preparations. On the other hand, the belief is growing in many quarters that, even with those immediate preparations matured, Russia knows she cannot afford to go to war for many years yet, and that unless Japan should absolutely force a breach her policy will be to make concessions sufficient to shelve the dispute for the time being. Meanwhile it is scarcely to be doubted that the Powers generally are using every effort to compose a quarrel which so gravely menaces the peace and security of the civilised world.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM'S letter in response to the insolent resolution of the Croydon Licensed Victuallers' Society is most opportunely timed. On more than one occasion, in his charges to Grand Juries, this Judge has pointed out the terribly close connection between excessive drinking and crime, and the grave responsibility which rests upon those licensed liquor dealers who supplied the drink which converted potential into actual criminals. His latest utterance — at Durham—has raised a storm of protest among followers of a trade who believe themselves on the point of having their annual licences converted at the expense of the State into a capitalised vested interest.

SIR WILLIAM GRANTHAM'S reply to one of these from his old Parliamentary constituency is terrible in its completeness:—

Twelve murders, eighteen attempts at murder [he says], and woundings without number that were just as likely to have ended in murder, as far as the conduct of the criminal was concerned, have been mine and my brother judge's daily fare for the last four weeks on one circuit, and in almost every case, as appeared in evidence, drink was the cause—drink served by publicans, and not at clubs, and drink proved to have been served in the public-house where the man was openly drunk. These are the men whose conduct I complained of, and these are the men whom the Croydon publicans consider are carrying on a lawful and respectable trade, and on whose behalf they speak of my strictures as being "vile aspersions."

THE Public-house Trust movement has made rapid progress. Lord Grey says: "Never in the history of social reform has any movement fixed its roots so firmly in so wide an area in so short a time." County trusts have been formed in every shire of England, except Berkshire, Buckingham, Leicestershire, Norfolk, and Oxfordshire; also in two Welsh counties and in Ulster. These trusts own one hundred and fourteen houses, and will receive one hundred more on the expiry of existing leases. This is the result of two years' work. Colonel Crawfurd, who recently made a tour of inspection, reported that the managers were generally very careful about the good repute of their houses, and that the expected results, larger demands and better supply of food, and less drinking and incentive to drinking intoxicants, were attained.

THE Mansion House Committee on the Unemployed has taken two important decisions. The old policy, which was practically one of indiscriminate relief in money or in kind, has been abandoned, and the fact that Mr. Percy Alden is the hon. secretary may be regarded as an assurance that it will not be resumed. We all remember the mischief that resulted from the distribution of emergency funds from a central source through untried local almoners. The determination, therefore, of the committee to offer work and not gifts must be received with satisfaction. The particular scheme which the committee, acting under the influence of the Bishop of Stepney, has decided upon is not an adequate one, but it is a step to the good that a body of men endowed with the prestige of the Lord Mayor of London, should lay it down that the provision of work is essential to a solution of the problem.

MANY questions besides that of unemployment have to be considered in dealing with the removal of poverty. A number of these are outside the sphere of the Mansion House Committee; some of them are dependent on action of the executive, and others upon the passing of fresh legislation. The giving of relief has not become unnecessary, because it cannot successfully be bestowed through this body. The need for it is great, and is especially pressing during the first few months of the year. It is at this period that the health of the people in the poor districts is at its lowest. The savings of the summer are largely spent; the little reserve of summer vigour is almost exhausted. And it is the experience of those who know the slums that now is the time when slight illnesses are most prevalent, and a low physical condition most general. This is a kind of misery, the relief of which calls for that large knowledge that only comes to those who live among the poor. Their resources will be fully taxed between now and Easter. One cause of the suffering they will try to alleviate is the want of wages to buy nourishing food and keep up warm fires, and wages are but one aspect of a fact that in another form is known as work.

THE decision of the Mansion House Committee to find employment for workless men at Hadleigh and Osea Island is good, but it does not go far enough. It is a suitable provision for men in whom the process of degeneration has already begun, and there are no doubt some of these who will avail themselves of the chance offered them. But these places are not suited for the upright, industrious man, whose bona fides is above suspicion. Those who know the real honest working man best, think that he is as unlikely to apply for this test labour as for casual relief. His feeling of self-respect holds him aloof from the one as from the other. The decision of the Mansion House Committee to offer only the kind of labour test that befits the man of doubtful character is at the same time a decision to leave the man whose industry is without a flaw to the dismal expedient of tramping London in quest of work. The limitation imposed on itself by the committee excludes the class whose needs are most deserving of consideration. It cannot be too often repeated that the poor do not form one homogeneous class, and that, since this is so, the plans adopted for helping the poor must be as various as the needs of the very diverse classes that we seek to help.

THE gathering of 4,000 working men which met last month at the Palace Theatre at Leicester during the annual meetings of the Leicestershire Adult School Union, reminds us of a practical religious movement which is rapidly gaining ground. The county union now includes over one hundred schools (twenty-one having been opened during the year) and more than 8,000 scholars, some 6,000 of whom are men, who meet at nine o'clock on Sunday mornings.

THE Leicestershire Union, though among the most active, is far from standing alone in its activity. All through the country the Adult School movement is increasing rapidly in numbers. The estimated membership in 1901 was 45,000; in 1903 it had risen to 61,000. Half of the "scholars" are to be found within thirty-five miles of the centre of England; one-fourth lying to the north of such an imaginary circle, and one-fourth to the east and south of it. Some 47,000 of the scholars are men and youths, and about 14,000 are women. The figures show how much room there still is for growth. Extraordinary increase has taken place this year in the Northamptonshire schools.

ALTHOUGH the movement originated half a century ago among Friends, it has now extended far beyond the limits of the Society, and is purely non-sectarian. About 55 per cent. of the membership is still found within adult schools under Quaker care, but this is a much smaller proportion than in 1901, when it was nearly 70 per cent. Yet the Friends' Schools are by no means declining in number. In comparison with the movement as a whole they cannot be expected to keep their numerical preponderance, any more than we can expect Great Britain to keep for ever her first great lead in the commerce of the world. We are glad, however, to believe that the true Quaker influences remain, and that in every part of the country there are Adult Schools which are, in the most literal sense of the phrase, "religious societies of friends."

IN Wednesday's Times appeared a communication from their Paris correspondent, giving a summary of a striking letter from Father Hyacinth to the Siecle on the condemnation of the works of Abbé Loisy. Not only Roman Catholicism, the Father declares, but orthodox Christianity, Roman and Protestant alike, rests on false or falsified texts, and is to be distinguished from Christianity as understood in a spiritual sense and explained by scientific and liberal methods. The so-called orthodoxies have foundations "received from a Biblical exegesis convicted of error, from the Pentateuch, which is not by Moses, and Messianic prophecy, which is not by Daniel, down to the fourth Gospel, which is not by St. John."

"IN condemning the learned works of Abbé Loisy," he adds, "the Roman Inquisition maintains these false authorities in the face of scientific evidence, because it believes them necessary to the authority of religion over the people." And he goes on to contrast with the action of Rome that of the French Republic, which by a singular coincidence was almost on the same day revising the Dreyfus judgment. From this he draws a contrast between Paris and Rome, between lay and clerical justice, and touched by this profoundly, as a religious man, "he asks with anguish, where is the living God—not the idol fashioned by priests, but the God inseparable from truth and justice, of which He is the seat and the organ? Is He with the Roman Papacy or with the French Revolution?"

DR. WHITON'S last communication in the Daily News of December 26, told of Thanksgiving Day, and the services of religious Union, of which it is the happy occasion. Episcopalians, he says, as a rule give thanks by themselves, and it is other bodies who unite. Yet exceptions occur.

In Detroit this year there was a comprehensive union; Jews, Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, and others—nine denominations—met in the Opera House for a civic thanksgiving. The address of the Rev. S. S. Marquis, an Episcopalian, took advanced ground, saying: "It seems to me that God has refuted our denominational claims. It has been demonstrated that God can work irrespectively of denominational machinery, and we are gradually awakening to that fact." . . . . This inclusiveness reincarnates in the twentieth century, after long absence from the Church, the spirit of John Robinson, the minister of the Pilgrim Fathers. To those who urged non-intercourse with the Church of England that had persecuted them he said: "Leave her doings to the Lord, and study how nearly you may close with her without sin."

As a signal instance of the better mind, Dr. Whiton cites the recent action of the Connecticut Conference of Congregational Churches, with reference to the rival "Pilgrim" Churches at Plymouth. The original church established by the Pilgrim Fathers, like many other of the early New England churches, became Unitarian, and the orthodox seceders, who built another church close by, claim that they are true representatives of the Pilgrims. They are appealing far and wide for funds to erect a new building, the First Church (now Unitarian) having already a fine stone edifice. The matter, Dr. Whiton says, came recently before the Connecticut Conference, which issued a unanimous report, substantially as follows:—

Declining to judge which of the two Churches in Plymouth is the genuine successor of the Church of the Pilgrims, the Conference regards the more conspicuous realisation of the unity of the Churches as the thing to be supremely desired. Let past controversies be buried so far and fast as possible, and, while creedal differences should be respected, let them not be erected into separating walls. We should regard it as a happy sign for the new day of Christ's coming if, in the town where our liberty of worship was first planted, all descendants of the Church of our forefathers should again be united in one covenant as a Church of Christ. The bond of Church fellowship in the Pilgrim Church [Dr. Whiton adds] was a simple covenant. Creeds were added later. To those New Englanders who remember the feud between Trinitarian and Unitarian in its bitterness but half a century ago, this seems remarkable. Still more remarkable must it seem in England, where the Unitarian is to-day more subject to religious ostracism than in America. Connecticut, moreover, is reputed to be a rather Conservative State, and the above memorandum, after full discussion, was drawn up by Dr. Newman Smyth.

DUTY changes, truth expands; one age cannot teach another either the details of its obligations or the matter of its knowledge, but the principle of obligation is everlasting. The consciousness of duty, whatever its origin, is to the moral nature of man what life is in the seed-cells of all organised creatures; the condition of its coherence, the elementary force in virtue of which it grows. J. A. Froude.

DR. BROOKE HERFORD.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES.

To the memorial notice of Dr. Herford, which we published last week, we add here three tributes: the address given by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed at the funeral service in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, on Wednesday week; the address by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, in Hale Chapel, on the following morning, before the interment; and passages from the sermon preached by the Rev. Henry Gow, at the memorial service in Rosslyn Hill Chapel on Sunday morning.

MR. WICKSTEED'S ADDRESS.

We hardly meet as mourners to-day. It is true that the pathetic sense of the weakness that closes upon the last scenes of a strong man's life is with us; but that life itself in all its active power is far more vividly in our minds; and if we are to mourn over the life of Brooke Herford, wherein and whereat shall we rejoice? Those who have lived may die without sorrow overwhelming our hearts. It is those who have never really lived their lives whose deaths are tragic.

He lived. He drank in life at every pore. He knew what he most cared to have, to do, and to be, and went straight for it. As every crisis of life came to him he chose on those principles on which he would afterwards wish to have chosen, never letting the moment triumph over the hour, or the hour over the drift and purpose of a lifetime. And so the tragedy of life's mistaken choices—of leaving the substance for the shadow, of the vain illusions that make us choose according to the surface stream, neglecting the deep currents of our being, that delude us into taking this one path that we may spend our lives in weeping that we took not the other—never cast its shadow over the radiance of his inward conviction or the strength with which he handled life. Often in his younger days he was rebuked for want of worldly wisdom. He seemed to choose rashly, without weighing consequences; but that was because he set no great store on the things that worldly wisdom values. To the best of his judgment and his light he choose the things that he valued, he took that which signified most to him, and triumphed in his choice.

Those who knew him only in his later years of success and prosperity (in all in which he most cared to succeed and prosper) scarcely realise the days of hard trial, of what, indeed, would seem to most desperate struggle, through which he went, traces of which he bore throughout his life, and which aged him beyond his years; but he faced everything not with passive courage, but with active and victorious strength and joy.

Generous, open-handed, and open-hearted, with a noble simplicity and a noble frugality, he was able to share with those around him, nay, with the merest stranger, those simple supports and adornments of life which were all he cared to have—all, at least, that he cared to win—and his whole housekeeping and home-building were a proclamation of his faith that material things are to be valued only for the life of the affections, of the mind, and of the spirit to which they can be made to minister. His choice throughout was for the things that are real and abiding, and he cared not what came of the shows and conventional requirements of life. He knew what life was. He chose it, and he lived. Hence his power as a preacher and teacher. He did not commend to his flock as precious things which he was himself content to barter for dross. His joy of the spirit, his secure sense of power to point out the pearls of great price for which man should sell all that he hath, had upon them the stamp of vital sincerity. He testified of what he knew. Hence, too, the invigorating quality of all intercourse with him. Few men, in word and deed, held up so high a standard with more convincing force, with more infectious enthusiasm, and with less of direct or implied rebuke.

But the world has a strange respect for those who frankly and openly despise its treasures—no, I would not say despise, for Brooke Herford never despised the good things of the world, but he took them, if they came in his way, reverently, even tenderly, just for what they were worth and for no more. The world respects those who do not fawn upon it, and gives them of its best. And so the world brought its tribute at last to this man who would not sue for its favour; and after the long struggle, days of comparative ease and abundant honour came to him. He once said with the quaint humour that never sat amiss on him, and that would play around subjects human and divine that were nearest and dearest to him, that he thought he had learnt the lesson of a struggling and a poor life, pretty completely, and that, if the Lord in his wisdom saw that the temptations of prosperity were necessary for the perfecting of his Christian character, he should be prepared to meet them also! Well, he met them and triumphed over them with the same buoyant and triumphant victory with which he had met the temptations and difficulties of poverty.

Such prosperity as transcended the measure of his modest ambition came to him; and with it honour, position and influence. Across the ocean he had these things, some in fuller measure, others over a wider area than he had at home, and finally he commanded that leisure for which he had so often and so sorely longed.

Always eager in his intellectual life, he was conscious that he had never done systematic justice to his powers; he was aware of a certain raggedness and patchwork quality about his scholarly and intellectual equipment, and he longed to be able to take a systematic survey of certain fields, especially of theological study; to start again, as one might in one's youth, and lay sure and fast and evenly the foundations of a more systematic student life. The opportunity had come, but there came also an invitation to relinquish it, and also to relinquish or risk some part at least of the material resources that meant ease and grace to the years that survived the struggle. The prospect of work triumphed over the prospect of leisure, and he determined to come back and plunge himself again into incessant toil of organising, stimulating, forming and carrying out this scheme and that; and in so choosing he obeyed, I take it, the yearning of his heart—which he had been too brave to humour, but which he could not resist when there was a clear and honourable opportunity to indulge it—the yearning of his heart for home.

So he came back again, bringing the full strength of his gathered honours and influence, to work to the utmost of his strength, for another stretch of years. And then came upon him that which hangs over one or the other of every loyal wedded pair. The time came when he must pursue to the end, alone, the journey and the task through which he had been sustained by loyal fellowship. His chosen companion had never allowed worldly cares or fears of hers to be a drag upon his sense of duty, or to hamper his spiritual flight. She had been a true support to him in all things. She had shared his struggles and shared the joy of his triumphs. Parting from her was the beginning of the end. For some time already his strength had been failing, and from this time it failed rapidly. He died "in his nest," with his children about him, and for many months he was so completely withdrawn from all possibility of work, or even of communication with the outer world, that his bodily presence in our midst seemed rather to veil than to reveal his pure and eager spirit. We can hardly feel to-day that we have but now lost him, or cry, "Know ye that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel," for we rather feel that he has come back in his strength after long weakness, and "this day a prince and a great man has risen again in Israel."

Throughout his life Brooke Herford was an optimist. In his youth, confidently and somewhat impatiently looking for the kingdom of God on earth, he was fond of quoting one who, when exhorted to trust in the Lord, answered, "Yes, but the worst of it is, the Lord isn't in a hurry, now I am." But in later years he would never admit any disappointment, only he was willing to wait the Lord's time. With the humorous self-criticism which never failed him, he looked back on the self-confidence of former years and declared that he had begun to think that after all he was not responsible for running the universe, and was inclined to give Providence a chance. But he was still an optimist—an optimist all round. I think he was conscious of no re-action in social and moral affairs, deeply as he was shocked and afflicted from time to time by particular events; and the tendencies of thought had long seemed to him to flow towards a deepening harmony between heart and head. Indeed, the supposed conflict between religion and science had never troubled him much. They needed no reconciliation to him. He never would have it that there was any serious drift in scientific thought that threatened the fundamental matters of faith. They were beyond the reach of intellectual bewilderment to him. He would indeed try his hand from time to time, like another, at the intellectual exposition of the fundamentals of his faith, or at the analysis and refutation of intellectual attacks upon them, but the true reconciliation of knowledge and faith to him lay in the unity of his own life.

His piety always had a childlike simplicity and directness about it, on which philosophical subtleties or intellectual exercises could never really get a bite; and for the like reason his devoutness was never a plant that needed a sheltered atmosphere, and the protection of hallowed associations. It was a primal emotion, robust and rejoicing in the open air. It could live and reveal itself unembarrassed in the press of social or even political life. His aspirations and his devotion could express themselves in the midst of merriment as well as sorrow. They required no preface or skilfully considered transitions, but rose spontaneously in the midst of breezy laughter as easily as in the solemn moments of what we others call the deeper life. The deeps are never far even from the surface of a true life.

He was a man. He lived, he loved, he fought, he triumphed; he suffered, he lost, he has found.

MR. DOWSON'S ADDRESS.

We are gathered together this morning, with sorrow in our hearts, to pay the last tribute to one who has occupied a great place in our religious community, and in the reverent affection of every one of us. His work for God and man has been done with all the might of a strong nature. He was a tower of strength in our midst, full—in all the thought of his mind, in all the words proceeding from his lips, in all the work to which he set his hands—of a vital energy peculiarly his own. His was a most kindling and inspiring personality, exuberant with overflowing life, living in close communion with God. In the ministry of our little band of churches where personal relations largely exist between us all, Brooke Herford's was a unique place. No one of us ever came into contact with him without feeling that a fresh breeze of religious influence had blown upon us, invigorating our souls; manliness marked him in religion as in all things; his faith was as robust as it was devout, and vibrated in the very tones of his voice. He lived his life humble at heart, yet rejoicing in his loving service of God and man, devoted with passionate enthusiasm to his Master, Christ, the Christian ministry to him the most glorious and the happiest of earthly callings. How he carried that abounding joy of his into his untiring, devoted labours. This was the very source of his power. His religion was the sunshine of his life; trust in His Heavenly Father's ever-present love and goodness filled him with serene happiness; and to go forth in the spirit of Jesus to bring to his brothers and sisters a faith as full of joy as his own was to himself was with him no task, but the one irrepressible longing of his great, loving, sympathetic soul. He had such a gospel to preach, the inspiration of his own life, that he rejoiced every moment that he preached it, and so brought to others the blessings it could give. Just that was the impression which he always made upon us. Never was there a minister of Christ who was more genuine. While faith in his Heavenly Father beamed from him in every word and look with contagious power, his enthusiasm for religion, pure and undefiled, revealed in its native beauty and simplicity in the soul of Jesus, was a passionate emotion. Moreover, with clear eye and independent judgment and practical sagacity, all alive with fine moral and spiritual sense, he ever went to the heart of his subject, dealing not with words but realities, human and divine, and the Christian religion that he preached was a gospel of humanity interpreted by one who, with devotion and love, had sat at the feet of the Master, and been lifted up and strengthened. His power as a preacher lay in his preaching—in plain language and homely phrase, with many an apt illustration—a religion of common life out of the rich stores of his own knowledge of men and things, under the touch of the spirit of Jesus. It was this personal experience of the power of the religion of Jesus in his own life that made him the enthusiastic sanguine missionary of the simple gospel in which he had so intense a faith. How he roused others to the service of the cause he loved. What a valiant soldier of Christ he was. Never sparing himself, but willingly, joyously, giving up his life to the work of his Master.

We all loved him. His presence with us was a constant inspiration; our souls were kindled by the touch of his. His enthusiastic faith strengthened ours; his bright energy laid hold upon us; his devotion to the highest service he could render quickened us. We were the better, the braver, the truer men and women for every hour we passed with him. His strong, tender humanity won for him an influence on all who knew him that was as rare as it was powerful. We shall ever remember that noble Christian character of his, honest as the day, full of love to all things good and beautiful and true, losing himself in each cause he loved, and bright with enthusiastic joy in living for God and man. With immortal hope and a faith that casts out fear, we commit his soul to his Heavenly Father's care; and, although no mortal eye can behold the unseen realm into which our dear brother's spirit has passed, it is enough for us to believe that his Father is with him there, as He is with us here, and holds in the same embrace of deathless love him whom He has taken and those whom He has left.

FROM MR. GOW'S MEMORIAL SERMON.

We are all remembering to-day with many grateful and affectionate thoughts one who was for nine years the loved and honoured minister of this congregation. You remember him in this pulpit speaking strong words of courage and of trust. You remember, as many have told me, how the very tones of his voice and the look upon his face were in themselves an influence on you for good. You remember his humour, his wise counsels based on large experience of human nature in many lands and upon brave, stern conflicts with difficulty in his own life. You remember the clear and simple faith, the open heart, the cheerfulness and sympathy which you felt in all he said.

You remember him in your houses as minister and friend. You found the same man there as in the pulpit; a man of firm faith and strong convictions, a man to encourage the depressed, to stimulate the indolent, a man to lighten difficulties by his humour, his common sense, as well as by his sympathy. He was loved by little children. He was equally at home with men of all classes and all ages. He was at home with happiness as well as with sorrow. His faith in God gave him power to comfort many in times of grief and care, and it was the same quiet faith which gave him keen enjoyment in children's laughter and fun, and made him rejoice in all innocent gaiety. That faith was seen not only as a power to lighten the burdens of others, and to cheer their hearts, it was a faith which shone out most clearly in its influence upon himself.

We remember to-day very reverently the long and weary months of inactivity and patient waiting. We remember how in the midst of his success and power, in the midst of the appreciation and love of ever-multiplying and deepening friendships, in the midst of his joy in helping others and in bearing witness to what he felt ever more profoundly to be true and good, he was struck down at his post. He who so loved his work, who was so tireless in its performance, to whom it was life and fullest joy, had now only to lie and wait for death. He could do nothing more it seemed for men. Those of us who have seen him in the last year of weakness cannot feel his work was ended when his strength was gone. We feel that his influence was not less deep, was in some ways even more in his days of patient waiting than in his days of fullest strength. We have learnt to know and love him in a new and deeper way. We have felt the power of his faith, the beauty of his patience, the strength of his spirit, in the extremity of weakness.

There were no complaints, no fretfulness, no doubts. He showed us all that the simple faith which he had preached so earnestly, for which he had worked so devotedly, by which he had helped so many lives, was a faith which in the darkest hours of his own life could give him hope and peace. He was glad to go, and we are glad with him that the long weariness is past. But the time of waiting and of weariness has left its imperishable precious memories for his family and friends. We thank God for the witness that he bore to the power of his religion, not only in the strength and joy of his manhood, but in his times of sorest trial. . . . . As we think of him now we remember his own words. "Compared to that greater life, this little span of earthly years is only like a dream! Compared to its imperishable realities, these objects of earth that are silently changing every moment are but as the shadows which fill our dreams. Like a little dreaming child we think there can be nothing so real; but the watching angels must smile to see the eager expressions of passion, hope, and fear, which pass over our faces; and in a little while the Father's presence bending over us will touch us with that kind hand which in our blindness we call death, and, even while the visions of this earthly life fade from us like our dreams, the glorious realities of the heavenly world will open to our changed and wondering sight."

LITERATURE.

THE BEGINNINGS OF CHRISTIANITY.*

UNDER this title the Rev. G. A. Bienemann offers to English readers the first volume of a translation of Wernle's striking book, "Die Anfänge unserer Religion." Prof. Wernle, though his special field is now that of modern Church History, in the University of Basel, was already known by his penetrating essay on the Synoptic problem (1899), when he issued in 1901 a work on the origins of Christianity, which was based on a course of University lectures on New Testament Theology. The method and spirit of the work, however, are far removed from the technical forms of theology. The writer's aim, as he traces the changes which the New Testament literature exhibits, from the original teaching of Jesus to the rise of Catholicism in the second half of the second century, is to get back from the theologians to the Gospel.

The present volume, embodying rather more than half of the original, deals with the preaching and person of Jesus, the early Christian community, the missionary work and theology of the Apostle Paul, and the meaning of the Book of Revelation. In brief trenchant sentences—made sometimes briefer still by division at the hands of the accomplished translator—the author expounds the significance of Jesus, the growth of the Pauline Christology, or the impassioned hopes of the Apocalypse. There are no long critical discussions. The writer marches on with a firm grasp of his subjects, but he hardly ever tarries over side-issues or even over single passages. He has no time to justify his interpretations, save in the interesting exposition of Luke xvii. 20, "The kingdom of God is already among you." (p. 62). Readers may be sometimes puzzled to locate his descriptions of the ideas or arguments of the Apostle Paul; that is their affair; he cannot pause to give them clues. In one case —(p. 251) "St. Paul used the words, 'man such as we are,' in a very strict sense indeed"—this breathless haste is positively misleading, for the Apostle nowhere employs the phrase thus put into his mouth. Similarly this speed occasionally leads to somewhat reckless assertions, as when the greater part of the canonical Psalter is declared to be not much older than the age of Pompey (p. 20), or when the title "Son of God" is cited (p. 52) as a "self-designation of Jesus." What Jesus uses, in a kind of triumphal hymn (Matt. xi. 25–27, Luke x. 21, 22) of contested origin, is "the Son" in correlation with "the Father"; apparently Prof. Wernle recognises no other passage ("It is striking how very seldom Jesus uses the word—in reality only once"); the occurrence in Mark xiii. 32 is thus disowned (in Matt. xxiv. 36, the reading of course is doubtful). But it may well be doubted whether "the Son" can be described as "the Messianic title" in the Jewish theocratic sense. In the same way we should like to see further justification of the statement that "Jesus spent the whole of his life in the faith that he had the law on his side, and that he himself was its true interpreter." What of the breach with the Scribes over the question of defilement, which involved such risks that he took refuge in flight?

The opening sentence of the section entitled "The Rise of the Religion" discloses the author's general position:—

> Christianity arose because a layman, Jesus of Nazareth, endowed with a self-consciousness more than prophetic, came forward and attached men so firmly to His* person, that, in spite of His shameful death, they were both ready to live for Him and to die for Him. Jesus imparted new values to things; He scattered new thoughts broadcast in the world.

The delineation of Jesus is, of course, at once confronted with the question of the Messiahship. The writer's view is that he accepted the title because he could not help it: "He laboured with it, broke it up, recast it; yet a portion of the deception which it contained was transmitted to Him." Nothing can be franker than the recognition that the Messianic idea had only a temporary value; but the author does not really get rid of its encumbering language. Not only does he ascribe to Jesus a superhuman self-consciousness, even while he emphasises its limitations, he persists in retaining titles like Mediator and Redeemer, which are, of course, part of the official terminology. To be sure, it is explained that the redemption operated first in delivering the sick and suffering from their diseases; next, "Jesus redeemed his listeners from the theologians" (p. 99); thirdly, comes the redemption from the Jewish Church (p. 103). Is it not rather a pity to play with serious language in this half-jesting fashion? Prof. Wernle has so much that is true and important to say concerning the subsequent developments in theology, that we cannot help regretting that he has not more frankly placed himself where such partial concessions to tradition would have been needless or impossible.

The main thesis of the book is that Jesus was obliged by the circumstances of his age to clothe his message to the world in a form which could not adequately express it. The history of the early church is a history of the efforts to disengage it from its eschatological entanglements, and restate it in terms which could make it available for human life at large. The chapters describing the "rise of the religion" are thus occupied with an attempt to distinguish the permanent elements in the teaching of Jesus from the forms into which they were inevitably thrown by the national hopes in the midst of which they were produced. There is much that is suggestive and stimulating about these discussions; but the total impression is less powerful than that of the exposition of the Pauline doctrine. It is doubtless easier to delineate the attitude of the Apostle towards the different sets of opponents by whom he was confronted—Gentiles, Jews, and Judaising Christians—than to disclose to others the secret of being in Jesus which can justly be described as "a new mediatorship between God and man" (p. 55). The whole section on the great Apostle, accordingly—really occupying just over half the volume—seems more vigorous in its handling, whether it describes the mission to the Gentiles, the conception of salvation, the anti-Jewish apologetic, the beginnings of a Christian gnosis (is it correct to say that St. Paul "can set down the equation Jesus = the Lord [i.e., God] in the Old Testament," p. 331?), or the personal religion of the thinker who "introduced Christianity into the world's history." Here the writer has no reserves and no compromises. His judgments ring clear and terse as the successive aspects of the Apostle's many-sided work come into view. No special position has to be maintained; and the author rises above restraints of which before he was perhaps hardly conscious, into an unembarrassed freedom. The sequel of the work will be awaited with great interest.

SHORT NOTICES.

THE Sunday School Association begins with the New Year the publication of Monthly Notes for Sunday Classes, a tastefully printed eight-page magazine (for a half-penny), which is to furnish a lesson for every Sunday in the year, to be used either in school or home, and also notes on the Sunday readings, of which the list is printed on the back of the motto card to which we recently referred. The little magazine is edited by Miss Marian Pritchard, President of the Association, whose letter on the subject we published last week, and who also contributes the lessons for January, on "Why Come to Sunday Classes." In the next two months the lessons are to be on the Old Testament, by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed. From April to June Mrs. Alfred Hall, of Norwich, will deal with "Foundations of Character." From October to December Miss Emma Piper of Evesham, with "Thirteen Sayings of Jesus." The contributors and subjects for the summer months are:—July, Mr. Ion Pritchard, "Francis of Assisi"; August, the Rev. Thomas Robinson, "Nature Lessons"; September, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, "The Land where Jesus Lived." The January number has also Notes for a New Year's Address. (S.S.A., Essex Hall. Single copy, one half-penny net. Yearly subscriptions, by post, 1s.; six copies, 4s.)

We are very glad to welcome the English translation of Professor Jean Réville's Liberal Christianity: Its Origin, Nature and Mission, in the Crown Theological Library. These valuable lectures were fully noticed, on their publication last year, in THE INQUIRER of April 18. (Williams and Norgate. 4s.)

The Reformers' Year Book, 1904, has for joint editors of this, its tenth issue, F. W. Pethick Lawrence and Joseph Edwards, the former having taken Mr. Percy Alden's place as editor of the Echo. The Year Book is full of interest and valuable information, and has a number of portraits, including (as frontispiece) Mr. B. Seebohm Rowntree, author of "Poverty: A Study of Town Life," Mr. Leonard Courtney, Mr. C. P. Scott, M.P., editor of the Manchester Guardian; Mr. W. N. Dickinson, J.P., L.C.C.; Mr. G. M. Trevelyan, one of the editors of the Independent Review; and Mr. T. Holmes, the police court missionary. After the 1903 Chronology comes an account (with portraits) of the Labour members in Parliament, then a list of Liberals, then a complete list of the House of Commons, with the Labour and Liberal candidates added. The Parliamentary Representative of the Echo contributes a brief article on the Legislation of 1903, and Mr. Lawrence writes on "Mr. Chamberlain's Proposals," with a list of the real reforms, for which, in his view, we ought to work. An interesting section of the Year Book is that on "Other Countries." Trade Unions, Women's Work, Temperance, University Settlements are among the subjects dealt with, and there is a useful directory of Social and Political Reformers. (The Echo, 19, St. Bride-street, E.C. 1s. net. In art linen, 2s. net.)

From the Oxford University Press we have received a copy of the 16mo Clarendon Reference Bible, beautifully bound in limp leather. The real marvel of the book is the Oxford India paper, which, with the text printed in large heavy-faced type, gives ease in reading within a small compass, such as we have not seen before. This Bible is in the old Authorised Version. If the University Press would issue the Revised Version in this form they would confer a great boon. (London: Henry Frowde. In leather bindings. From 6s.)

Another Oxford India paper book is Nave's Index Digest of the Holy Scriptures, containing over 20,000 topics and sub-topics, and 100,000 references to the Scriptures, a work of astonishing diligence. The author's standpoint may be seen by reference to the article "Trinity," where the "Three Heavenly Witnesses" duly appear. (Henry Frowde. Pp. 1,622. With 12 Coloured Maps. 17s.)

Boswell's Johnson, abridged and edited by G. Nugent Bankes and H. Higgins, With an Introduction by G. K. Chesterton, is a welcome addition to the series, in which John Wesley's Journal and George Fox's Journal led the way. (Isbister & Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

Among the timely books which we are sorry to pass over with so brief a notice are:—

The Political Works of Richard Cobden. With a Preface by Lord Welby, a full Index and Bibliography. T. Fisher Unwin. 2 vols. 7s.)

British Industries Under Free Trade. Essays by Experts. Edited by Harold Cox, Secretary of the Cobden Club. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

The Wonderful Century. A new edition, revised, and largely re-written, by Alfred Russel Wallace. With 107 Illustrations. (Sonnenschein & Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

Parliamentary England. Evolution of the Cabinet System. By Edward Jenks, M.A. Story of the Nations Series. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s.)

MARY JONES, OF LLANFIHANGEL.

ABOUT the time, or a little earlier, I surmise, when angelic little Angles and Saxons were being taught to say or sing, "And made me in these Christian days A happy English child," there was a famine of Bibles in Wales. And one little Welsh girl, Mary Jones, of Llanfihangel, had so sore a hunger for a Bible, that she walked a distance of fifty miles, in two days, from her village to Bala and back, to feed her hunger, paying for her precious treasure, romantically obtained, what now would seem a truly famine price. Whether the British and Foreign Bible Society would have been founded so soon without her, or whether its field of operation would ever have been so widespread, one cannot say; but when the story of the notable expedition of this little Welsh girl was related in London by the Rev. Thomas Charles, of Bala, "the Apostolic Charles of Bala," and he appealed for Bibles for Wales, it kindled such a flame of enthusiasm in the Rev. Joseph Hughes (one of the secretaries of the Religious Tract Society) that he exclaimed, "Mr. Charles, surely a society might be formed for the purpose; and if for Wales, why not for the world?" And the monopoly of the "happy English child" was destined soon to come to an end. But in the interim, the cheery little Angles and Saxons would make the most of their opportunity, and raise the roof as they "thanked goodness" and sang (the patriotic little cherubs)—

I was not born a little slave
  Beneath a burning sun,
To wish I were but in the grave,
  And all my labour done.
My God, I thank Thee, who hast planned
  A better lot for me,
And placed me in this happy land
  Where I may hear of Thee.

And if ever there was "a little slave" it was Mary Jones, till she had learned to read, and till she had worked and saved enough to pay for the Bible its famine price. And then she lived to slave on behalf of the infant British and Foreign Bible Society, as well as on behalf of some of her own hardly less precious infants. Dux femina facti was said of Dido of Carthage, and might well have been said of Helen of Troy, and still better of Joan of Arc; but of all women who have been leaders of great expeditions and famous undertakings, commend us to this little woman of sixteen summers and her gallant barefooted march to win the Bible which was largely hers already, and to win renown of which she knew nothing. Dux femina facti might very well be the grateful motto of the British and Foreign Bible Society, engraved on the Bible House, where this now famous Bible is to be seen, for it joins many another famous Bible there. The story of her expedition is beginning to resound throughout the world in this centenary year of the Society's existence, and Llanfihangel bids fair to vie with Troy and Carthage and Arc. And of all expeditions what could be more glorious than that a nation that values one book above all others and attributes its own national greatness to some little knowledge of its best teachings, should endeavour to spread it throughout the world, in all its hundreds of languages, for the most part without money and without price, or at a price so low that none need spiritually starve.

Wherever you go, therefore, speak well of Llanfihangel. The fame of Pontevedra cannot be compared with it; no mention, indeed, need be made of it but for the soreness of the temptation, what though in its advocate, according to its galvanic notary public Garcia, it contained the cleverest man in Spain (to say nothing of the world), who understood all languages and sciences. Ah! "The Bible in Spain"! One needs must think of it once more, in this centenary year, how its grave vies with its gay. Yes, George Borrow was an agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1835, and he broadcast the Bibles o'er the lands of Spain and Portugal, and sometimes literally scattered them about, dropping them where thorns and thistles grew, and scattering them on the rock. And when he was about to depart from Pontevedra, the Señor Garcia stood by the side of his horse, and having embraced him, thrust a small pamphlet into his hand. "This book," said he, "contains a description of Pontevedra. Wherever you go, speak well of Pontevedra." Borrow nodded. "Stay, my dear friend, I have heard of your Society, and will do my best to further its views. I am quite disinterested; but if at any future time you should have an opportunity of speaking in print of Señor Garcia, the notary public of Pontevedra—you understand me—I wish you would do so." And Borrow said, "I will." And he did. And nothing surely even in all the happy literature of unsolicited testimonials can compare with the sweet savour of this solicitor's solicitude.

From Llanfihangel to Pontevedra! From China to Peru! That is exactly what happens with the mind of anyone interested in the British and Foreign Bible Society's work. It extravagates here, there, and everywhere. We should not be surprised to hear that the little book about Mary Jones published by the Society—"versions in various languages have been issued"—is to be had in Spanish, and that the little boys and girls of Pontevedra are duly speaking well of Llanfihangel wherever they go. And oh! as a reward we hope they are allowed to read the "Bible in Spain" in Spanish, and I for one should like to know which they love best, "Don Quixote" or "The Bible in Spain." Whatever was the value of the pamphlet on Pontevedra, it could not exceed the interest of the little book, "The Story of Mary Jones and Her Bible," by "an accomplished authoress." It contains a description of Llanfihangel nestling at the foot of Cader Idris, within sight of Cardigan Bay, and it gives a simple, sweet, unsensational story of the uncommon child who aroused such a sensation as to begin the establishment of an enterprise surely having no parallel in history. She was indeed the dawn maiden of a light that is shining more and more unto a perfect day. Can you imagine any other nation or society combining to scatter broadcast, and almost for nothing, its precious "Sacred Books" and translating them into every tongue?

Twenty-five miles was a long walk even for such an aurora-like maiden as Mary Jones, and she arrived too late at Bala to see Mr. Charles that night, but the old preacher, David Edwards, at whose house she stayed, knocked at her door at early dawning, and said in words that now sound like a golden prophecy of other things, "Wake up, Mary Jones, my child, Mr. Charles is an early riser, and will soon be at work. The dawn is breaking . get up, dear." And after all there was not a Bible to be bought, and the heart-broken maiden covered her face with her hands and sobbed. She had struggled hard to learn to read; she had slaved to raise the needful funds; she had toiled over twenty-five miles of road, and lo! a famine. But one was at length forthcoming, one that had been intended doubtless for someone who, it was felt, could easily have paid the expected famine price. And Mr. Charles turned to the old preacher and said huskily, "David Edwards, is not such a sight as this enough to melt the hardest heart? A girl so young, so poor, so intelligent, so familiar with Scripture, compelled to walk all the distance from Llanfihangel to Bala to get a Bible! From this day I can never rest until I find out some means of supplying the pressing wants of my country that cries out for the word of God." Mary Jones led the man who led the expedition. On the title-page of this precious Welsh copy she wrote in a neat hand and in English (a little broken—why English?)—these words:—

Mary Jones was born 16th of December 1784
I bought this in the 16 year of my age I am Daughter of Jacob Jones and mary Jones
His wife the Lord may give me grace Amen
Mary Jones His the True
Onour of this Bible Bought in the year
1800 Age 16.

Never was there truer "onour" of the Bible. And now the Bible House, the great centre of the British and Foreign Bible Society's activities, holds it a high honour to be the "onour" of this romantic treasure trove.

In 1800 the great journey was made; in 1802, whilst the Welsh apostles mused, the fire burned. On March 7, 1804, the great Society was founded.

THE third and concluding volume of Chambers's "Encyclopædia of English Literature" has a section devoted to American literature in which the articles dealing with Longfellow, Whittier, Hawthorne, Poe, Holmes, Thoreau, Lowell, Whitman, and Harriet Beecher Stowe are from the pen of the Rev. J. W. Chadwick.

THE Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached last Sunday morning his last sermon for the present in Little Portland-street Chapel. In the coming spring there is hope that he may be heard there again. The sermon on Sunday was from the text, "Behold, I make all things new." It was filled, says a brief note in the Daily News, with flashes of deepest insight, and was "a fearless discussion of the sins and woes of the world, in the light of the faith of Christ in God's love and fatherhood."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE GUEST.

You all know the story of Zacchæus—but if you have forgotten, you will find it in Luke xix. It is a story that makes us think people in those days were much like people of to-day. Zacchæus did exactly what men and boys are always doing when some great hero, or some distinguished person, is coming by. The first thing they try to do is to get where they can look over the heads of the crowd. A window, a railing, a platform, a lamp-post, a barrel—anything that will enable them to see the great man, will do. Zacchæus climbed a tree. What he hoped to do was just to get a good look at the man everybody was talking about, the man who was making such a sensation.

Perhaps Jesus himself noticed what he did. Perhaps some one touched his arm, and said, "Master, see, there is the head tax-collector of Jericho—such a rich man—trying to get a good sight of you." But you can fancy Zacchæus's surprise when Jesus stopped and spoke to him, called him by name, told him he was coming to his house to dine. Zacchæus felt this a great honour, and, indeed, it was; just as you might feel if some day, when he was driving by, the King stopped to speak with you, called you by name, and proposed to go home with you.

This centre of all eyes, this man whom everyone was talking about, of whom the most marvellous stories were told, and the wildest hopes excited—he was actually coming to his house! He might not only see the great man, but receive him as a guest—talk with him! And Zacchæus was the more surprised, because though he was such a rich man, he knew he would not be received in society in Jericho. Respectable people looked on him with suspicion and dislike because he was a tax-collector in the employ of the Roman conquerors. So Zacchæus, instead of a passing glimpse of the great man, got more than he ever dreamed of getting. He got the honour and the happiness of entertaining Jesus as his guest.

I wonder how we should feel if it were possible for Jesus to say the same thing to any of us; to say "I am coming home with you to-day from the service, and have dinner with you—Christmas dinner, New Year's dinner, any day dinner." I wonder if we should feel it an honour and a pleasure. We should feel it an honour, I dare say; but should we feel it a pleasure? Do you think the presence of Jesus would make us feel strange? throw an awkwardness and constraint over everything? "spoil the fun?" as children say.

Well, so artificial, and so unreal, are our notions of Jesus; so unlike what he was that perhaps it would do this at first. We should be so shy of him, so afraid to be natural ourselves. We should be afraid to speak simply. We might be afraid to laugh or to make a little joke. We might think we ought to kneel as we do in church; and that listening to him would be like listening to a sermon.

But this was not the way people felt toward Jesus when he lived. They were not afraid of being familiar with him, nor of telling him about their little personal affairs, nor of talking over with him questions that puzzled them, nor of asking his help. They felt he loved them. He loved children, and loved their ways, and was always telling the grown people that they must be like children. No; those who lived with Jesus were not afraid of him, nor constrained, nor ill at ease with him. He seemed—just because he was wiser and more tender and loving than others—to open their hearts, and draw their confidences; and they found themselves telling him things they never thought they could tell anyone. Yes; I am sure if we had known the real Jesus, we should have been glad to have him come to dinner with us. We should have enjoyed our Christmas or our New Year all the more, because he went home with us.

I am sure if he were sitting at the table with us, no one would be greedy or rude, or think too much about eating and drinking. We should all be gentle and courteous, thoughtful for each other. For there is nothing which brings out the best in children, or in grown people, so surely as being with one whom they look up to, without being afraid of him; whom they love, because they are sure he loves them, though he is ever so much better and wiser than they are.

We sit in the church sometimes—as we have been doing lately, thinking of Jesus—hearing again the lovely legends of his birth, singing carols about him, thanking God for him. When we go away from the church, don't let us leave him behind us. Let us ask him to come home with us.

It will not be an actual man walking beside us and sitting in visible presence at table with us, as it was with Zacchæus. But we may take him home with us as the same spirit of love, of gentleness, of thought for others, which dwelt in him, and made him what he was. That spirit may sit at dinner with us, and keep us from a selfish thought, a rude word; keep us from jealousy, keep us from envy; keep us thinking of the happiness of those about us. It may play with us in our games, as well as kneel with us in our prayer. It will make our merry-making innocent and sweet, and kind and pure. It will make our home happy, and the day happy, and ourselves happy.

"To-day I must abide at thy house," said Jesus. Yes, to-day, this temper and this spirit may come home with us and stay. From the house of Zacchæus Jesus rose and went away. But in our house, and in our hearts, this spirit may abide for ever.

WHEN St. Antony gave up all for Christ, and became a hermit on the desert hills, he was told by a vision that an old cobbler of Alexandria, simply because he was humble and prayerful, was nearer to God than he. And when St. Macarius had made the same self-sacrifice the vision told him also, that, after all, he was not so good as two poor married washer-women of Alexandria, who lived at home and whose only virtue it was that they loved God and spoke no evil of their neighbour. If you are humble and faithful in your sphere of Heaven-appointed duty, it is enough. F. W. Farrar.

OUT OF THE SHADOWS INTO LIGHT.

WITH every New Year hope is born again, and steadfast determination faces the coming time. Here is the fresh opportunity for service. Let the dead past bury its dead: but the living treasures that we bear with us, the beautiful memories which cannot die, the hidden fellowship with those who have passed within the veil of heavenly light, let these go with us into the New Year, to nerve our strength, to calm our restlessness, to clear our vision, to fit us for wiser and more effective service. And all that we have achieved, all that has been loyal and true, unselfish and generous in our past work, goes with us, too, as the armour of our faithfulness for the new conflict.

O Time! ne'er resteth thy swift wing;
Thy minutes make no stay;
Yet what vast treasures do they bring.
What treasures bear away!

Some, indeed, are borne away, but leave their radiance with us, and with glad hearts we lift our faces to the sunlight of heavenly day.

Yes, Lord, our days may be divine,
Our hours may golden be;
The brightness of their light may shine
Through all eternity.

In the past year there have been many things to sadden and discourage, but for that very reason we should at this moment gird up our strength and seek for new confidence and new energy of faithfulness, that at least where we are testimony shall be borne to truth, the claims of righteousness and of humanity shall not be dishonoured, and earnest, lowly service shall be rendered, in the spirit of brotherly kindness, the spirit of CHRIST'S self-sacrifice and faith, of trust in the FATHER'S unchanging purpose of good.

In the fellowship of our churches the past year gave us many helpful and beautiful gifts. The International Meetings at Amsterdam renewed the delight of the great gathering in London two years before, and deepened the sense of brotherhood with fellow-workers in many lands, while the meetings of the National Conference and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association were rich in stimulus and opportunities for closer fellowship. The Association, indeed, received a very special impulse of new life, and carries into the new year fresh energy and consecration of purpose, to use its greatly augmented resources for the strengthening of liberal religious thought and life, both at home and abroad. There is new gladness in the work because now it can be more effectively done. Resources are there, now the call is for men.

To everyone whose prayer at the opening of a new year is for a new measure of strength and wisdom and capacity to meet more effectively the demands of a high service, we will offer here some words spoken originally to students leaving college to enter upon the work of active ministry. They are the words of Dr. MARTINEAU, and may be taken now with a wider application, whatever the need and the circumstance of our immediate duty may be. Let them come to each one, whatever his calling in life, as a new year's benediction, from one who knew and could reveal to us the sources of divine strength.

"From the seat of quiet spectator you are flung among the actors of the great human drama; and the very next scene will put you to the test, whether its spirit has true hold of you, and you are equal to its high demands. It is a grave, yet an inspiring change; grave, because it will find out your weaknesses, and mark every missed opportunity with a shadow of unavailing regret; inspiring, because asking nothing from you but what you can surely give—the free surrender of yourselves, the life of pure simplicity, the word of truth to your own best thought, the deed most natural to a considerate and tender heart. If you had any part to play, we could never have taught you to assume it. To be what you are, to say what you think, to teach what you know, to do what you must revere and make no peace with what you inwardly abhor—this is the sacrifice, neither impossible nor ignoble, which you descend into the world to offer to the Lord of conscience and the Searcher of hearts. Only in speaking the word which is most deeply your own will you utter that which is not your own, but the Father's who sends you; only in acting from the inmost shrine of your own spirit will you do His work. Resigning our poor guidance, we commit you to that higher care of His which is never withheld from those who trustfully seek communion with Him."

In that spirit all our work will be well done. Without it we may be cumbered about many things, but surely we shall labour in vain.

There are special interests to which we look forward in this coming year. It brings the hundredth anniversary of the death of JOSEPH PRIESTLEY, and the publication of a new Life of that eminent man of science and Unitarian Confessor will be only a part of its fitting celebration. In Birmingham, the scene of his closing ministry in England and of his worst sufferings at the hands of an intolerant mob, strenuous efforts are being made to secure a commemoration that shall be fruitful of practical beneficence, and make for the progress of the cause he had so much at heart. Another interest of the year will be the visit to Australia of the Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, the present occupant of another of PRIESTLEY'S pulpits, that of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds. And while these things occupy our thoughts, and the day's work is steadfastly carried on, it ought not to be forgotten during the present year that in 1905 we must celebrate the centenary of the birth of JAMES MARTINEAU. Both for his college and for the churches to whose service his life was devoted that is matter for the most careful consideration, that the occasion may not be robbed of the inspiration that it must have for our common life.

CHANGING AIMS.

THE year just closed will always be memorable in our national and Imperial history as that which saw the formal launching of the scheme for Imperial preferential tariffs. Even in these few months the programme of its sponsors has been materially modified, and its final shape, whenever, and if ever, it comes to be definitely submitted to the judgment of the electorate or of Parliament, is a matter upon which speculative opinion will vary greatly. A curious commentary on the scheme's immaturity has been afforded in the last days of the old year by the proceedings of the Indian National Congress, at which Mr. LAL MOHUN GHOSE, in his presidential address, found it necessary to put the categorical question to its founder whether he was "prepared to include India in his scheme of an Imperial Zollverein"—"whether, if preference is given to the wheat growers of Canada, the same preference is to be given to India, or whether Canadian wheat is to be protected against Indian wheat." "If you succeed," he asked, "in deluding the people of England, and induce them to adopt a suicidal policy, what answer will you return to our people when they desire their industries to be protected against Lancashire?"

These are questions it will be found hard to answer, and they are typical of the difficulties which are displaying themselves at every step in the path of the new propaganda. Even in the self-governing Colonies in whose especial interest it is understood to have been set on foot, everything seems to be going awry. In the Australian Commonwealth elections the Free Trade party has been elected largely on a pledge of some of its members not to disturb the existing tariff compromise, while the Ministerialists will not reduce the duty on imports from the Mother Country, which they regard, in common with the whole of the existing tariff, as below, rather than above, the ideal. What they may do, if supported by a sufficient number of Labour members to secure a majority, is to increase the duties on foreign-made goods while maintaining those on British manufactures at their present level. That is the plan also of Mr. SEDDON for New Zealand. In Canada the manufacturing interest has for some time shown itself determinedly hostile to any further reduction in the tariff against British manufactures, and any increase in the duties on foreign-made goods would be a complete reversal of the policy pursued by Sir WILFRID LAURIER and his friends since the Liberals came into power.

When the reciprocity scheme was launched last May it was claimed as a move in the direction of Free Trade, inasmuch as, though England was to place a small duty on foreign imports, the Colonies were, on the other hand, in return for their exemption from this duty, substantially to lower their barrier against goods sent them by the Mother Country. Instead, the effect of the propaganda has been to give to Colonial Protectionists the excuse of a misguided patriotism for raising instead of reducing the average amount of their duties. Similarly, at home, the movement is coming to concern itself less and less with means of consolidating the Empire by helping Colonial products in their competition here with foreign goods, and more and more with the simple Protection of our own producers from outside competition.

The change is important and significant. The home consumer is to make sacrifices not now for the benefit of his brother beyond the seas, but for the benefit of any and every home producer who imagines himself aggrieved by the competition of the foreigner. A select body of these home producers has been chosen by the Tariff Reform League to draw up a tariff in conformity with their aspirations, and acceptance of their scheme is to be pressed upon the consuming public in the much abused name of patriotism. Thus will farmers be saved the trouble of studying up-to-date methods of farming, and manufacturers the distress of "scrapping" antiquated machinery and laying down new plant. Truly it is a noble crusade! The tide of Protectionism, kept back for half a century by terrible popular memories, let loose in an unguarded moment by short-sighted statesmen, is sweeping away their nice distinctions between the less and more, and is carrying them powerless on its crest. It will need all the energy and all the patriotism during this new year of those who still keep their heads to drive it back within its appointed bounds.

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR 1903.

THE year that has just drawn to a close appears in the retrospect as one of confusion and suspense, at any rate in the political world, with little to kindle ardent hope for the immediate future, and the dreadful shadow of the tragedy of Macedonia darkening the whole scene. Yet there are redeeming features, and the friends of peace, of international brotherhood, of justice and humanity, have every reason to stand steadfastly to their own posts of duty. It is, no doubt, being thankful for small mercies to recall that the Venezuelan imbroglio did not lead to worse troubles, but it is matter for the sincerest congratulation that the Alaska boundary arbitration has been brought to a satisfactory conclusion, and we must rejoice over the arbitration agreement concluded between this country and France.

International Amity.

We are grateful also to our "Royal Ambassador" for the good feeling promoted by his visits to Portugal and Italy, where at Rome he visited both the King and the Pope, and especially to France, while the happy visits of President Loubet and the King of Italy to England belong to the same pleasant retrospect. With these also must be remembered the interchange of cordial hospitality in both capitals between groups of French and English legislators.

The year opened with the last of the Coronation spectacles, the magnificent Durbar at Delhi, where the King was represented by the Duke of Connaught. At the same time Mr. Chamberlain was making his progress through South Africa, learning many things by actual contact with the people and the scenes of the late disastrous war. Throughout the year we have been learning how great the burden laid not only on that desolated country but (as is just) upon this country also, and how grave the problems to be solved in attempting the restoration of prosperity. Distress has been very great, and the questions of labour for the mines in the Transvaal, and whether the mine-owners or the people of the country are to rule, are matters of the gravest anxiety.

Macedonia.

The close of the year is burdened by the thought of the threatening war between Russia and Japan, and by what may arise from the Indian Government's armed mission to Tibet, while in the Near East we are oppressed by the horror of what has taken place in Macedonia. Once more ruthless massacres, and the miserable delays of ineffective diplomacy, and the shame of the remembrance that this country is very largely responsible for the making of so terrible a situation. Winter has brought a respite, and devoted workers from this and other countries are administering some measure of relief to the sufferers, towards which there have been generous gifts; but if a fresh scene of tragedy is not to open with the return of spring, the Great Powers must act. The closer and more cordial relations between Great Britain, France, and Italy which the year has brought, furnish ground for hope.

Education.

At home, the beginning of the year brought the Education Act of 1902 into force, and much good work has been done in the working out of county schemes. But the radical faults of the Act remain, and the opposition of Nonconformists to its injustice has been steadily and strenuously maintained. The movement of Passive Resistance is still in progress, and has assumed large proportions, and it is admitted by moderate men on both sides that a permanent settlement has by no means been arrived at. The London Bill was passed in the same spirit as that of 1902, but has yet to come into force. The prospect of conflict between dogmatic Churchmen and Nonconformists at the expense of the children, and of the true progress of education, is deeply to be regretted.

In the matter of temperance reform, while the claims of the trade have become more obtrusive, and the position of licensing justices is threatened, there has been a closing of the ranks, and determined opposition will be offered to any retrograde legislation.

For Ireland fresh hope was awakened by the passing of the Land Act, while the Royal visit also contributed to good feeling.

The Fiscal Controversy.

Meanwhile, new matter for acute controversy, introduced by Mr. Chamberlain's fiscal proposals, has largely monopolised public attention during the last few months. Of the prospect at the close of the year we have spoken in another column. The political situation has been unprecedented. Mr. Chamberlain resigned office, to be free to carry on his own determined propaganda, which the Government could not adopt; but his son, holding the same views, remained, and was made Chancellor of the Exchequer. At the same time prominent Free Traders in the Government also resigned, and the Prime Minister, whose opinions appeared to be in suspense, remained in a very curious position. When the Duke of Devonshire also resigned, the Government, which Lord Milner declined to join as Colonial Secretary, was largely reconstructed by the introduction of a number of untried men.

The new fiscal proposals, whether they are to make for greater prosperity at home, or greater Imperial unity, or both, have been met by the most determined opposition, not only of a united Liberal party, but of many of the most capable Unionists, of every living Chancellor of the Exchequer, except the Heresiarch's son, of the great majority of professors of economics and experts in finance, of the entire Liberal press, and such notable Unionist organs as the Spectator and the Standard, of every working-class leader and trade organisation. Nevertheless, the campaign is being pressed with the most intrepid energy, and with the help of very large resources, undaunted by any awkward facts or figures, and those who are convinced that the true welfare of their country, and the true ideal of Imperial unity and international concord are to be sought on other lines, must gird up all their strength to resist the onslaught.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.

The year has not been remarkable for any special movement in the ecclesiastical world, unless it be the conflict of the Republic of France with the religious orders, but there have been notable changes wrought by death. The aged Pope, Leo XIII., passed away, and has been succeeded by Cardinal Sarto, Patriarch of Venice, as Pius X.; while in England Cardinal Vaughan is gone, and his place as Archbishop of Westminster has been taken by Dr. Bourne, Bishop of Southwark. Dr. Temple, Archbishop of Canterbury, died in December, 1902; early in the present year Dr. Randall Davidson succeeded to the Primacy, his place as Bishop of Winchester being taken by Dr. Herbert Ryle, while Dr. Robertson, Principal of King's College, succeeded him as Bishop of Exeter. On the retirement of Dr. Moorhouse, Dr. E. A. Knox, the Suffragan Bishop of Coventry, became Bishop of Manchester, and there have been other episcopal changes. The Church of England suffered another great loss by the death of Dr. F. W. Farrar, Dean of Canterbury, to whom Dr. Wace succeeded. Among prominent Nonconformists death has not been so busy, but in these last days we have had to bid farewell to Dr. Brooke Herford, and the Congregational Union lost its secretary, the Rev. W. J. Woods, in whose place the Rev. J. A. Mitchell has been appointed. The retirement of Dr. John Brown, the biographer of Bunyan, from his ministry at Bedford was marked early in the year by warm demonstrations of honour and affection, as also more recently that of Dr. Maclaren, of Manchester. On the other hand, the Rev. R. J. Campbell has entered, with high promise, upon the ministry of the City Temple, and the Rev. C. Silvester Horne has taken up the Mission of the London Congregational Union at Whitefield's Tabernacle, in Tottenham Court-road. The year has been also marked by the opening of the fine Baptist Church House in Southampton-row. One of the last events of the year was the resignation by the Rev. C. E. Beeby of his living at Yardley Wood, near Birmingham, on account of the attitude taken up by the Bishop of Worcester towards an article he had written in the Hibbert Journal on the doctrine of the Virgin Birth.

Abroad.

In the spring, the trial of Mr. Gottfried Schwarz, of Heidelberg, editor of the Banner der Freiheit, on the charge of "insult" to the Roman Catholic Faith (in which some of our readers showed a practical interest), resulted in his acquittal by the Court at Mannheim, and he has since vigorously continued his polemic against Rome. In the autumn, at a meeting of German liberal theologians at Eisenach, of which Dr. Martin Rade, of Marburg, editor of the Christliche Welt, is the leading spirit, it was decided to form a definite organisation, and this has since been established, as the "Union of the Friends of the Christian World."

A notable event in Germany was the intervention of the Emperor in the Babel-Bibel controversy, and Harnack's reply to his letter to Admiral Hollmann, the Emperor approving much of the Assyriologist's work, but setting limits to his criticisms of the received ideas of revelation, and repudiating his denial of the divinity of Christ; while Harnack vindicated the scholar's liberty, and affirmed that the Pauline phrase, "God was in Christ" marked the limit to which definition should go.

Commemorations.

Among the celebrations of the year was that of the bicentenary of John Wesley's birth, the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Robertson of Brighton, and the 350th anniversary of the martyrdom of Servetus. This last was marked at Geneva by the erection of an "expiatory" monument, placed as near as possible to the site of the martyrdom, and unveiled, not on October 25, the actual day of the burning, but on All Saints' Day. "Grateful sons of Calvin," with the help and sympathy of liberals in other lands, thus testified to their abhorrence of his act, in the execution of Servetus, and their adherence to the principle of liberty of conscience.

Not as belonging to the churches only, but with a special significance for them, we may recall here also the celebration of the centenary of Emerson's birth, observed with much enthusiasm in New England, and with many tokens of gratitude and honour in this country.

Our Free Churches.

For our own churches the year has been one of distinct progress, while to its record belongs also the great pleasure and the stimulus of the second meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, held at Amsterdam in the first week of September. Under the presidency of Professor Oort, of Leiden, attended by a large contingent from America, and a still larger party from this country, and representatives from Germany, France, Belgium, Switzerland, Denmark, Hungary, India, and Japan, the meetings were of great interest and value, and their social aspect, with the abounding hospitality of our Dutch friends, most delightful. The proceedings were fully reported in the Inquirer at the time, and the volume of papers, which is being printed at Leiden, is to be issued before long.

The National Conference.

This year has seen the coming of age of the National Conference of "Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-subscribing or Kindred Congregations," which met for the first time in Liverpool in 1882, and held its eighth triennial meeting, April 21–24, in the same city, under the presidency of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter. Both the President and the Rev. Joseph Wood made suggestions as to the better organising of the work of our churches, which are still under consideration, and the conference was rendered notable also by two addresses, one by Dr. John Hunter on "A Worshipful Church," the other by the Rev. W. J. Jupp on "The Forgiveness of Sin and the Law of Reconciliation," both of which have since been separately published.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

A great stimulus was given early in the year to the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, by the offer through the president, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, of an anonymous annual subscription of £1,000, if a further £2,000 a year could be raised. Promises to that amount were quickly secured, and a scheme of new and enlarged work was published and is in course of being carried out. For the strengthening of missionary work abroad and at home, the more abundant support of old efforts, and the striking out of new paths, and a larger use of the press, in the publication of books and pamphlets, the Association has now ampler resources than ever before, and is diligently seeking to make full use of the great opportunity. Under the new scheme, theatre services have been held in London, Manchester, and Devonport, and Mr. Carpenter's new course of lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds-and of Experience," has been given at Nottingham, Lewisham, and Richmond, and other Sunday lectures at Cambridge, and the publication department has been also busy. The Whitsuntide meetings of the Association following closely on the Emerson Centenary, Mr. Augustine Birrell gave the Essex Hall lecture on "Emerson," since published. The preacher of the annual sermon was the Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D., of Ann Arbour. The autumn meeting of the Association was held at Manchester, to which the most valuable contribution was the paper by the Rev. Charles Peach on "City Churches," subsequently published in these columns.

Other Events.

The year opened with the unveiling of the Martineau Memorial in Little Portland-street Chapel, and in the same month, at the annual meeting of Manchester College, the Rev. L. P. Jacks was appointed Professor of Philosophy, in succession to the Rev. C. B. Upton, who became Professor Emeritus. At the June meeting of Trustees at Oxford warm recognition was made of the value of Mr. Upton's services to the college, and a presentation was made to him by his old students. Early in the year the Freedom of the City of Manchester was presented to Alderman Harry Rawson; in the autumn, a Unitarian minister, the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, was elected Mayor of Woolwich.

In London a new departure was made by the establishment in February of the Laymen's Club, and during the year the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties organised a valuable auxiliary to the Ministers' Pensions and Insurance Fund. Of Bazaars the chief have been that the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, which, with donations, secured £4,000; the Manchester Sunday-school Association Bazaar, which raised £1,000; and the Rawtenstall Jubilee Bazaar, which secured over £700.

The Manchester District Association has carried out its helpful scheme of monthly visits of the Governing Body to the Churches of the district, and the same work has been taken up by the North-East Lancashire Unitarian Mission. For the last quarter of the year, as in its first months, the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke has been the morning preacher at Little Portland-street Chapel. In the spring, the Belfast Domestic Mission celebrated its jubilee by a renovation and enlargement of premises. During the year the new Spears Memorial buildings were opened at Highgate, the new church at Birkenhead and at Merthyr Tydvil, a new hall at Blackpool, South Shore, a new chapel at Selby, an iron church at Garston, and another, "All Souls' Church," in the Finchley-road, Child's Hill. Bicentenaries have been celebrated at Rivington and Gorton.

Ministerial Changes.

During the year there have been many ministerial changes. Dr. G. Dawes Hicks resigned the pulpit of Unity Church, Islington, to devote himself to philosophical work; and Dr. Klein retired from the ministry of Ullet-road Church, Liverpool. The Rev. C. J. Street has removed from Bolton to Sheffield; the Rev. E. W. Lummis from Warrington to Leicester; the Rev. H. Rawlings from York to Denton; the Rev. W. Whitaker from Leicester to Cardiff; the Rev. A. Harvey from Gateshead to Northampton; the Rev. E. S. Hicks from Bolton to Islington, the Rev. C. Harvey Cook from Holbeck to Warrington; the Rev. J. Birks from Derby to Yarmouth; the Rev. S. H. Street from Great Hucklow to Bell-street Mission, Marylebone. The Rev. H. D. Roberts resigned his post as District Minister to the Liverpool Association, to join the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in the ministry of Hope-street Church; the Rev. J. Worsley Austin has succeeded the Rev. L. P. Jacks at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham. The Rev. F. B. Mott is to succeed the late Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved at Southport. The Rev. A. A. Charlesworth has resigned the pulpit of Newhall-hill, Birmingham, and is taking some months' rest abroad; the Rev. F. Allen has relinquished the work at Stamford-street, and the Rev. W. Wilson at Rhyll-street, Kentish Town; the Rev. E. Allen is retiring from active work at Walmsley. The Rev. W. J. Jupp has resigned the pulpit of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool, to enter with the New Year on the ministry of the Free Christian Church, Croydon; and the Rev. J. Collins Odgers has resigned at Bury, having accepted the pulpit of Ullet-road, Liverpool. This is not an exhaustive list of the year's changes, but it includes the chief of the new settlements.

Books.

The first place among the books of the year must be given to Mr. John Morley's "Life of William Ewart Gladstone"; and next we should name the final volumes of Mr. Charles Booth's great work on "Life and Labour in London," the volumes on Religious Influences, and the last volume of all, with its "Notes on Social Influences" and conclusion to the whole. Another notable book was Mr. F. W. H. Myers' posthumous work on "Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death." The year has also seen the completion, with the fourth volume, of the "Encyclopædia Biblica," the concluding volume of "Index and Epitome" of the great Dictionary of National Biography, and the first volumes of the "Cambridge Modern History."

A new volume, by Dr. Martineau, "National Duties and Other Sermons and Addresses," edited by Dr. Drummond, brought a great treasure to his old students in his Valedictory addresses, which were included. The "Life of Anna Swanwick" was another most welcome gift. Professor Jean Réville's lectures on "Liberal Protestantism," published in the spring, have just been issued in an English translation in Williams & Norgate's Crown Library, while earlier in the year the Rev. J. E. Carpenter's lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century" were published in a substantial volume, and a joint volume of "Studies in Theology" by him and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed also appeared. Other books in our immediate connection have been Dr. S. H. Mellone's "Converging Lines of Religious Thought," Dr. Warschauer's "Fourth Gospel," and Miss Marian Pritchard's "Job." With these may be mentioned the Rev. J. Hocart's recently published book, "Le Monachisme." Though not a book, we have been specially glad to welcome the beginning of a new series of "Home Pages," edited by Miss Helen Brooke Herford.

Among American books, of which there has been a rich harvest, we may mention the Rev. J. W. Chadwick's study of "Channing," a companion to his masterly "Theodore Parker," the volume of lectures on "Pioneers of Religious Liberty in America," and a considerable amount of Emerson literature.

Obituary.

Of the year's losses by death some have been already mentioned. To Pope Leo XIII., Cardinal Vaughan and Dean Farrar we must add Dr. Bradley, formerly Dean of Westminster, and the Rev. Ernest Fontanès, of Paris. Quite recently we recorded the death of Professor Mommsen, of Berlin. Among the greatest in this country were Lord Salisbury and Herbert Spencer. We have also lost Mr. W. H. Lecky, Mr. W. S. Caine, Mr. Quintin Hogg of the Polytechnic, Sir Joshua Fitch, and Lord Rowton; among artists, Mr. J. M. Whistler; of popular writers of fiction, Miss Bayly (Edna Lyall), W. E. Henley, H. Stowell Scott (Seton Merriman), and J. H. Shorthouse, the author of "John Inglesant."

From the roll of our ministers we have lost the Revs. T. W. Freckelton, Henry Solly, S. C. Pinkerton, T. B. Broadrick, C. H. Wellbeloved, James Hall, and Dr. Brooke Herford; of the bearers of well-known names in our community, S. G. Rathbone, C. W. Willmer, Edward Goldschmidt, A. Follet Osler, Major Bryan Johnson, Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, Miss Constance Bache, Sir Edwin Gaunt, Herbert Thomas, Lieut.-Col. Henry Turner, Alfred C. Osler, I. C. Thompson, and Sir John R. Robinson. The names, without any further comment, are rich in memories and incentive to many kinds of good work. They bid us go forward with courage and hopefulness, and keep a firm hold upon our work while for us it is still day. For the night cometh in which no man can work, and the calmness of that rest into which they have entered.

Love is our highest word, and the synonym of God. Emerson.

AN OBJECT LESSON.

A very interesting experiment in associated labour and profit sharing is that of the establishment founded by M. Godin at Guise, which is attracting attention from social reformers because of its great success. M. Godin began to build associated homes for his workpeople in 1859: at the present time there is accommodation for 2,000 people, and there are 6,000 members interested financially in the ironworks. Every workman shares in the profits, besides receiving better wages for shorter hours than are usual in France, and, by means of an insurance fund, an old-age pension, or allowance in case of breakdown in health is secured to everyone who has been employed for fifteen years or longer. On retiring £30 a year and, in addition, interest on accumulated capital (profits) which stand to his credit in the concern comes to each. Since M. Godin's death the workpeople have appointed their managers.

The Familistere at Guise provides tenements of two rooms of good proportions compared with ordinary workmen's dwellings, at a charge of 1s. 6d., 1s. 9d., 2s. a week, according to position in the four-story blocks. There are quadrangles, playgrounds, gardens, and park, baths, wash-houses, reading-room, galleries round the buildings, and recreation rooms, without charge beyond rent; and doctor, chemist, co-operative store and theatre are included in the Familistere, though dwellers there are at liberty to deal where they please. A remarkable feature is the nursery accommodation. Children up to four years of age may be left all or any part of the day to be taken care of, and are fed on the most suitable food and attended by competent persons, the cost being borne out of the profits of the factory. From four years of age to fourteen years all children must attend school. Parents are at liberty to send the children to any school they choose, but free education is provided for all who belong to the Familistere if they choose to avail themselves of it, and 1 per cent. of the profits of the foundry is reserved to send capable scholars to the university. Those who have thus been sent have, it is stated, returned in all cases to the service of the institution.

Two remarkable features should be specially noticed. From infancy the children are trained to understand and take their part in a co-operative community; hence their attachment to it, and their ability to work it successfully when they grow up. The active workers of to-day were brought up under the conditions established by M. Godin which we have briefly sketched. Also, physical inefficiency is provided against by the sufficient nourishment of the young children in the nurseries under adequate medical and nursing supervision; and M. Godin made an investigation of the amount of money requisite to provide the labourer with sufficient food to maintain the body in health and strength, and provided that every man employed should receive at least sufficient for this purpose. The good results of these provisions are shown in the stability of the concern and the well-being of its working members.

CHURCH RECORDS.

THE beginning of the year is the time for good resolutions, and for putting them at once into practice. The one that we wish to commend especially to secretaries of congregations costs half-a-crown, and for 4d. extra will be sent at once by post to any part of the country. It is a help for the proper management of a congregation, and a provision for its future historian. For the preparation of this "Record Book and Register of the Congregation" we are indebted to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie*; and whoever knows him is aware that he knows how business ought to be done. This is what he says in a brief note of preface:—

Experience in dealing with the business management of Congregations has shown the need that exists for a Record Book and Register such as is here provided. Confusion and worry will be saved, and efficiency promoted, by keeping a careful and convenient record of the chief provisions of the Trust Deed, the names and addresses of the trustees, with the dates of their appointment, and an inventory or statement of the property belonging to the congregation. Several pages are allotted to lists of ministers and officers of the congregation, with the dates of their appointment and resignation; to summaries of income and expenditure; to anniversaries and special collections; and to important dates and events in congregational history. Space is also given for a Register of the names and addresses of the members of the congregation.

Mr. Bowie is careful to add that, in addition to this Record book, the secretary must have a proper minute book, and the treasurer his cash book, suitable copies of which may also be got at Essex Hall; and there is a salutary note as to the annual budget of a congregation.

We need only add that the book, which is strongly bound, is of admirable quality as to the paper and in clearness of arrangement. There is ample space, and a great opportunity for the display of careful penmanship. Every secretary who makes good use of this book will win the gratitude not only of his present fellow-workers, but of those who come after him. Therefore we say, "Get it!"

THE members of the Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church at Capetown have decided to make an effort to secure a new church building. A site has already been obtained, but, unfortunately, the present church must first be sold before building operations can be begun; and as, owing to business conditions, property is at present falling in value, this may mean some delay. But a building fund has already been well started. The Literary Society has just concluded its winter session, one of its most successful lectures having been given by a universally respected Roman Catholic priest. A series of sermons by the minister, the Rev. R. Balmforth, on "The Bible, from the Standpoint of the Higher Criticism," will shortly be published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

THE Rev. H. S. Perris is entitled to hearty thanks for his care in compiling the statistics concerning our London churches from the Daily News census returns. No doubt many of us, in London at any rate, noted the figures as they appeared week by week; but it needed the services of some diligent brother thus to bring them together. The table forms a valuable contribution to history, and we shall all agree with Mr. Perris in thinking it worthy of very serious consideration.

In accepting the figures as practically beyond question for the particular days mentioned, it is still proper to ask, before discussing their significance, whether they represent normal conditions. I am not able to speak for all, or even a majority of cases; but the facts as to a considerable proportion of the churches visited are fairly within my knowledge, and this enables me to say that (1) there were few, if any, instances of specially favourable circumstances, such as would swell the numbers abnormally, and (2) there were some cases where the circumstances were distinctly unfavourable. Rainy weather, of course, ought not to make a difference; but it does. Several of our more important congregations were visited on Sundays peculiarly unfortunate in this respect. Others were visited before the usual depleting summer recess had really ended, and so suffered by holiday absences. Taking these facts into consideration, it occurs to me that the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed could probably supply a corrective to the figures yielded by a one-day count from the results of his own protracted inquiries as minister of the London District Unitarian Society. The returns obtained by him are not, I fear, quite perfect, and some have been made on the understanding that they are not to be published, but I think they cover a sufficient number of churches and extend over a sufficient time to enable him to give a trustworthy estimate of the average attendances in most of them, and thus in the aggregate. It would be interesting to hear from him on this point—not in detail, of course, but as to the broad features of the case.

We cannot, however, ignore the reflection pressed home by Mr. Perris. A few hundreds more or less—what are they to the vast population of London? Let us all ask ourselves very seriously whether we are content with this state of things. Mr. Perris draws attention to the fact that it is only in the zone of a comfortable residential population that we seem to have the power to secure anything like respectably numerous congregations. The terrible areas of hopelessness spread wide within this zone. Must we, dare we abandon them to their monotony of apathy and religious lifelessness? If any inquiry, such as he suggests, will stir us up to more zeal for these our forlorn brethren in "mean streets," then be it welcome a thousand-fold.

As to the efficacy of the policy of "inquiry by committee" I offer no comment. If it should seem to meet with approval in any marked degree, by all means let us thus inquire into the causes of so poverty-stricken a result as the table shows. "An impartial and weighty committee" could doubtless be nominated from our congregations, and assuredly those who for many years have been giving time and strength to the various London and national societies would only too gladly accept the help of all who might bring fresh wisdom and energy to the old, old problem. Perhaps I may be allowed to speak in some measure for such workers, though there are many who have far exceeded my own modest efforts in these things. If I know their mind, it is one of their troubles that our people have been too much disposed to look on the work as peculiarly an interest of the officials and committees to whom it has been very largely left, instead of being carried on with genuine popular support. Would that a revolution, stern and drastic, would break out, that all "old gangs" (to use a political phrase) might be cleared away and better men and measures be brought forward! To quote the seasonable poet, the "officials" to whom Mr. Perris refers may fitly say—

> Ring out, ring out, my mournful rhymes,
> But ring the fuller minstrel in.

The difficulty often is to suggest something quite immediate and practicable, but as a contribution toward so desirable an end, I would ask whether the Laymen's Club, which is already showing so much admirable enthusiasm, might not take hold of Mr. Perris's proposition and "work it for all it is worth." If anything is really to be done along such lines, our energetic friends in that Club will soon find out how. And meanwhile I venture to propose that every congregation should make a first duty in the New Year of considering these matters for itself. Whatever success may attend a "general inquiry" for London as a whole, I am persuaded that if a "particular local inquiry" were made in each of our thirty or forty centres a good deal of new thought and effort would be evoked. Let us ask whether we have organised our individual congregations so as to secure the maximum effect of influence for good in their respective neighbourhoods; whether our routine of worship is filled with the alert spirit which alone can redeem it from dulness and deadness; whether much we cherish (or pretend to) is not really antique enough to be antiquated; and whether by genuine co-operation one with another we cannot lift the whole life of the churches out of the rut in which things jog so sluggishly along. Are none ready and willing to give a little more, not of money merely, but of their time and thought and love, to make the most of Sunday's opportunity for themselves, their families, and their neighbours? "A little more, and how much it is!"

And if a "particular personal inquiry" were made by every individual who considers himself a Unitarian (or "equivalent"), and if as a result of such inquiry each one would make a start to-morrow, January 3, 1904, to mend the matter by being in his place before the first hymn is given out, we should soon be well on the way to a better state of things.

Mr. Perris did not suggest inquiring into the quality of our preaching. Doubtless, some interesting evidence could be given on this point. But he knows well enough that so long as the numbers are small the sermon, however good it be, has a very, very poor chance. And the laymen know—it can be no secret—that a full church helps the preacher immensely. I am free to confess that some of our sermons would take a very full church to make them glow with spiritual fire. But some of them, notably those on the first Sunday in the year—are ready to be made into real preaching, such as souls want all over the world, and even in the "hopeless areas" of London.

Try the experiment to-morrow, and if successful repeat it. If not wholly successful, repeat it till it is.

W. G. TARRANT.

TO MINISTERS AND OTHERS.

SIR,—Please allow me to say, with reference to my letter in your issue of December 19, that the number of applications for copies of Dr. Vance Smith's "The Prophets and their Interpreters" has been large, and that correspondents who have not so far heard from me shall do so as soon as a further supply of the book has been put into covers.

DENDY AGATE.

Dunham-road, Altrincham, Dec. 29.

THE Times of December 26, in a Christmas leader, after deploring the lack of peace and goodwill upon the education question amongst the different religious bodies, referred to the continued use of the Athanasian Creed in the following terms:—

Nor is it much credit to the preachers of peace and goodwill, that the dominant party in the Church should still maintain, almost as an article of faith, the compulsory use upon Christmas Day, of a formula that breathes the old intolerant spirit of a bygone age, when men naturally and sincerely held that those who disagreed with them on important Church doctrines would "perish everlastingly." To many a good Churchman, clerical or lay, the use of the Athanasian Creed must have struck a jarring note in the services of Christmas.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Accrington.—According to local custom a tea party and entertainment were held in the school on the evening of Christmas Day. The proceedings were opened by the singing of the Christmas hymn composed by the late Rev. William Mitchell. The Rev. W. H. Burgess presided over a goodly gathering, and the evening was greatly enjoyed. On Sunday evening Mr. Burgess called attention to our weekly and monthly denominational papers, pointing out their value, and indicating the New Year as a good time to begin to take them.

Birmingham: Fazeley-street Mission.—At the recent annual meeting of this Mission held in the congregational room of the Church of the Messiah, Mr. T. H. Russell, president, in the chair, a very satisfactory report of the year's work was presented by the committee, and by the Rev. T. Pipe, the missionary. The committee's report, which was read by Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, hon. sec., stated that during the year an opportunity of purchasing the freehold of the Mission premises occurred, and the committee were able to secure it on favourable terms. Of the purchase price of £410, a balance of £110 had still to be raised. An important question with regard to the future development of the work of the Mission had come before the committee in connection with a very liberal offer from Mr. Arthur Chamberlain, who wrote, "If the committee of the Fazeley-street Mission would put Mr. Pipe in possession of larger (much larger) buildings, and would provide him the assistance of a second missionary, either man or woman, I would give £1,000 to the building fund, and an additional subscription of £100 a year towards the expenses of the second missionary. Mr. Pipe is the most successful man at his work I have ever known, and I believe that if he could have an assistant while he is still in full vigour, he would be likely to put the Mission on a permanent basis, as well as to handle more completely the vast amount of work that is waiting to be done in his immediate neighbourhood." The committee had approached the question from the side of finding a person competent to act as an assistant to Mr. Pipe, and up to the present they had not been successful. Whether any use was made of this magnificent opportunity depended on the interest shown by the general body of subscribers.

Bolton: Bank-street (Appointment).—The Rev. J. H. Weatherall, M.A., of Carmarthen, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the pastorate of Bank-street Chapel, vacated by the recent removal of the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., to Sheffield.

Bury.—The Rev. J. Collins Odgers preached his farewell sermons at Bank-street Chapel last Sunday prior to his removal to Ullet-road Church, Liverpool, and on the following evening a farewell meeting of the congregation was held, at which presentations were made to Mr. and Mrs. Odgers. There was a large attendance, and Alderman Thomas Holt, who presided, said that whereas good-byes were sometimes sad and did not leave pleasant remembrances, on that occasion it was different. Mr. and Mrs. Odgers had worked among them for nearly nine years, and during the whole of that time they had been kind and gentle, and had made many friends both within and without the congregation, and all they had done left happiness and pleasant remembrances. He spoke of the respect in which Mr. Odgers was held, and on behalf of the congregation presented him with a purse containing £120. Mr. William Stephenson, one of the Sunday-school superintendents, referred to the work of Mr. and Mrs. Odgers in connection with the Sunday-school, and on behalf of the Sunday school he presented each of them with a gold medal (inscribed) as a souvenir. Mr. J. W. Barlow, on behalf of the girls' adult class, presented Mrs. Odgers (who had been their teacher) with a handsome silver-mounted salad bowl and spoons. Mr. and Mrs. Odgers both acknowledged the gifts, the former referring to a watch which he constantly wore, and which had been presented to him by that congregation on a former occasion thirty years ago.

Derby.—The annual Christmas gathering of the children was greatly enjoyed last Saturday. During the evening the Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, the newly appointed minister, gave a brief and interesting address.

Dudley.—The Rev. Geo. St. Clair concluded his temporary pastorate at the Old Meeting House on Sunday evening, December 20. There was a large congregation, and at the conclusion of the service a presentation was made of a purse of gold. Councillor Geo. Bean, on behalf of the congregation, expressed the highest appreciation of Mr. St. Clair's preaching, his stores of knowledge, and his pastoral work. They all regretted that the time had come for parting, and every member of the congregation had contributed something to the testimonial. Councillor G. F. Thompson said he echoed all Mr. Bean's words, and he hoped that in Mr. St. Clair's successor they would have a minister whose sermons would be as high in tone and purpose. Councillors E. C. Theedam and E. J. Thompson added their testimony and their good wishes for the future.

Flowery Field, Hyde.—On Saturday and Sunday, December 19 and 20, the congregation of this church celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of the opening of their present building, which was presented to them by the late Mr. Thomas Ashton in 1878, the congregation having been formed in 1831. On Saturday upwards of 200 members and friends (including many old members from various parts of the country) sat down to tea; at 6 o'clock a dramatic and musical entertainment was given; and at 7 the chair was taken by Mr. T. Gair Ashton, M.P., who reviewed the past and spoke encouragingly of the future. Speeches, mostly of a reminiscent character, were given by the Revs. T. R. Elliot and J. Kertain Smith, former ministers of the church. Alderman J. Oldham spoke on behalf of the Gee Cross (Hyde Chapel) congregation. A feature of the evening was the presentation of a walking stick and an armchair to the church keeper, Mr. A. Slater, as a recognition of his faithful services. The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Gair Ashton and to his mother, Mrs. Ashton, who was also present. This was seconded by the Town Clerk of Hyde, Mr. Thomas Brownson, a member of the Congregational body. Letters of goodwill and congratulation were received from members of various other denominations who were unable to be present. The special preachers on Sunday were the Rev. J. Kertain Smith, who was the minister of the church at the time of the opening of the new building, and the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, and on both occasions there was a very large attendance. On the previous Sundays during November and December the Rev. W. L. Tucker had given a series of doctrinal lectures, when literature bearing on the subjects was distributed.

Gloucester.—In the course of his sermon on Sunday evening, Rev. Walter Lloyd referred in feeling terms to the death of the Rev. Dr. Brooke Herford. "Dr. Herford's life," said Mr. Lloyd, "was not only a useful, but a beautiful and inspiring one."

London: Forest Gate.—The half-session of the Literary and Social Union was pleasantly closed by a Christmas party. At the last moment Mr. Perris was surprised by a gift of Morley's "Life of Gladstone," made on behalf of the congregation by Mr. White, chairman of the committee, who spoke briefly but emphatically of the great services rendered by Mr. Perris in stimulating the members and congregation to higher thinking, and a more spiritual life, in introducing to them the best from the great intellects of all ages. After mentioning the spirit of unity and friendship that existed, the speaker said that the presentation was a spontaneous act on the part of the congregation as a slight token of esteem and affection for their minister.

London: Limehouse Mission.—The Missionary's Poor's Purse at Durning Hall is a very large one, but it is built on a new plan; he takes care of the people's money, and when they are needy he gives them back their own. Elsa-street, where the Hall stands, is long and narrow, and the houses are small, yet over 1,000 souls dwell there; alms-giving in this neighbourhood would be a sorry task, and far more difficult than the present efforts in thrift, as the following statements will show:—The women of the mother's meeting have purchased goods, for making up into clothing, amounting to £37 11s. 6½d., and bought £15 4s. of penny postage stamps for transfer to the Post Office Savings Bank. Post Office Savings Bank account for the year, £192 12s. 2d.; Christian Life Guild 1d. a week subscription, £2 3s.; Durning Hall Provident Association and Loan Society, paid out £1,418 10s. 1½d.; turnover for the year, £2,353 14s. 4d. The contribution is 6d. per week per share; dividend on the share, 1s. 6d. Fifteen years ago Elsa-street was classed as one of the worst streets in East London (not criminal), and to-day it is not a Paradise, yet the cloud that broods over it is lifting, and there is material well worth the labour bestowed upon it. Much has been done for betterment that cannot be spoken of here.

London: Stratford.—On Christmas morning service was conducted by the Rev. Frederic Allen. The usual collection was taken on behalf of Winifred House Young Days Cot Fund.

Maidstone.—A very pleasing incident took place at East-street Chapel on Sunday evening, when, at the close of the service, a presentation was made to the Rev. S. S. Brettell by members of the choir and guild. Mr. Brettell, who was quite taken by surprise, feelingly acknowledged the gifts.

Manchester: Lower Mosley-street.—A special service is to be held to-morrow (Sunday) evening, in memory of Dr. Brooke Herford, conducted by the Rev. A Cobden Smith.

Stockport.—At the annual party on Christmas Day, the entertainment included a rendering of Aunt Amy's "Princess May and her Wonderful Lamp" by the children, and other pieces by the seniors. The evening was thoroughly enjoyed.

In one of Dr. J. M. Whiton's communications to the Daily News on "Religious Life in America," there was a reference to women as ministers. Having referred to an application for ordination as a Congregational minister in Western New York, Dr. Whiton added:—

A glance at the Congregational Year Book for 1903, taken at random and without exhaustive scrutiny, shows twenty women officiating as ministers of Congregational churches in a dozen States, two of them in New England, the rest beyond the Mississippi. These are without exception ministers of small churches, averaging about forty communicants. Except in Colorado, where there are five such, the few States in which women have the right of suffrage do not seem to be more liberally supplied with women preachers than the others. Much more frequently the names of women appear in the list of church clerks and Sunday-school superintendents. In the so-called "Liberal Christian" churches, i.e., Unitarian and Universalist, the pastoral charge is very often in the hands of women, some of them gifted preachers.

The instruction is thorough and practical, and includes artificial and natural incubation and rearing for stock and table; the working of trap nests, scratching sheds, and brooder houses, the management of stock birds, egg production, the day-old chick trade, &c. Pupils are also taught carpentering, metal work, and drawing for making buildings and appliances. Gardening, bee-keeping, dairy work, and pig-keeping can be added if desired. The farm is beautifully situated on high ground in view of the South Downs. Inspection invited.—JOHN TREVOR, Horsted Keynes, Sussex.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE news of the death on Thursday of Mr. Harry Rawson, J.P., of Manchester, has reached us too late for more, at the moment, than this brief word of record. So a life lived to the full measure of four score years is ended, rich in honourable service, in public honour, and in private affection. In the fellowship of our churches he was one of the first of men. To him for patient and devoted services through a long course of years we owe more than can be easily expressed. He has not long survived his friend, Brooke Herford. They two were closely knit, as brothers in affection, and in loyalty to the common cause to which their lives were given. Unitarians to the bone, for years in Manchester, as minister and layman, worshipping together in the same church, notable citizens of the same city, now citizens together in the great communion, veiled from us by the Heavenly Light.

THE tercentenary of the birth of the Rev. Robert Bathe, M.A., the ejected vicar of Rochdale, and founder of the first Nonconformist church in the town, now represented by the Blackwater-street congregation, is to be celebrated on Saturday next (Jan. 16), when the Mayor of Rochdale will preside at the unveiling of a memorial tablet, erected in the church by Mr. Richard Heape. On the following day (Sunday, Jan. 17) special services will be held, the preachers being in the morning the Rev. Alexander Gordon, Principal of the Home Missionary College, and in the evening the Rev. T. P. Spedding, minister of the church. The Monthly Messenger of this month contains a full and extremely interesting account of Robert Bathe (1604—1674).

WELCOME to the first number of the Provincial Assembly Messenger of London and the South-Eastern Counties. This new penny monthly embodies our old friend the Seed-Sower, and clothes it with the special Messenger pages of the Assembly, making twenty-four pages in all. Its aim is to be a medium of communication between the committee of the Assembly and the constituent churches for business purposes and to strengthen the fellowship in common life and work. Portraits of Dr. Martineau, Dr. Sadler, Dr. Drummond, and Mr. Carpenter, who were among the founders of the Assembly in 1889, appear upon the cover. Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, the first president, sends the following message :—

I wish a warm welcome and a wide circulation for the Assembly Messenger Magazine. May it realise the high aims of its promoters, and be a monthly stimulus to its readers. As one who has known the Assembly from the beginning, and believed in it all along, I wish all success to your enterprise.

A letter from Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, is rich in helpful counsel, of which the concluding passage is as follows :—

But, above all, the Messenger, if it interpret truly what the Spirit saith, will cultivate a simple and holy life of faithfulness and love. It will promote the widest charity between man and man, and the earnest fulfilment of every civic and social duty. It will wave no sectarian flag, nor try to multiply the strife of tongues, but will aim at the brotherhood of man, charging its readers to co-operate wherever they can, and to separate only when they must. We need a fellowship of the holy life, resting on the pure and large humanity of the Son of Man, and dedicated in his spirit to the lowly and loving service of the world. May the Messenger go forth strong in the Spirit of the Lord, and bring glad tidings to many waiting hearts.

The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter also offers good wishes and encouragement to the new venture :—

Never was there a time when we needed more earnest worship or more steadfast work. We are called to truthfulness in speech, and to strenuousness in thought. We are face to face with great issues of religious duty. Vast problems rise before us. How can we make our Christian profession real? What does discipleship to Jesus require of us in the midst of our complicated industrial civilisation? How can we carry the spirit of the Gospel effectively into our common life? Would that our Churches might ask such questions with a serious purpose to find answers to them. The battle with worldliness has not begun to-day. But in our isolation, far apart from one another, we feel its stress more keenly. Bid your Messenger show us that we, too, have our place in the fight; bid him make it clear that our churches will be strong and vigorous just as they seek the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, with singleness of heart, and an untiring resolve; then we shall welcome his advent, and take courage for new endeavours. "A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a great nation."

THE Education Act has been heavily hit in the January number of the Nineteenth Century and After. This contains two remarkable articles, one on "Educational Concordats" by the Bishop of St. Asaph the other, entitled "How long will the Education Act last?" by Mr. Lathbury, the editor of the Pilot. Both of these writers are representative of the more reasonable Anglicanism of our day, and both appear to take it for granted that the Education Act in its present form is already doomed. The question with them seems to be not so much "Shall we surrender?" as "Surrender being inevitable, what are the best terms we can secure?" The Bishop of St. Asaph states the Nonconformist grievances with great force and much candour. What he regards as the "greatest grievance of all" arises from the lack of adequate public control. After showing that the contribution to the Voluntary schools from public funds was in 1869 37·7 of the total cost of maintenance, and will in the present year be 90 per cent., he adds, "It must be at once granted in the face of these facts that the control cannot remain where it was in 1869. He then states the case for the Voluntary Schools, and advocates a compromise on the lines of the Welsh concordat which the Anglicans refused to accept.

Mr. Lathbury considers that the minimum demand of the Nonconformists is that expressed by Dr. Horton—(1) That all schools maintained by public money must be absolutely under public control; (2) that in all schools maintained by public money all teachers must be appointed by public authority, without reference to denominational distinction. These demands he would at once grant lest a worse thing happen.

The prudent course, therefore, is to accept these conditions frankly and fully. Churchmen should say in effect: "We resign all claim to the control of the secular education in our own schools. The management of the schools and the appointment of teachers shall be wholly in your hands; you shall have the use of the school buildings during school hours on any terms that may be adjudged fair. These are the concessions we are willing to make, and in return for them we ask that all denominations—including the Undenomina-tionalists—shall have the statutory right of providing and paying teachers to give religious instruction in school hours to the children of their own members."

It is something to find Anglicans giving up the hollow farce of pretending that Nonconformists have no grievances. Until these grievances are understood and acknowledged there can be no way out of the controversy except the way of a stern trial of strength.

A RECENT number of L'Européen of Paris contains an interesting table illustrating the growth of international arbitration. Of the 240 cases submitted since 1840, more than half (125) belong to the last thirteen years, more than a quarter (63) to the last three. Forty-four instances occurred during the thirty years preceding the Franco-German war, 133 in the succeeding thirty years. Inter-parliamentary visits are now being arranged between Norway and Sweden, on the understanding that the feasting and fete-ing be kept within reasonable limits.

THE same journal presents its readers with an interesting and truly alarming estimate of the wealth of "the Standard Oil people." It is calculated that the John D. Rockefeller group, now the richest in the world, is "worth" £240,000,000, which is £50,000,000 more than the total money left by will in France during 1902, and only £50,000,000 less than that similarly bequeathed during the same period in England. Of this sum J. D. Rockefeller alone holds not less than £120,000,000.

THIS fact and those of the preceding paragraph stand in striking contrast. There can be no doubt that the enormous accumulations of invested wealth in the hands of such groups as those of the Rockefellers and the Rothschilds, to mention only two among many, represent a power which is continually menacing the peace as well as the progress of the world. The public history of the Standard Oil Company has had its parallel on larger fields. This power of the hoards of accumulated private capital can only be kept in check by the constant co-operation and vigilance of the true representatives of the peoples.

AN Employment Bureau such as that which has just been instituted at Manchester by the Corporation may prove a boon to the unemployed at a trifling expense. During four hours after the opening of the "City of Manchester Employment Registry" 287 men entered their names, and a crowd of fresh applicants, more than could be dealt with, has come on following mornings. In four days 821 names were entered, and 150 were still waiting at closing time. Each is required to fill up a form stating qualifications, previous employment, cause and date of leaving work, nature of work desired, and other particulars. The officials are thus enabled to make inquiries as to character, &c., and to send to employers requiring workmen those most likely to suit them. Among the applicants are many capable men, as well as those of depressed vitality and physique. Very few of the "loafing" class appear.

THE Corporation Employment Registry will furnish a more complete and accurate means of calculating the number and character of the unemployed than has hitherto existed; and it is already urged that, seeing there is a large number of strong and capable men of satisfactory character out of work, the City authorities should set some of them to labour on useful public work which needs to be done, such as the laying out of Heaton Park. It is certain that till there is an improvement in trade, the Bureau can be the means of finding employers for only a small proportion of those at present seeking it. Even so, it will save time and be of service to both master and man, while showing more accurately the extent of the difficulty which has to be faced.

THE growth and the achievements of the Garden City Association abundantly justify the high spirits manifested in its latest report. The outstanding feature of the year is, of course, the formation of the first garden city company, the securing of a site, and the widespread desire of manufacturers and others to be among the earliest citizens when the town shall be actually built. Beside this, it seems almost a small thing that Mr. Howard's slender volume should have had so quick a result in the founding of the Association; or that the membership, which in 1901 was only 325, should now have reached 2,500. Mr. Howard's fruitful suggestions have indeed met with a magnificent response.

AT the same time, it must be pointed out that even in the greatness of its success the Association finds an element of danger. It must not be supposed that because a company has been formed and a city is to be built, that, therefore, the work of the Association is finished or is in any way less necessary. This is not an end, but a beginning. The aim is not exhausted in providing one healthy or beautiful dwelling-place, for it is nothing less than to permeate English, or, indeed, more than English society with beauty and strength. The work of the builder is not a substitute for that of the dreamer. It is true that the shareholders in the company are largely the members of the Association: as shareholders they are practical men, as members they are idealists. But although a city needs to rest on a material foundation, it is also necessary that it should have an ideal to rise to. The Garden City Association stands for this ideal in civic life, and it is to be hoped that now more than ever its numbers will continue to increase, its finances to be adequate, and its work to prosper. Our readers can help by subscriptions or by arranging for the lectures which the members are always prepared to deliver. The offices are at 345, Birkbeck Bank Chambers, Holborn, W.C.

THE January Quarterly Meetings of the Methodist New Connexion will be requested to answer the following questions:—(1) Do you approve of union with the Bible Christians and the United Methodist Free Churches, or other Methodist Church if found practicable? (2) Do you approve of an effort being made forthwith, by duly appointed representatives, with representatives of other Churches, to draft a constitution, such constitution to be afterwards submitted to the Quarterly Meetings and the Conference?

No one can read the Methodist newspaper and periodicals without perceiving that two phenomena of the religious, or rather of the sectarian, world give rise to anxious thought in Methodist circles: the long-lived and still increasing vigour of the Ritualists, who audaciously maintain that "the Holy Ghost does not make his home with any Dissenting sect"; and the scepticism which doubts whether there be any Holy Ghost; whether claims to special authority by the churches of to-day, and references to miraculous stories in the sacred writings are not equally futile. In reply, the claims of the Word are once more earnestly defended, and the assumptions of the would-be lords of the conscience as manfully repelled. But the position of the Evangelical is difficult to hold. The monstrous claims of the priests can hardly be denied without claiming an authority for the natural conscience of man inconsistent with claims that are continually urged for the Bible; and, meanwhile, Evangelicalism, even in a comparatively simplified form, must appeal to authority if it is to maintain its ground in days when every page of the Bible suggests fresh doubts and difficulties.

A SET of books that will do far more thoroughly the work attempted by the Present Day Tracts of the R.T.S. is still needed. But many positions contended for in those tracts would have to be abandoned. Others must be more strongly held. The question is no longer whether Moses wrote the Pentateuch; it is, What may be found in those books worth reading and heeding? Ever so clever a proof of the bodily resurrection of Christ will leave the average reader unconvinced. But might he not be convinced of the good sense and the practical nature of Christ's teaching, as well as the beauty of his example? If Christ were believed in really, bibliolatry and priestcraft would fall together.

STUDENTS and ministers, and not they alone, will find excellent reading and stimulus for New Year's resolutions in the address of the Rev. L. P. Jacks, on "The Strenuous Life in Relation to the Study of Philosophy," delivered at the opening of the present session of Manchester College, and now published by Messrs. H. Rawson & Co., of Manchester. We wish that the name of an Oxford bookseller, also, could have been on the cover, and that the address might be widespread and taken to heart in the University.

A LETTER on "Attendances at our London Churches," from the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, we shall publish next week.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from E. S. L. B., E. G., E. H., J. R; H., M. H. (Halle), J. M. M., C. E. P., V; P. W;

SOCIAL ECONOMICS.

WORK IN THE PARISH.—III.

WHEN the visitor finds that the natural resources of a family have all failed, or are insufficient for the purpose, it is then that he turns to the committee of which we have spoken for advice and funds. It is of inestimable value in our work to get new lights upon the case at which we have been working in vain; the wider experience or greater ingenuity of other minds will often hit upon a hopeful feature which had escaped our notice, or strike out a new remedy which had not occurred to us. Indeed, it is in making plans and suggestions that the use of a committee lies, even more than in providing funds; and it constantly happens that it is just for lack of this power to make plans that our families have fallen into difficulties.

Forms of Help.

Certain forms of help suggest themselves readily. There is the convalescent home for the patient recovering from illness, needing more care than is always bestowed in the selection of the right place. Where a vacancy in a Home is not available it will be seldom that some member of committee cannot suggest a country village where the patient can be boarded under suitable conditions.

A sadly frequent need in towns is the surgical instrument, and the visitor's services can hardly be more valuable than in promoting such better care of the little ones as may prevent the need of these in future. But when the need is there the cost is often more than parents can afford, at any rate for the first time, and it is probable that a considerable portion of the committee's work will lie in providing surgical boots, spinal jackets, and such like dreary substitutes for strength and health. But the visitor's work will not be ended when the instrument is provided; she will have to ensure that it is properly worn and renewed, and that at least some provision is made towards its renewal.

Care of the Aged.

The care of the old is a perennial claim upon us, and though it should seldom, if ever, be necessary in a well-managed parish to provide the total maintenance of an old person, yet it may well happen that sometimes another shilling or two a week to supplement the help of children and friends will make all the difference between poverty and modest comfort. It will be the duty of the visitor to ensure that the help thus given does not diminish what is already coming in, and that will best be done by establishing friendly relations with the other contributors. It may prove wise for her actually to collect the contributions made by distant sons and daughters, or by old employers or friends, and to serve as almoner to the recipient. Whatever the source of the income, it should if possible come to the pensioner weekly; otherwise there will be a difficulty in making it meet the weekly needs. Moreover, the weekly payment will ensure the weekly visit, which is so necessary both to bring some change and cheerfulness into a solitary life, and to ascertain whether increasing infirmities do not call for increased assistance in some form or another.

Such are some of the simpler forms of help, which are of frequent occurrence. But the visitor will come across more special needs, which will require different treatment in every case, and cannot, therefore, be foreseen. But to illustrate the adaptability and elasticity of treatment which will be required I will quote a few cases dealt with by the committee of the C.O.S. in London.

A Case of Special Need.

Number 1 is a labourer, W. S., who has suffered since he was 15 from lupus, and latterly has been very irregular in his work, having to attend the London Hospital. For the week in which he came under the committee's notice he had done no work, and before that had been earning only 10s. The wife could not leave the baby to go to work, and there were two other children. They had only one room at 3s. rent, and were 30s. in debt to the landlord, who, however, did not press, "knowing their principle." The grandmother was keeping the eldest child; and when the visitor called on the 5th, the brother had sent in some bread, which the children were eating dry, the parents going without. The man bore an excellent character from his employer. What had the Church done for the family? The Church knew them, and had recognised its responsibility, for it had given them a ticket. (Oh, those tickets; if they could only be made illegal. They make it so easy to salve our consciences and "relieve" our own feelings by the mere pretence of relief to the poor.) When the circumstances were reported to the committee, the visitor was instructed to make up the income to 15s. a week, and arrangements were made with the hospital for special treatment to be begun at once, the Samaritan fund of the hospital paying the man's fares to and fro.

Effectual Help.

The second case I shall quote required more planning. It was that of a most respectable family with a good home; the father was earning 32s. a week, and was much respected at his place of work and devoted to his family—four daughters, of whom one earned 4s. a week. Unfortunately he had an extremely foolish and injudicious wife, who, though fond of the children, had so spoiled them that the eldest girl was on the borders of insanity. She was refined and clever, but at fourteen had St. Vitus' dance, and had since been subject to all sorts of nervous complaints, and a great expense in doctors and medicine. The doctor's report was that she was highly neurotic and sensitive, and having been hopelessly spoilt in early days, had developed an extreme degree of hysteria. Unless removed from her mother and placed under firm control, she would probably have to be placed in a lunatic asylum. It was very difficult to know what to do here. The ordinary convalescent home would not take the girl, and could not have exercised the necessary control. At last a small home was found, managed by a lady who was willing to undertake the attempt to cure her, partly by help of a course of gardening. The cost would be 15s. a week, of which the father undertook to pay 7s. 6d. a week, and the local charity trustees 3s. 9d. So the girl was taken into the country by her father, equipped with thick boots, short skirts, and aprons. Three months' fresh air, regular discipline, and firm control worked wonders, but even then it was thought unsafe to bring her back to her mother's influence. So it was arranged for her to stay on, to continue her training, and, if possible, take a situation as gardener without returning to London. She loves the work, and her father rejoices in her prospects.

Fruits of Inquiry.

The third case I shall quote is an illustration of what we often find in our work, that our inquiries, so far from injuring our applicants, frequently result in immediate benefit to them. In this case the father of the family, a carpenter, was incapacitated from work by failing eyesight and an internal complaint. The two eldest sons, aged 18 and 15, were hopeless cripples, and there were three younger children. The wife was earning about 11s. by steel-covering and cleaning, and two of the younger boys were at a school which provided one of them with clothing. We were asked to visit the family by the Congregational Mission, and found that the Ragged School Union was also visiting. As the first result of our inquiries one of the people seen promised the wife regular work from 6.30 to 9 a.m,, for which she would receive 7s. and a good meal each day, and which she could do in addition to her other work. A brother, who was also seen, promised to give her a shilling a week. Attention was then concentrated upon the crippled boys, but amongst all the institutions in London none could be found to do anything for them, owing to their increasing weakness and helplessness. Finally our visitor undertook to teach them fine needlework, their hands being too feeble for any occupations requiring strength, and a few weeks ago I was able to pay them for a piece of needlework of wonderful fineness and neatness. Moreover the sewing hour is made delightful to them by the reading of books of travel and adventure.

Against Consumption.

The next case illustrates the effort that is now being made to check the ravages of consumption in our towns. There is no doubt that many young lives could be saved, if they could be taken in hand in time. F. B., a lad of nineteen, was a carpenter living with his parents. when he developed incipient phthisis. The family was found to be respectable, but rather rough, and living in an untidy home. F. slept in a bed with two younger brothers in the kitchen, although there was an empty room to spare, which was sometimes used by the father as a workshop in his leisure moments. The doctor ordered open air treatment; but it was necessary to wait until a vacancy could be found in a Sanatorium. While waiting the visitor persuaded the mother to put the lad in a room by himself, and explained the importance of open windows and plenty of fresh air. Finally he was sent into the country pending his admission to the Sanatorium, his father paying 2s. 6d. a week towards his maintenance, and his employer promising to take him back when cured.

Husbanding Resources.

Now I think I hear someone saying that work of this kind costs much money, and where is it to come from? Well, it does cost a good deal of money; but we are apt to think little of that because it is so much easier to get than the skilful visitor without whom money is worse than useless. And then it must be remembered that a parish ordered as I have suggested will have abandoned the futile scattering of tickets and shillings, and will be able to concentrate its resources on really constructive work. It will have abandoned also the policy expressed (and expressed so frequently) by saying, "I had rather help ninety-nine undeserving cases than overlook one deserving." I am sure the people who say this think they have said something rather fine; there is always a ring of complacency about it. But perhaps there never was a saying which, when you come to consider it, more surely indicates laziness and futility. Why should you go through the farce of helping "ninety-nine undeserving cases" in order to get at the one deserving? Because you are too lazy to do your work properly, and find out who needs your help and who needs far more to be let alone by your mischievous almsgiving. And again, what have you left for your one "deserving case" after going through with the ninety-nine? If, as is likely, you are one of the people who think a shilling munificent, then the £4 19s. which you have given to encourage idleness and drink and imposture are practically stolen from the one whose needs you maintain to be "deserving" of help, but will certainly not be helped by you and your shilling.

But however wisely we husband our resources it will still be necessary to "raise money," and I hope to conclude my suggestions for work in the parish by suggestions as to how the money should be obtained for carrying on that work.

A SONNET FOR THE NEW YEAR.

WHAT master-passion should possess man's soul
To make his days magnanimous and strong,
Free with the gladness of triumphant song,
Yet wise and patient, with a self-control
Whose secret is the vision of that goal
Prophetically given? We know that wrong
And tyranny have held mankind too long:
What passion then can move and save the whole?

The passion of self-sacrifice—the gift
Of forceful purpose and quick ministry,
The keen delight of noble brotherhood;
The sacred impulse of the great and good,
Large-hearted, human Christ, so pure and swift
To act: and in this passion man is strong and free.

ROBERT COLLYER'S EIGHTY YEARS.

THE Christian Register of Dec. 3 published, as a special supplement, a wonderfully vivid and delightful portrait of Robert Collyer, who on the following Tuesday, Dec. 8, was 80 years of age. The anniversary was celebrated at the Church of the Messiah, New York, of which he still shares the ministry with the Rev. M. J. Savage, and the proceedings of that evening in the crowded church are fully reported in the Register of Dec. 17.

For an hour Mr. Collyer, with Dr. and Mrs. Savage, received the guests amid a wonderful display of flowers, and then the meeting was held in the church, where Mr. Collyer sat in the pulpit, "enshrined among the heather and roses." Messages came from far and near; one from Yorkshire, at which "Mr. Collyer's eyes gleamed, for his faithful heart echoed the call." Senator Hoar telegraphed from the Senate Chamber at Washington. Mr. Wendte, in a letter, recalled how they two had worked together through the dreary winter after the Chicago fire, when Mr. Collyer never lost heart or courage, though his personal loss had been great. There were also letters from Dr. Edward Everett Hale, Mr. Calthrop, and Mr. Rush R. Shippen, who called Mr. Collyer "the Robert Burns of the pulpit, whose songs ring in many hearts."

After the reading of the letters the first address was given by Mr. E. C. Stedman, who spoke touchingly of the first time he saw Robert Collyer. He thought then that he was too big and strong to be tender: but, when he saw him smile, he feared that he was too tender to be wise. As time passed he learned to know that he could be both tender and wise in deep, true measure. He spoke of once being in sore trouble, and of going to a club of which Mr. Collyer was an honoured member. There sat the strong man, calm and serene. Almost it seemed as if a rainbow circled the snowy head. Suddenly the sorrow lightened, and the words, "God's in his heaven, all's right with the world," bore a new significance. Yet Robert Collyer had spoken no word, and had not known the other's sad need.

Mr. Stedman also spoke of the power and style and the rare use of old Saxon words seldom heard but from Robert Collyer's lips and pen. Those words were full of melody and sweetness, and would be long remembered.

The Rev. George Batchelor and the Rev. T. C. Slicer followed, and then the Rev. J. W. Chadwick, who gave an address and then read a poem. He recalled the remark of Dr. Bellows after first hearing Collyer preach: "Why, this is not oratory: it is oratorio, full of help and cheer and joy."

The Rev. T. C. Williams also read a poem, which contained these lines:—

How oft God's anvils at thy stroke have rung!
How oft the Saxon courage of thy tongue
Hath bade thy comrades in life's roaring flame
Forge steel of temper true! How Freedom's name
Thou hast defended, stalwart blow on blow!
Our Saxon freedom! which men only know
When conscience is awake: which may not be
By scream of mobs achieved, but which like thee,
True men may ever win, if brain and thew
Press to perfect each task, then climb to do Tasks nobler as life widens, even until Kindly of heart, impregnable in will,
With all well-proven craftsmen hand in hand,
One liberated brotherhood they stand!

The Rev. J. Cuckson followed, and then Dr. Savage, with speech and poem. Of the close of the meeting the reporter, "H. T. C.," tells in touching words.

The Reporter's Tribute.

Then the patriarch of the occasion arose, and the people rose with him. Through eyes made dim by loving tears he looked at his friends. He tried to belittle the words of praise by merry jest, but the great heart was too full. His presence was a benediction, and hardly needed the sacred words of farewell and blessing to add to the force of the noble personality.

And now very humbly the reporter lays one other tribute among the many that were brought that night. There was once a woman who went to hear Robert Collyer preach when her heart was so heavy with grief that the glory of a perfect autumn day was blurred and darkened. She had come out of a struggle not knowing whether she had done well or ill, and the sermon she heard stirred the very depths of her soul. After the service she paused at the door to see him pass. Had she lived in Bethany long ago she might have touched the hem of his garment, but at least in this latter day she could look upon his face.

Down the aisle he came, his snowy head held high, the radiance of the setting sun of his life shining in his eyes. Near the woman he paused, perhaps vaguely feeling her need, and he said, "Lassie, it is a beautiful world!" That was all. But the trouble assumed its right proportion. The sky cleared, and the man who had known sorrow, and the woman whom he had taught in those few words to bear sorrow, went their ways.

If that beautiful service in the Church of the Messiah taught nothing else to them who enjoyed it, it should have taught this, the need of speaking words of love and appreciation while yet it is not too late—to "be a little kinder than is necessary" when kindness means so much to one who is journeying the life-road over which dear Robert Collyer has so manfully gone.

Up to midnight the happy festival was continued in the social rooms of the church.

THE Essex Hall Year Book for 1904 (1s. net) appears in an enlarged form, the great addition being to the List of Ministers, where under each name, in addition to the particulars given hitherto, successive ministerial settlements are recorded. Not all have responded to the request for such information, and the list in this first year is not quite complete, but it is already of great value, and next year it will no doubt be fuller still. Another addition is the interesting chronicle of the International Council, and some full pages of information as to Liberal Religion in Foreign Countries. For the rest, the Year Book fully maintains its reputation as a complete and accurate directory to our churches and their ministers and kindred institutions.

LITERATURE.

SHAKESPEARE'S ENGLAND.*

"HE was not of an age, but for all time," wrote Shakespeare's great contemporary, in verses prefixed to the famous First Folio. If we would each realise this saying for ourselves, we might take the fuller prose form: "He was not only of an age, but also for all time," and we should do well to begin with the Shakespeare who was both of and for his own age.

Whilst none of the main plots belong to the England of Shakespeare's day, each play contains more or less reflection of that contemporary England.

Foreign sources supplied the Elizabethan imagination with additional material for their national drama, and their own life provided the details that were lacking to give reality to this new material. It was as natural to translate into the foreground of their own time and country noted figures from the indistinct background of the distant past or of distant lands, as to translate into familiar English books from Greek, Latin, Italian and French. George Chapman's "Homer" has been called "more an Elizabethan tale written about Achilles and Ulysses" than a translation. And this tendency to nationalise and modernise, noticeable even in the poetic diction of a scholar translating from the original Greek, is naturally more marked in a popular playwright revising old plays, and dramatising either English subjects or foreign subjects accessible in English translations.

The contemporary setting of Shakespeare's subjects has been recognised in detail, and much of the commentary on the text that is not devoted, in annotated editions, to Shakespeare's English, deals with the conditions of life in Shakespeare's England. Its importance as a whole, however, has been either overlooked, or so taken for granted, that its significance for beginners has not yet been realised.

It is now a commonplace among school boys and girls that Shakespeare did not invent his own plots, but took them from somebody else. But less is said about his methods of working up old or foreign material and presenting it in a new Elizabethan dress for his Elizabethan audience, modernising and nationalising his material. To his material Shakespeare added, from his own experience, local colouring, typical personages and incidents, and allusions to current topics, interweaving old and new into one organic whole. For he uses the real and familiar as an introduction to an ideal world of his own creation, and as a means of realising and interpreting that ideal world.

It is just this popular element that is now a difficulty in interpreting the plays on popular lines. Shakespeare's subjects still appeal to the human sympathies of any audience, but the material, then modern, introduced to make the story more real, is now out of date, and itself requires interpretation. For instance, the tragic story of the old British King Lear and his daughters is simple and straightforward. Contrasting with them and influencing them there are added, from contemporary fiction, another old man and his sons, and from contemporary life, the office and methods of the Court fool and the disguises of Edgar and Kent. The three figures of the Fool, Mad Tom, and the serving-man Caius may, with their by-play, interest a modern audience, but their connection with the development of the story is apt to be a source of bewilderment rather than of enlightenment to those not already acquainted with themselves and their part in the plot. Besides this, the story is told with frequent allusion in the dialogue to contemporary interests and circumstances that call for explanation.

In tales from Shakespeare the Elizabethan factors are as much as possible eliminated, and for beginners in Shakespeare study any introduction to this aspect of the subject is valuable. In two volumes recently published the relations of Shakespeare to his environment has been treated or approached.

"Little Notes on Shakespeare's England," opens with short sketches of his life and of historical persons and events in his lifetime. Then follow chapters on Country Folk, the Clergy and Religion, Festivals and Holy Days, &c., Hawking, Fowling, and other Sports and Diversions, Dress, Food and Furniture, Theatres, Books and Magic. This small book is avowedly based on certain chapters dealing with the everyday life of the period in Dr. Nathan Drake's "Shakespeare and his Times," which appeared in 1817 in two large quarto volumes. Unfortunately in the course of adaptation from Drake, many a passage has emerged without due regard to structure and logical sequence. In parts, however, the style is well suited to the purpose, and much interesting material has been collected. A hint of the close connection between the plays and contemporary English life occurs somewhat casually towards the end of the book. "It must be remembered that Shakespeare wrote of the customs he was used to, and did not specially adapt them to the date and country he was writing of"—a reminder worthy of greater prominence.

The larger volume, "In Shakespeare's England," is on a different plane, both as regards its literary style and its significance for readers of Shakespeare.

Beyond the sphere of social manners, customs and institutions, there are more subtle links between contemporary life and Shakespeare's work, especially in the English historical plays, where allusion in matters of detail is more rare. Whilst he seldom refers to noted persons or events of the day, and holds aloof from religious and political controversy, Shakespeare illustrates principles operative in the public life of the time. Through the history of the past he frequently appeals to interest in contemporary, national questions of vital importance.

The book before us introduces Shakespeare in suggestive juxtaposition to the great men and events of his day, and it is indeed "a vivid study of life in Elizabethan England."

With the exception of a chapter on Country Life and another on Schools and Universities, it consists of a series of graphic biographical studies of the men who loomed large in "the spacious times of great Elizabeth," the men of action in a world where Shakespeare himself was only an actor and a playwright.

From a delightful sketch of the Queen herself we pass on to Sir Thomas Gresham and the Merchant Life of London, Archbishop Parker and the Jesuits and Independants, Bacon, Sidney, Raleigh, Drake, Frobisher, and other seamen, Lords Howard and Essex and the Armada, Lord Burghley, Walsingham, Spenser, Marlowe—and lastly Shakespeare. A dozen reproductions of historical portraits form an attractive feature of a book in which, even independently of pictorial illustrations, the varied figures live and move before us in marked individuality.

Shakespeare's portrait forms the frontispiece, and gains in interest through its association in this volume with other historical portraits of the period. On the other hand, the verbal sketch of Shakespeare in the last chapter loses something of interest and reality through lack of connection with contemporary life. The treatment of Shakespeare as exponent of the general life of England would have given unity to the whole book; but this is not even suggested until the last page but one, where we are told that he "seemed to gather up within his giant grasp all that was worthiest in his age," and that "nowhere can we see a clearer picture of the age in which he lived" than in his pages. Previously Mrs. Boas inclines to the view that minimises his connection with the England of his day.

He needed no personal experiences from which to draw the figures or passions of his plays; to his vast intellect and creative power outward impressions were unnecessary; while he pursued the ordinary routine of his life his mind moved in a world of its own, and of that world he has left us the picture complete.

These two aspects of Shakespeare's work as a clear "pictu e of the age in which he lived," and as a complete picture of an ideal world of his own creation, are not necessarily incompatible, but they need reconciling. We are left either to reconcile them for ourselves or to choose between them.

If they are alternatives we should all choose the world of Shakespeare's creation, and leave Elizabethan England alone. Where Shakespeare study is likely to be very limited, this is indeed the wiser course. But for others the Elizabethan Age may serve better than our own, as a stepping-stone to Shakespeare's ideal world. The full beauty of his work and its significance for our own and all times appears most clearly, when we follow Shakespeare's guidance along his own lines from the real to the ideal.

Shakespeare's closeness to contemporary life, even in so ideal a play as "The Tempest," may be traced in its indications of the general interest in magic, foreign monsters, famous voyages and travels, and the enterprises and experiences of the early colonists. Even Prospero's magic island does not belong altogether to a world other than our own. Its yellow sands are washed by wild waves of the same seas that beat upon the shores of Shakespeare's England.

DR. GUINNESS ROGERS.*

WHEN a veteran writes reminiscences he usually claims indulgence, and this might be freely accorded even to a less honoured garrulist than Dr. Guinness Rogers. His autobiography is, in truth, no more interesting as a life-story than would be that of scores of other men who would never think of putting their name as the first line in the title of a book. At the same time it is as interesting as theirs would be. It is, moreover, written with the skill and directness born of long practice, it roams over the records of four-score busy and even momentous years, and it affords glimpses of many of that class of people of whom we never seem to see too much.

The story of his birth, training, and ministerial experience is simple enough. Born at Enniskillen, Dec. 29, 1822, his father being an agent of the "Irish Evangelical Society," Guinness Rogers spent his early days at Prescot; went to school at Wakefield; studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and afterwards at the Lancashire Independent College; and held pastorates successively at Newcastle-on-Tyne, Ashton-under-Lyne, and Clapham, London. Some of the most interesting pages in the book are those in which Dr. Rogers gives us sketches of people and manners, social and religious, in the respective spheres of his ministry. His long and fruitful work in the South-Western suburb has recently closed amid marks of well-deserved honour; and now he rests, reviewing the past—when he is not fighting again in line or at the head in some religious political campaign.

Incidentally Dr. Rogers gives us chatty information on many subjects besides those of the Congregationists of old times as he knew them. The old Unitarian chapel at Prescot, a "gloomy-looking building, shadowed by trees," is mentioned as having, seventy years or so ago, a congregation which "was not large, but their influence in the town was greater than their number, for the few it included were men of high character, public spirit, and considerable intelligence, on whom it was possible to rely in all works of philanthropy or reform." Unitarians, of the Manchester district, at any rate, may be interested in the picture, not a very attractive one, given of that once celebrated Independent, George Hadfield, whose historical interest in our old chapels was not conducive to the comfort of our Presbyterian fathers. Among the interesting notes Dr. Rogers makes of the style of remarkable speakers whom he has known we come upon the following incident, which is new to us:—

> . . . W. J. Fox was par excellence a rhetorician. I remember one of his speeches on the Free Trade Hall platform, the effect of which was a remarkable testimony to his power. He was comparing Protection to a snake, and the League to one who was endeavouring to strangle him. In his own most vivid and effective style he described the tightening of the grasp of the man upon the throat of the snake, until, when he was going to close the hand and complete the destruction, the whole audience seemed to rise almost instinctively to join with him in giving the final coup to the destroyer. The spectacle of a great audience rising in this fashion was extraordinary and unforgettable.

Dr. Rogers has much to say on the more prominent political events of the last thirty or forty years, and his criticisms of Mr. Chamberlain, once the hope of sturdy educational reformers, are fully as trenchant as might be expected. A good deal is told about Mr. Gladstone, though not much to make us regret its omission from Mr. Morley's "Life" of the great statesman. More touching, and perhaps more valuable in many ways, are the pages that tell about Dr. Dale, that strong, manly man, whose like we look for in vain to-day. But if one were to enumerate all the interesting topics in the book this notice would be unduly prolonged. The reader who may be attracted to it must be left some joys of discovery, and it will be sufficient to have introduced him to a work of discursive pleasure, not without its solid worth as a permanent record of personal, political, and religious life in the past century.

PARABLES HUMAN AND DIVINE.*

Mr. Shepheard has fittingly and gracefully dedicated his thoughtful little book to Dr. Fairbairn. The book itself is suggestive rather than satisfying, more distinguished by logical subtlety than by profundity of thought. The author leaves us in doubt as to the exact meaning to himself of the word parable until page 95, rather more than half way through his work. Here the following not quite convincing definition is suggested:—"A parable is a story, told in terms fit for a lower understanding, of truth too high for it." It may not unreasonably be asked, of what use is such a story to any lower understanding, which is by its nature incapable of comprehending the higher truth?

Mr. Shepheard first criticises physical science with much dialectical skill, pointing out its inconsistencies with its final assumptions. He remarks that most scientists, while ready to give a full explanation of how anything grows, have nothing to say as to that inner principle which compels the thing to grow in one way only. Furthermore, he notes that science has no answer to give to the question why things occur as they do. Yet he says the results of scientific investigation are in the main reliable and true, though they have nothing to say of the final reality. Hence he arrives at the conclusion that these results are not the reality itself, but parables to give a glimpse of that reality. Next he deals with Agnosticism, and justly asserts that those who declare that the Infinite Power behind the universe is unknowable, declare what they have no right to declare, and by their very declaration affirm this much knowledge about that Infinite Power that it is unknowable. Thus, he argues, they contradict themselves. Next he gives a wonderfully correct description of Idealism, without quite realising its full power as an explanation of the universe in its relation to man and things. In such efforts of philosophy also he sees but a parable of the eternal Reality, of which man has some intuition in his own soul. Man, he says further, can make such parables of truth by the faculty or intuition within him, and by the fact that he is part of a vast organism humanity, the sum of whose intuitions expresses itself in such parables. By way of corollary to the foregoing arguments the author asserts that God, whose very existence is implied by the ordered universe working in a continued evolution to something higher, conveys knowledge to men by way of parables.

The final conclusion of the work, though ingenious, is not wholly satisfying. The author imagines himself with all his present knowledge turned into an ant, and teaching the admiring ants of the ant-hill how to improve their methods and their work. He imagines that they would be grateful to him, whereas if we may judge by man's relations to his great prophets they would have killed him. From this analogy he goes on to infer that in compassion for the wanderings of His children God could take upon Him, and limit himself by, a human form, to show men how He intended them to live. He concludes thus: "All this God might have done. Did He not also do it?" Herein the author, after destroying all actual knowledge of the eternal Reality, takes refuge in the Incarnation as a solution of the consequent confusion. In this he resembles Mr. Balfour in his unsatisfactory "Foundation of Belief." In spite, however, of the deus ex machina at its conclusion the little work will well repay examination, and will certainly prove interesting and suggestive.

* "The Parables of Man and of God." By Harold B. Shepheard, M.A. (Longmans & Co. 6s.)

IN view of Mr. Hargrove's coming visit to Australia, on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, it is interesting to note the figures of the Australian Census of 1901, giving the number of those who declared themselves Unitarians. For New South Wales the total is 770; Victoria, 788 (including 550 in Melbourne and its suburbs); South Australia, 621; Queensland, 212; Western Australia, 156; Tasmania, 88; New Zealand, 468. There are, of course, a great many more Unitarians throughout the country, who did not so declare themselves.

The Christian Freeman, an old friend in many of our schools and homes, enters this year under new management, and offers special pages of its cover for the use of schools taking fifty copies monthly. The Freeman, which is also a Sunday School Monthly, is happy in having secured the vigorous editorship of Mr. A. H. Biggs, who knows so well what young people like, and can himself tell such capital stories. In this first number, the Editor, who is to be addressed at 102, West Hill, Putney, S.W., writes a characteristic introduction and New Year's greeting; the Rev. Alfred Hall, of Norwich, contributes four complete lessons for the Sundays of the month; a serial story is begun, and among other attractive matter there is the beginning of a discussion on "Was Cassabianca a Hero or an Idiot?" The Freeman is published at 5, Furnival-street, Holborn, E.C., and may be had also at Essex Hall.

A BROAD-CHURCHMAN'S CREED.

IN the preface to his recently published volume of sermons, "Following on to Know the Lord,"* Archdeacon Wilberforce, of Westminster, the Speaker's Chaplain, and Select Preacher before the University of Oxford, speaks of "widening habits of thought, grateful acceptance of the new light which modern criticism has thrown upon religious problems, and a certain reconsideration of the phraseology in which the fundamental truths of Christianity are expressed," as necessarily implied in the title of his book; and then, to vindicate his fidelity to the accepted creed of Christendom, adds the following confession:—"I believe in One Universal Omnipotent Parent-Source, of whom and to whom, and through whom, are all things, and in whom all live, and move, and have their being, whose name is Love, and whom no man hath seen at any time.

"And I believe in Jesus, called the Christ, or the Anointed One; the Revealer of God to man and the interpreter of man to himself; the specific embodiment of the moral character of the Parent-Source, and the Archetypal specimen and Perfect Representative of the sonship of Humanity; the peculiar Incarnation of that Divine Word, or Logos, or Eternal Reason of the Parent-Source which is immanent in all men.

"He was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary; tested and made perfect by exposure to the divinely ordered resisting agency, which is called moral evil; suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried; He descended into Hades. The third day after His crucifixion He showed Himself alive to His disciples, and after forty days He withdrew from limitations and returned, by what is known as the Ascension, to Universal Life and Authority; from thence He is ceaselessly coming in judgment or discernment upon the character and attainments of His brethren of the race, both while they are alive, and when they stand, small and great, before God at the close of the education of this age (for all judgment or discernment hath been committed to the Humanity of the Parent-Source revealed in Jesus).

"And I believe in the Holy Spirit, the atmosphere, or influence, or ceaselessly out-flowing life of the Parent Source, and of Jesus the manifestor of the Parent Source. He is the Lord, the Life-giver, and the Sustainer of the universe: the inspiration of art, science, literature, prophecy, aspiration, holiness, prayer. Though limitless, dateless, and universal, He is revealed as discoverable and accessible in the Holy Catholic Church. He is the invisible bond between souls that are sundered; He assures of pardon, convinces of the non-reality of death, and of the endless continuity of individual life. Amen."

THIS month's Essex Church Calendar, which is one of several magazines which now embody the Seed-Sower, publishes in one of its special pages the complete text of the Rev. F. K. Freeston's funeral address on Sir John R. Robinson.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE FISH.

THE Lake of Lucerne lies blue under a blue sky, and the green and blue hills stand about it, sometimes with a touch of white on their upper ridges. But I don't think the boys that go to Lucerne care most for this beauty of the mountains and the lake, though I daresay they take something of it in without thinking about it. What they are thinking about is, how many fish there are in this lake? There they stand at the edge of the shore all day long, each with rod and line, and the fish come in shoals, and the boys catch them. It really looks too easy.

It was our third morning at Lucerne, when Harold (I call him so because that isn't his name) said he wanted to go fishing. The day before he had gone on a steamboat to the other side of the lake, and he had seen the fish, little and big, darting about, and fairly elbowing one another to get the bits thrown out by the steward at the landing under the Bürgenstock; and again as we stood on the Alpnach pier waiting for the return boat. "Oh, if I only had a line!" he said.

So next morning, equipped with rod and line, Harold betook himself to fishing. No, there was one thing more, the bait, which naturally isn't kept in shops, and yet without it all the rest is useless. It took a little while to find this; but at last a boatman on the floating pier understood the case, and produced a box of horrid wriggling things, which were on their way to become houseflies, when their development was stopped in this manner. Then the fishing began.

Or rather, it didn't. Harold chose his place. He threw his line. There were plenty of fish, and not one of them would bite. He threw it again. He pulled it up, and put on fresh bait. He moved his place further to the right, then further to the left. Other boys jerked up their line with a fish at the end of it, but this boy's line dangled empty. Still he didn't give up. He stood there patiently trying his luck the whole morning, and I am not sure that he had a nibble. As we went home to dinner I didn't know whether to condole or laugh at him. At last I took my stand on the plain fact. "So you haven't got a fish?" Harold looked up, and his face brightened. "No," he said, "but I've had my fishing."

In the afternoon the bad luck went on. A Swiss boy, rather bigger than Harold, who had evidently come into town with a basket of fruit to sell, which he was now trying to turn into a basket of fish to take home, stood a little way from the English boy, and how fast he was landing the fish! No sooner did his line drop into the water than out it came and always a fish. You may think how discouraging this was to a boy who had got nothing. The Swiss boy noticed the bad luck of the English boy and beckoned to him, but the English boy felt shy. Then he took one of his own fish and brought it to Harold. It was very kindly meant, but Harold didn't quite know what to do. He really didn't want to take the other boy's fish. He wanted one of his own. But somehow he knew that what was given kindly should be taken kindly, and afterwards the two boys fished together and got on quite well. They couldn't talk, but they understood one another.

And just at the last, when it was nearly time to go home, Harold caught a fish—a silver, shining fish, as long as your finger. For my part, I like a fish alive in the water much better than a dead one on land. But all the same, I felt a little pleasure that Harold's perseverance had been rewarded.

Do you think this is the end of the fish story? Not quite. There is no end to anything. When you get one wish, always another wish comes to take its place.

As we went into the house Harold said, "But I wish I could have my fish cooked." The people of the house were too busy, but later, in our own room, he said, "Can't I cook it over the candle?" Then a memory came of a boy and girl of half a century ago, who used to go fishing on Saturday afternoons, and when they had caught two or three little fishes, like this one, made a fire with twigs on some flat rock, and joyfully toasted their fish; and when they were scorched and black enough, ate them, in the character of shipwrecked mariners or the Swiss Family Robinson. So we washed the fish, impaled it on a knitting needle, and held it, not above, but beside the candle. It takes a good while to cook a fish this way. But primitive man had to cook his fish without so much convenience as this. At last the little fish lay brown on a sheet of notepaper. There was no bread, and no salt, and no silver fork, but do not four hundred millions of Chinamen eat their daily dinner with chopsticks?

Harold looked up when he had half finished his meal. "I am sure," said he, "I never tasted any fish half so nice as this one."

Perhaps one fish seems very little for a day's trying and waiting. (One day afterward he got fourteen.) But let us see what he got with his one fish. He got, as he said, the pleasure of fishing. He got the pleasure of hoping. He got the pleasure of patience, and of perseverance, and the pleasure of kindness from a stranger; and at last the pleasure of fulfilled desire.

When he is a grown man he will very often work and wait day after day, and what he does or what he gets won't seem very important in itself; it will look as small as the fish. But if he gets along with it, the pleasure of doing his best, if he gets hope and the strength that comes from working, and kindness from his fellows, and satisfaction in his own heart, he will have all he needs to make him a happy man.

C. A. F.

VERY wonderful is the Universe, but its wonder finds recognition and comes into existence only in the mind of man. Visible Footstep of the Almighty, it is by man alone discovered and discerned. True, therefore, is it what the great Scotch philosopher wrote over the door of his Edinburgh class room, "On earth there's nothing great but man, in man there's nothing great but mind."

RELIGION AND ITS EXPRESSION.

IN the New Year's number of the Hibbert Journal the editor and three members of the editorial board unite in a discussion of the "Alleged Indifference of Laymen of Religion." Sir OLIVER LODGE and Professor MUIRHEAD, on somewhat similar lines, make the most practical contributions to the discussion. Sir EDWARD RUSSELL is more discursive, but suggests points of great interest, while the EDITOR furnishes not so much a contribution of his own to the subject discussed as a report, without further elucidation, of what he has found through his connection with the Hibbert Journal to be a widely prevalent feeling among laymen in regard to this matter.

Sir OLIVER LODGE and Professor MUIRHEAD are agreed that it is not religion to which the ordinary layman is indifferent, but the present day administration of religion in church services. Life is now so full of fresh interests, and there is greater freedom among men than of old in the direction of their lives; convention has largely lost its hold; only interests that can make a powerful claim, by reason of their own manifest intrinsic excellence, will secure the attention of intelligent men and command their active participation.

The services of the Church, Sir OLIVER LODGE holds, ought to be a living interest; the sense of over-pressure in life, which now leads so many to neglect distasteful and unhelpful services, ought to make thoughtful people welcome and eagerly seek the quiet times of rest and recollection of the deepest interests of life, in the worship of the Church. But the fact is, in Sir OLIVER'S view, "the conventional English Church service, or eclectic admixture of combined services, is too long, and, as I think, too mechanical. The Psalter as a whole is oppressively tedious—I speak for myself; many of the chants one is weary of. Some of the prayers are beautiful, or would be if they were properly read and were not spoiled by such frequent iteration." The Confession he regards as "historically interesting, and sometimes, perhaps, appropriate, but as a rule it is excessive and unreal; and if ever true, it is not a thing one wishes to sing in public, nor indeed to sing at all, still less to pay a few illiterate boys and men to sing or monotone for one."

It is not only the length of the service which is objectionable, but the rapidity, making for formalism, with which it is rendered. Sir OLIVER makes a strong plea for greater reality and sincerity in the services of the Church, greater freedom of expression in the prayers, and more living interest, to be equal to its great opportunity, in the sermon, and he concludes:—

> Religion is one thing; church services as often conducted are quite another thing. Modification will be resented and opposed by some singularly-minded lay Churchmen; nevertheless, if more eminent ability is to be attracted to the service of the Church, if the great body of the laity are to be reached in any serious and effective manner, modifications, excisions, and reforms are necessary. It is not religion to which people are indifferent.

So also Professor MUIRHEAD says, and urges that the expression of religion must be made more effective. While there is no general decay of interest in religion, there is, he declares, a very widespread decay of orthodoxy, while the Church services, and, as a rule, Church sermons, "are still full of the sand and grit of dogmatic and sectarian religion." Thus they have become a stumbling-block to the religious spirit. And both services and churches are too little beautiful, and do not make the profound appeal to emotion which they might and ought. Thus his plea is for fresh awakening in the Church, both to the realities of present day thought, that the living faith of men may find fit utterance, and to the power of art to render service to religion.

Sir EDWARD RUSSELL, as a liberal Churchman, notes the effect of sacerdotalism on the one hand and rationalism on the other on ordinary Churchmen. Though in exceptional cases sacerdotalism imparts zeal and rationalism spurs interest, for the majority the former makes religion mechanical, and the latter takes the practical urgency out of it, and thus on both sides indifference is increased.

Two other remarks Sir EDWARD makes, which we do not find entirely in accord. One is on the prevalent idea that the chief good in connection with religion is "Christian work," which distinctly lessens lay interest in religion, regarding it as "a mere patting of religion on the back on the score of its philanthropic appendages." The other is that the Church must make more effort to apply Christian ethics to the affairs of practical life, to prevent the laity from losing interest on the ground that religion is inapplicable to secular concerns. We should say that this latter effort must embrace the "Christian work" of the other clause, and lift it into its true place of honour as the natural expression of a living religious faith. The worship and the "Christian work" of the Church ought to be so closely associated together as to be the common utterance of the active religion of the people. Then there could be no half-contemptuous reference to "philanthropic appendages," and the charities of life would be felt to be only an added grace to the strong faithfulness of the Christian man, who takes the same spirit and principle into the whole ordering of his daily life, as a steadfast service of the Kingdom of GOD on earth.

But Mr. JACKS reports that to an increasing number of high-minded, practical laymen this very ideal, urged upon them as the true interpretation of Christianity, is the cause of their indifference. They feel, he affirms, that it is not true to their own experience of the world, and they do not mean to change the regulative principles of their life; they will not pretend, therefore, to be Christians, and give up their connection with the Church. Mr. JACKS makes his report, and simply leaves it to our judgment.

The answer we should make is that liberal religion must not take such a denial from "the plain man," but with increasing urgency must press upon the attention of the people the truth of this ideal that Christianity is a life, of which the secret is unselfishness, and must never rest from the endeavour to bring fresh fields of the world's affairs under the dominion of righteousness and brotherly love. It is true, no doubt, that much of the life of civilised and nominally Christian nations is lived to-day on absolutely heathen principles or want of principle; yet progress has been made, the power of righteousness and of unselfish love has prevailed in regions where it was before ignored. The true Christian spirit of life may not be able to effect sudden revolutions in the world, but it has worked as leaven, and it holds the promise of further achievements, until the Kingdom shall be wholly come.

The one spirit must make itself felt in every aspect of religious activity, to put fresh reality into the services of devotion and the religious utterances of the pulpit, to make the charities of life more sincere and practically helpful, and to claim dominion in the whole ordering of the world's affairs. When the Church is manifestly moved by the self-forgetting passion of such service, and dares to speak on all subjects as God gives it utterance, men will be no longer heedless, but will again honour religion with the best service of their lives.

IS AN EDUCATIONAL TRUCE POSSIBLE?

MR. A. J. MUNDELLA, than whom it would be difficult to find a more ardent fighter in the cause of liberty and progress in education, has taken occasion of the season of goodwill to propose a truce between the parties who at present seem further than ever from agreement. In a letter to the newspapers he points to the fact that all parties see the necessity of amending the Act of 1902, and he pleads that until such amendment has been effected the application to London of the principles of that Act may be postponed. He points out that, by the terms of the Act of 1903, the policy which abolishes the School Board and makes the County Council supreme, must come into force between May 1, 1904, and May 1, 1905. Meanwhile, it is notorious that there is no adequate plan ready for working the Act, and even if there were, it would be largely subject to the result of the approaching County Council election. Thus, whether we look at the state of things in the country or in the Metropolis, there is ample reason for further consideration. Mr. MUNDELLA makes the suggestion to grant for the interim a small dole to assist the necessitous "Voluntary" schools in London, and to pass a suspensory Act holding over the enforcement of the legislation so recently enacted and so soon found faulty.

Every friend of popular education knows that even if the Act could be applied peacefully it would be an educational disaster; but that with certain alterations it could be made a great implement for educational progress.

Every wise Churchman knows that a tyrannous victory now is but the prelude to a ruthless retaliation in the near future.

Every Nonconformist, stung with sense of wrong, and eager for the conflict, must realise that for the moment his attitude is one of self-defence, not aggression; and if the shameful blow can be averted he has no ground for a quarrel on this issue.

Every member of the Government must realise that to promote a mere suspensory Bill for London would sacrifice no principle to which he is committed, and would mitigate the hostility which awaits him in the constituencies on the education question.

Every County and Borough Councillor must know that when the moment comes to apply the Act in its present form, he is face to face with thousands of men and women who have vowed "We will not submit." Have not our rulers the imagination to foresee the possibilities when "passive resistance" comes to London? When passions are aroused and crowds drawn together, how small a spark leads to a tumult, how quickly a tumult leads to bloodshed.

If this education controversy were a small matter of ordinary administration arousing no bitter passion, we should without hesitation, delay the application of the Act to London till some settlement, which had an air of permanency, had been secured in the country. I am one of those who are prepared to fight this matter to the bitter end if that be necessary. This is my only excuse for presuming in all sincerity to suggest a temporary expedient, which, if not a practicable settlement, might be, at least, a profitable truce.

It must be admitted by sensible people that there is a great deal of force in this plea. It points in a direction which was only too much neglected in the inception of the Government's attempts at educational reform. Had there been a calmer calculation of the interests affected the story of the last few years would have been more flattering to the wisdom of our legislators.

The state of affairs in which we find ourselves to-day is assuredly most unsatisfactory to all but the incurably optimist. It pleases some journalists, as well as some members of Parliament, to pour contempt on the "Passive Resisters," but these people are of a breed that can stand a good deal of contempt. They are used to it, as their fathers were before them. There is one thing that they cannot stand, and that is the injustice of having to pay for the teaching of a form of religion which they believe to be pernicious, and of being shut out from a very large area of the educational field by tests long since abolished in every other section of civil employment. The apparent incapacity of the PRIME MINISTER, as a typical man, to understand such a frame of mind is much to be deplored. If he showed but a glimmer of sympathy with those who, whatever their eccentricities, are at least his fellow-citizens, we might hope that he would listen to the voice of reason, call together the leaders even at this late hour, and work out some modus vivendi.

That any clear-cut and logically complete system can be set up is, to our thinking, impossible. The premisses assumed by the different sections, Churchmen, Evangelicals, and Rationalists, are so distinctly opposed that, whichever might be fully satisfied, the other must be greatly dissatisfied. The most that practical men can hope for in such a tangle is a system in the main tolerable by the vast majority. The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY and the BISHOP of LONDON have sounded a note of absolute non-surrender; the Nonconformists are summoning their energies for a great battle in London; and the plain citizen who cares little for either party but a great deal for intelligence, efficiency, and liberty, doubts much whether they will not "tear the book in struggles for the binding." If this plain citizen could only make his voice heard in the midst of the din, we might get on. He must try. The November elections seem to have startled the Church party, and their hope (if, indeed, it be a hope) is, that the County Council elections will prove more favourable to that party than those in the boroughs. We do not believe they will. Londoners are, it is true, largely—too largely—apathetic, but there are enough of them who care for the real well-being of the people to elect a Council thoroughly in earnest and determined to make the most of its opportunities. And that is, after all, what really remains to do, truce or no truce.

THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE TO THE AUSTRALASIANS.

THE arrangements for Mr. Hargrove's visit to Australia, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, are now so far complete that in the January number of the Mill Hill Chapel Record he is able to make the following statement:—

We leave Leeds on the 5th or 6th of April for Marseilles, where we meet the P. & O. boat, India, and take passage, via Suez and Colombo, for Fremantle, where I stop a week to visit the Unitarians of Perth. Thence to Adelaide and Melbourne, where I shall probably spend some weeks. Tasmania will be my next place of call, and there I am told I shall find Unitarians both at Launceston and Hobart Town. From there I sail for New Zealand, passing round the southernmost promontory, and on my way up the East Coast, calling at Dunedin, Christchurch, and Wellington. I shall make a longer stay at Auckland, where there is a flourishing congregation, and from thence visit New Plymouth. Then we cross to Sydney, take rail to Brisbane, and from there at the end of September or early in October take passage to Vancouver and so across to New York, where I hope to visit Robert Collyer, now past his eightieth year, and be back again home by the middle of November.

In anticipation of his visit, Mr. Hargrove has addressed a letter, in which he tells of the origin and purpose of his mission,

To my Unitarian Brethren of Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand.

After the preliminary passages (in the course of which he mentions that he hopes to arrive at Fremantle on May 8), Mr. Hargrove continues:—

But for what purpose am I sent so far? or what expectations do you cherish that you should seek the visit of a stranger to you, and promise him so cordial a welcome?

I am the enemy of no form of religion which helps man or woman to resist the temptations of life and to bear its burdens. Had I a giant's strength to overthrow the old beliefs which prevail in your land as in ours, I would not exert it unless I were first fully assured that I was possessed also of the Divine Power which could replace the lost faith by something truer and higher, yet not less effective to control passion and inspire trust.

Nor do I come to you as the bearer of a new revelation, or with a new interpretation of that which is generally accepted. I have neither a theory to win converts to, nor a discovery to promulgate, nor peculiar views of my own to commend to your attention. I walk in the King's High Way. My religious belief is that which is held by the multitude. The religion which I preach, so far from being original or peculiar, is the oldest and most widely spread of all religions.

Or if there must needs be in Unitarianism something which distinguishes it from all other forms of Christianity, it is simply this—that what others regard as the Outer Court is to us the Sanctuary; what they call the foundations of faith we count to be The Faith; our Form of Religion is, we say, Religion itself.

For while we deny what others insist on, and they in turn differ among themselves, some most vehemently opposing what others assert to be soul-saving truths, all are agreed on the fundamental verities which we uphold. And so much so that they maintain that agreement even in despite of doctrines they profess which seem to us wholly irreconcilable with these great truths of universal religion.

I come then to tell you not what you have been hitherto ignorant of, but what you know, and have known from childhood. But if it be so, of what use is it that I should come from so far to say to you what your own teachers are saying Sunday by Sunday, what you may read in so many wise and holy books, what you know already before it is said?

Just this—that these plain truths are so great, so far surpass our comprehension, that while we readily assent to the words in which they are expressed, we never realise all they mean. And every new teller of them—if he speak out of the fulness of his own soul—will help us to understand somewhat less inadequately, and believe somewhat less indifferently, the truths which we can never understand as a consistent whole nor believe with the entire faith such truths demand.

I am possessed of one advantage over some of my brethren in the ministry more learned and able than myself. I have had experiences of religion such as very few men have had the like of, and I am able to sympathise with and understand views of religion the most opposed to those which I have long held.

My father was an Irish clergyman who, before I was born, gave up his living and hopes of preferment because he could not reconcile New Testament Christianity as he understood it with an Established Church and the Prayer Book. With a wife and young family he went forth, to be henceforth 'a minister of the Gospel,' independent of any denomination, and dependent for support on God—just as did the ministers who for the like reasons were ejected from the Church in 1662, among whom were the first who had charge of my own congregation in Leeds. I was brought up, like Paul, "according to the strict manner of the law of our fathers" (Acts xxii. 3). I believed myself to have been born in sin and justly doomed to hell, from which no goodness could save me, but only the Blood of Jesus, which by faith was to be applied to my soul's salvation. When I came to think for myself, I rejected a faith which had always been a source of terror to me. But what was there to replace it? For awhile I floundered in seas of doubt, trying to gain a foothold on sands which failed beneath my feet. At length the conviction came to me that if God had made a revelation to men, he would not have left it uncertain what it meant. It could not be a Book which many could not read, and those who could read it could not agree about. There must be a living witness, which with divine authority should declare the truth from generation to generation.

I left the University and became a Roman Catholic: left loving parents broken-hearted over what they called my apostasy, and never saw them again. It was I now believe a mistake, but one I have never repented of. I was true to my conviction, and true, at a terrible cost to myself and those I loved.

Become a Roman Catholic, I gave myself up soul and body to what was for me the Church of God. I joined one of the strictest of the monastic orders, and for seven years lived a life of study, devotion, and mortification. I look back upon those years with neither indignation nor self-reproach. I saw very much of good and very little of evil among those with whom I was associated. Had I remained in a convent I might have been all my life a Catholic.

But I was sent out into the world, and in contact with the life of common humanity the theory of the Universe to which I had given my adhesion failed me. If what I was taught was true, Hell was the doom of multitudes of God's children. I could not, I would not believe it! It is blasphemy to attribute to the Heavenly Father conduct which, if an earthly father were in a small measure guilty of, would draw upon him the execration of all his fellows.

The Church was wrong in what it taught about Hell, therefore it was not infallible. The rock I had built on failed me. Again I found myself adrift. Neither Book nor Church could be relied on. What is Truth? I asked, and was prepared to devote my life to the teaching of it, could I but find it. I sought in vain for a Revelation, sure and clear. I began the study of medicine, but I was too old to make a new start in life. I was strongly tempted to suppress my doubts, and had all but entered the ministry of the Church of England, the church of all my relations and friends. I accepted an appointment as lecturer on English literature under my University. It seemed to me at one time as if literature must be my calling instead of religion.

Gradually, however, the heavens opened to my gaze. I saw that revelation was not an event of a certain date and place, that it was constant and universal. On God's part there was no hiding of his face, it was on man's part that stupidity and indifference prevented seeing. The vision was always there, but the eyes of men were downcast and bleared.

I had found the truth, so far as I was capable of receiving it. I was invited, stranger as I then was to the Unitarian fold, to accept the pastorate of the Mill Hill congregation. I have often thought since that it was a rash step on their part, for the congregation is one of the oldest and most respected in the North of England, and throughout its 230 years has never but once, and that so far back as the seventeeth century, had trouble or disagreement with its minister. And I? I was unknown to them except by report. I had changed more than once. I might change again.

It is now more than twenty-seven years since I went to Leeds. This is enough to say in commendation of myself. I am conscious of failure and shortcoming and defects. Still I can dare boast that I have for so long a time approved myself as the minister of such a people as meet for worship at Mill Hill.

I shrink at times when I think of all that you expect from me. But I have had a long experience of the work here and throughout England, and I trust I may at least do as well in a new country as I have done in the old. For five months I shall be your servant; it will be my great reward if, when I quit your land, I shall leave behind me the memory of good work done for your highest welfare.

I am, my dear friends and brethren,

Yours in faith and hope,

CHARLES HARGROVE.

DR. BROOKE HERFORD.

SIR,—It may be interesting to the numerous friends and admirers of the late Dr. Brooke Herford to read the singular circumstance that led to his leaving Manchester for Chicago. It was the result of a joke on his part.

I was leaving for Canada and America in September, 1874, to fulfil a series of professional engagements, and received a letter from my reverend friend to stay with them two or three days before joining the steamer at Liverpool. I found I could not spare the time, and mentioned in my reply the train I should be passing through Manchester in. On my arrival there I found Mr. and Mrs. Herford waiting on the platform. We had only time to exchange a few words before the train started. Just as it was moving he stood on the step of the carriage, and said, laughing, "If you should hear of a berth for an industrious, sober young man, don't forget me;" looking out of the window, and waving my hand, I replied, "All right, I'll not forget you," and I left them laughing on the platform. Some weeks afterwards I was at the house of another old friend, the Rev. Robert Collyer, in Chicago, and he was speaking of the difficulty they had in filling the pulpit of the Church of the Messiah in that city. "Well," I said, "a sober and industrious young man in Manchester says he wants a berth, Brooke Herford," and we both laughed at the idea, when the question arose, was it possible, it might be taken seriously? Mr. Collyer decided to bring it before the next meeting of the church committee, and propose his expenses should be guaranteed, and he should be invited to come to Chicago, and see how he liked the proposal of retaining the pulpit.

The visit was paid in the following year, and in January, 1876, he left England with his family for Chicago, and thus commenced a ministry so full of good works, as described in your interesting memoir. With regard to his leaving America for Hampstead, he writes in a letter I received in Australia, dated from Baden-Baden in 1892:—

"My life in Hampstead is very full. I came back because things seemed to be going slackly in the fight for a noble and more common-sense Christianity, and I had for some time been wondering whether it was quite right for me to have gone away into the easier life and lot of a Unitarian minister in America. And so when the call came I felt bound to accept it, and I do not regret, though I had many kind friends, and one of the largest churches in America."

These words I think illustrate the truth of the modest estimate he had of his own good work, his unselfish, simple truthfulness, and the earnest sense of duty, referred to by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed in his address at the funeral service in Rosslyn-hill Chapel.

WYBERT REEVE.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

SIR,—The musical members of our London churches will be interested to hear of an inaugural meeting at Essex Hall to found a Choral Society on Jan. 16; tea and coffee at 7, the chair to be taken at 8 by Mr. John Harrison. All interested are cordially invited, whether singers or instrumentalists themselves or not. The form which the Society shall take will be left entirely to the meeting to decide, but it may be pointed out that such a society will not necessarily involve a great additional expenditure of time, as many of the practices could be conducted locally at the churches themselves, and even possibly in combination with the regular choir practices, wherever such a plan was thought expedient. Occasional meetings at some central place, and under able professional guidance, should surely prove of the utmost value in stimulating the musical interest of our community in general, and they might, also, merely from a social point of view, do much to increase the fellowship amongst our scattered churches.

For the individual church, too, such a society ought to prove itself of great benefit, both in adding to the range of choir singing and in assisting special musical services or festivals.

AN OLD MYSTIC.

REVELATIONS OF DIVINE LOVE SHOWN TO THE LADY JULIANA.

I.

"By three things man standeth in this life: by which three God is worshipped, and we be speed [sped], kept and saved. The first is, use of man's kindly [natural] reason. The second is, the common teaching of Holy Church. The third is, the inward gracious working of the Holy Ghost. And these three be all of one God. God is ground of our kindly reason; and God is teaching of Holy Church; and God is the Holy Ghost. And all be sundry gifts to which he will we have great regard, and according [accord] us thereto. . . ."

THUS wrote the solitary recluse of Norwich in the decade which preceded the preaching of John Ball and the rising of the peasants. Her book is among the best gifts that have come out of that golden age—whether it be an age of history or of the Spirit—ere yet the Church on earth had fallen asunder, being old; ere yet reason, and doctrine, and religious experience had wholly lost touch with one another. Singularly enough, it comes to us through the hands of one de Cressy, the chaplain of Strafford, who left England and joined the communion of Rome when his country was troubled by the early stages of civil strife, returning after the Restoration to edit the MS., and to die in a quiet corner of Sussex.

Tradition still shows the chamber of Juliana, whose solitude was filled with the Heavenly Presence; whose isolation was flooded by all-embracing Love; but little else about her save her own words remain to us.

The Story of Juliana.

She tells us she was born in 1342, and she is said to have attained a great age. The sixteen revelations came to her when she "was thirtie years old and a half"; beginning on the fourteenth day of May, 1373, "early in the morning, about the hour of four," and lasting "until it was noon of the day, or past," and the sixteenth "shewing" followed that night. "Fifteen years after and more" a further revelation, perhaps the most beautiful and helpful of all, was vouchsafed to her.

As to the outward nature of these revelations we can hardly speak in other words than those of de Cressy when he wrote: "The objects of some of them were represented to the imagination, and perhaps also to the outward sight; sometimes they were represented in sleep, but most frequently when she was awake. But those which were more pure, intime, and withall more certain, were wrought by a divine illapse into the spiritual part of the soul, and mind, and understanding, which the devil cannot counterfeit, nor the patient [i.e., the one who experiences] comprehend, though withal it excluded all doubt or suspicion of illusion." That "divine illapse" into the higher consciousness, describe it as we may, is the simple and felicitous explanation of these and all kindred experiences; its psychological discussion, which does not belong to this paper, will be fresh in the mind of every reader of Professor James's "Gifford Lectures." But a word or two must be given to Juliana's description of the circumstances preceding the revelations, or "shewings" as she generally prefers to call them.

In her youth, she tells us, she had earnestly desired "to have of God's gift a bodilie sicknes. I would that that sicknes were so hard as to the death . . . myself weening that I should have died. . . . I desired to have all manner of paines, bodilie and ghostlie [spiritual], that I should have if I should have died: all the dreads and temptations of fiends, and all manner of other paines, saving the out-passing of the soule . . . for I would be purged by the mercy of God, and after live more to the worship of God because of that sicknes." This sickness was to come upon her when she would be thirty years old. She also desired—and she herself gives this longing the first place—that she might fully realise, even as did Magdalen and Our Lady, and other that were Christ's lovers "who had bodilie sight" of the crucifixion, the outward manifestation of the passion of Christ. Thus in truth did she long to mightily drink of his cup and to be baptized with his baptism. She also mightily desired to receive true contrition, "kind compassion," and the desire of the will for God.

Her Sickness and Visions.

According then to her desire, and at the time she sought, which was the time of full maturity—a time which seems often to synchronise with some crisis in spiritual development—there came to her the sickness and the vision. For a week her illness increased upon her until her body seemed to herself to be "dead from the middes downwarde," and after that, as she sat propped up in bed, her eyes upon the crucifix, darkness enwrapping her, only the cross seeming to shine before her, life seemed utterly to fail. Then suddenly her bodily pain left her, and the desire to realise by sympathy the passion of Christ came upon her. She asked then not an outward vision of his suffering, "but compassion, as me thought that a kind soule might have with our Lord Jesus, that for love would become a deadlie [mortal] man with him. I desired to suffer living in my deadlie bodie, as God would give me grace."

The Long Desire Fulfilled.

I have dwelt thus at some length on the conditions under which the Lady Juliana beheld her visions, because they are more than interesting. They show a fixedness of earnest purpose that recalls a saying of Behmen's which, although its immediate application is somewhat different, may suitably be quoted here. "It is not so easy a matter," he writes in his True Resignation, "to become the children of God as men imagine. To turn the mind and destroy self, there is a strong continual earnestness requisite, and such a purpose, that if the body and soul should part asunder by it, yet the will should persevere constantly, and not enter again into self. A man must wrestle so long till the dark centre that is shut up so close break open, and the spark in the centre kindle." This endurance of desire is again suggested by the closing paragraph of Juliana's book, in which she tells how after fifteen years of longing the mystery of the revelations was further opened to her.

For no Merit of Hers.

But along with this power of enduring desire, she possessed a beautiful spirit of true resignation; she quaintly says that she recognised her request for the sickness and the participation in the passion were not according to "the common use of praier"; and she always added to them, "I will not but as Thou wilt." And again it is to be noticed that she only sought the "outward shewings," in order that she might share in the spirit of Christ; and recognised fully that it was to this end the vision was given to her. It was not for her merit that the vision was given; in the meek and beautiful simplicity of her spirit, she says: "There be many that never hath shewing, ne sight . . . that love God better than I." We know nothing of Juliana's later life, except the one incident of the renewed revelation, and the witness of her own writing, whose intensity and concentrated meaning seems to tell of years of patient thought and meditation upon these shewings. Yet her story suggests that such visions as she beheld are as it were the flower, the blossom of a pure, earnest, and loving life; the flower which opens but once perhaps, and for a day, and after a brief glory fades away and is not renewed, but yet has perfected therein its mysterious purpose, and is followed by the slow maturing fruit. First, the long preparation above ground and below, the co-operation with spiritual forces; afterwards the concentration of the old life upon the new, the gradual nurture of the seed, conceived by the blossom that has perished: such it would seem is the nature of mystical experiences like Juliana's. Of hers as of all spiritual gifts, the divine adage holds true—"by their fruits ye shall know them."

After so much by way of preface, we come to the revelations themselves, which occupy eighty of the eighty-five short chapters of the book. They were sixteen in number, and, however it may have been with Juliana herself, they will appear of varying importance to the reader.

The Sixteen Revelations.

A brief résumé will help us to classify them. The first revelation was of the head of Jesus bleeding from the thorns; the second showed more of his shame, the blood covering all the face; the third was of a different nature, and revealed God working his will in all creatures; in the fourth she saw the body of Jesus broken by the scourging, and covered with bleeding wounds; the fifth showed the victory of the sufferer over the devil, so that in spite of her sorrow at his pain Juliana "laught mightily." In the sixth revelation, "Our Lord said, 'I thank thee of thy service and of thy travel [travail] of thy youth.'" The seventh brought her keen spiritual delight, followed by deadly heaviness, and thus alternating "I suppose about twenty times." The eighth was another vision of the dying of Jesus; the bloodless flesh slowly becoming dead in "a dry sharp wind, wonder cold"; and in the ninth the agony deepened so that Juliana could hardly bear any longer to behold it, and realised the anguish of Mary, his mother; but, withal, it was shown to her that these were not as the pains of hell, for even in the agony Christ was a glad giver, and rejoiced above the pain. The last thought is enforced by the tenth revelation, wherein she heard Him say blissfully, "Loe, how I love thee." In the eleventh, Mary was shown, not outwardly but spiritually, and as it were in the love of Jesus.

The twelfth "shewing" was of the divine nature, and that it is He whom she loves, serves, and desires. In the thirteenth, the necessity for sin was shown to her, but she was assured "all shall be well, and all shall be well, and all manner of thing shall be well." The nature of prayer was revealed in the fourteenth shewing, and how it is not of the creature, but of God; and afterwards she was shown how we must be blamable for sin in our own sight, but are not to blame in God's sight: this was shown "full mistely by a wonderful example of a lord that hath a servant," and of the servant running upon his lord's errand and falling into a "slade" or ravine out of which he cannot rise, and of the lord's love for the servant, and how it is heightened by the servant's strugglings. The account of this revelation, which is given in quaint detail, occupies a third of the volume. The fifteenth revelation shows the uses of the pain, sickness, and disease of life, and the beauty of patience, and the joy of these things in the heart of God.

The Final Revelation.

At the close of these fifteen revelations there is a pause, and Juliana speaks of their renewal in her by "lightnings and touchings, I hope, of the same Spirit that showed them all." The fifteen shewings had lasted some eight or nine hours, during which she felt no pain. But they ceased, and she was empty of comfort and filled with bodily pains, so that when a priest came to ask how she was, she said, "I had raved to-day," and so denied the reality of her visions. "Here may you see," she adds, "what I am of myself." And at night, when she fell asleep, she thought the fiend held her by the throat, but she remained trusting and awoke, and afterwards lay in great peace of body and soul. And in this condition she beheld the last of her revelations, of the nature of the soul, "as it were an endless world, and also as it were a blessed kingdom," the "homliest home" of Jesu. And again the fiend troubled her, but she had faith and comfort, and strove against him till "prime day." And then the whole of her revelations seem to have been again rehearsed before her, that she might be sure in them. And she was bidden to "be not too much aggrieved with sin that falleth to thee against thy will," and was shown how safely she was kept in the love of God. In the last chapter of the book, Juliana tells how she desired to understand what was the meaning of a part of the fourteenth revelation—that God is the ground of our praying to Him. And it was shown to her that the whole meaning of this was Love.

TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW.

Pillared with chimneys, overarched with smoke,
The city, one huge factory, defiles
The lovely land where Nature's Temple vast
Had many an altar under bowing trees,
And wordless adoration solemnised
The gracious air, or with profounder awe
Confessed in storm the terror of the Lord.
Within its reverence-forsaken gloom,
Creatures of sense, men live and toil and die.
Oblivious whence they are, to present truth
More blind than he who in perpetual dark
Weaves on thought's loom imaginary worlds.
And wedded to the careless day, they hold
Its purpose-laden moments born to please
As summer flies accept the passing hour.
Bare units in a mercenary crowd,
To them no Holy Grail comes floating down
The mystic light to flash the hidden truth
That theirs is holy work the God in man
Requires, and with divinest ardours urge
Their trembling hearts to achieve a noble quest.
In disregarded insignificance,
To all unwelcome tasks their backs they bend,
Reluctant slaves of grim necessity,
Disloyal at heart, and harbouring fatal dreams
Of liberty in Pleasure's scented vales,
Where unrestrained they'd wander, plucking fruits
Of many-hued desire, would loll at ease,
For ever quenching an assuageless thirst,
And cozen pleasant vices in the shade.
Poor victims by some potent magic art
Bound unto soul-destroying lies which smile
In truth's disguise, and lure the labouring feet
To that sad land by strong enchantment held,
Which only is the thing it does not seem,
A land of fatal odours, poisoned sweets,
Malarious swamps where fever lurks, and death
Ravens at will and lords it over all.

Yet shall the Holy Grail glow angerly
Upon their shrinking sight, as thro' dense mist
Reddens the sun, and looms to lonely men
A terror. Truth shall smite them into fear,
Their easy gospel fail the hour of need,
And seeking refuge they shall find the world
To its remotest caverns shelterless
As from the wrathful tempest maddening heaven
Th' inhospitable sea. Then prayer shall rise
From these unwont to look above, and shriek
And plead. The ominous silence shall return
From out its smitten depths an echo charged
With self-accusing bitterness and wild despair.
Then shall the dull and lurid mystery
Darken to dunnest night, wherefrom shall leap
The startling menace of the Power behind
Whose revelation crushes ere His arm
Be felt. And from that dread apocalypse
The hope-abandoned soul shall rush
To death's escape within the kindly earth,
Or the cold deeps of ocean's grave secure.
But lo! the sea is luminous throughout,
The solid globe itself dissolves in light,
An awful splendour of revealing fire,
No pitying shadow, no befriending gloom.
Above, beneath, around, in farthest heaven,
In utmost hell, God's quiet eye regards
The frenzied spirit, which at last o'ercome
Falls self-abased to plead at Mercy's throne.

And now the Holy Grail once more descends.
He feels its presence, hears the mystic fire,
And follows stumbling with a downcast head.
At length he knows obedience is the way
By which the land of heart's desire is reached,
That perfect life unfolds through perfect law.
Companioned by herself, more wondrous fair
Than errant fancy limned when thrilled the blood
And fond imagination rioted
Within the sensual world, he learns to call
Freedom by her true name, Necessity,
Which she from earliest times has humbly borne
Among the sons of God. To her, austere
But beautiful beyond the earth-bound dream,
He yields the guidance of the life to be.
Forth in her might he valiant fares to wage
A holy warfare in the land of death,
Dethrone the universal devil-god
Of Gold, destroy his obscene shrines, trample
The symbols of his worship under foot,
And raise an altar to Eternal Love,
Where, knowing themselves of a diviner race,
Men yield their own to that Supremest Will
Which seeks expression in the living mind
Attaining Truth, unveiling Beauty's face,
And worshipping Ideal Good, become
The spirit which asserts the ends of life
In what is given, not received, and finds
Its gracious inspiration in the needs
Of kindred souls athirst for nobler things,
Hungry with unappeasable desires.

Addison A. Charlesworth.

Liverpool Country Hospital for Children.—On Tuesday evening, Dec. 29, at the invitation of the Misses Holt, 36, Alexandra Drive, a large gathering assembled in the beautiful Church Hall at Ullet-road, to hear a dramatic recital by Mr. John Harwood of Dickens' "Cricket on the Hearth." Dr. W. Carter presided, and, in introducing Mr. Harwood, remarked that the institution which Mr. Harwood had so kindly come to aid, was, he thought, just of that character which Dickens himself would have assisted. The rendering of Mr. Harwood's adaptation of this well-known story was throughout highly artistic, and was intensely appreciated. At the close of the recital freewill offerings were taken in aid of founding a "Tiny Tim" Cot at the hospital (which will be open to receive children from all parts of the United Kingdom), and the National Anthem was heartily sung.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

THE first half of our winter has passed quickly away, and much has happened of an interesting and inspiring character. We look back with a great deal of pleasure upon the Autumnal Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which were held in Manchester. A variety of circumstances combined to make the evening public meeting anything but a numerical success; but in other respects it was all that could be desired. The other gatherings were without exception eminently satisfactory, both as regards attendance and interest. The Lower Mosley-street school buildings were placed at our disposal, and proved splendidly adequate to our needs. They are amongst the finest Unitarian Sunday-school premises in the kingdom. There is a feeling that the most pressing problem discussed was that raised in the Rev. Charles Peach's paper on "The Needs of Our City Churches." It has been engaging the attention of the governing body of the District Association ever since, both as regards the arrangement of Common Pastoral Oversight, and the establishment of a Lay Preachers' Union. There is a grave doubt in many minds as to whether the cure proposed for the remedy of our financial and other weakness is a really wise one. As one critic has put it, the church which cannot easily pay the stipend of a minister rather needs the services of two ministers than of only half of one. Some of our churches do find it extremely difficult to scrape together the minister's stipend; and on the face of it one would think that an amalgamation of two neighbouring churches under one pastorate would be easy and welcome. But there is another side to the question:—It is often pastoral work during the week which is most urgently needed for the building up of church life; and somehow or other there is at present a prejudice against lay-preaching in our churches. Our people want training in this matter; and so, perhaps, do our lay preachers also. We have a number of able and earnest laymen amongst us, who should develop into impressive and acceptable preachers, and the present step towards the establishment of a Lay Preachers' Union will doubtless lead to valuable results.

Generous contributions were received towards a fund for guaranteeing the Association against pecuniary loss arising in connection with the expenses of the meetings, and a surplus of over £30 remained after all bills had been paid. The joint committee allocated this as follows:—£10 to the Bradford Building Extension Fund, £5 to the Domestic Mission Building Extension Fund, £5 to the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and the residue to the Manchester District Association of Churches. The work of organising the meetings was extremely well carried out, and reflected great credit upon those who had the matter in hand.

A similar word of praise ought to be said of those who had in hand the arrangements in connection with the three Sunday evening services in the Palace of Varieties. The services were a great success in every way, the congregations growing larger each successive evening. The Revs. J. C. Street and J. P. Hopps were the preachers, and therefore it goes without saying that the services were inspiring. The holding of such services, however, has not met with the unanimous approval of the Manchester ministers, of whom some complain seriously that their own evening congregations were woefully depleted for the time being, and that not only were they and the few who stayed at home discouraged, but also that the strangers who usually find their way into our churches in the winter months were unfavourably impressed with the mere handful of people they saw in the pews. One church closed for the three Sunday evenings rather than run the risk. Of course this criticism comes from the ministers of small congregations, of which unfortunately we have a fair share. And yet even they will probably be benefited in the long run. Those who felt the thrill of numbers at the Palace will perhaps put a little more enthusiasm into their local effort. The Torrey-Alexander Mission was on at the same time, and that would no doubt attract a larger proportion of the members of orthodox churches without any such complaint being made. And it goes without saying that a very large number of those present at the Palace services were either not members of our churches at all, or mere nominal members; and, surely, it was worth a great deal to get them to join with us in common worship. It is impossible to prove by statistics what good is done by such effort; but those who were present must have been influenced for good, and some of the strangers whom we have since noticed at our own services may have come as a consequence of what they heard at the Palace of Varieties.

A most interesting report has been issued by the M.D.S.S. Association, on the work of the Holiday Home at Great Hucklow during last year. Prior to the opening of the Home for the season, considerable additions and improvements were made. Owing to the lateness of Whitsuntide the season was two weeks later than in the previous year. The popularity of the Home is greater than ever. Twenty-three schools spent holidays there, and, in addition, the Home was occupied by a large party of mothers from Bradford, Renshaw-street, and Willert-street; while a large number of individual visitors were supplied with meals. The collections taken at the usual Friday evening concerts amounted to £10, which is to be devoted towards the acquisition of an improved piano. The balance-sheet shows a profit on the year's working of over £48. This result has been brought about mainly through the personal oversight and management of the Rev. Charles Peach, who took charge of the catering, and exercised great care in the preliminary placing of contracts. In all this he was ably assisted by the matron, Miss Jackson. My own school spent Whit-week there, and I was with it most of the time. The Home stands in a healthy and bracing spot, with a variety of beautiful walks and drives in all directions; and after spending a most enjoyable time there we returned, looking and feeling all the better for our holiday. The only thing the management cannot guarantee is fine weather; but we take our chance of that wherever we go.

With a view to testing the need of extending the scope of the work already done by the Convalescent Home at Blackpool, it has been decided to raise the limit of age for twelve months, so as to include elder scholars. A sum of £500 has been set aside from the bazaar fund for the maintenance and extension of this Home when required.

There is to be a Provincial Assembly stall at the East Cheshire Christian Union Grand Bazaar, which is to be held in the coming autumn; and to this end arrangements have been made for a working party of ladies from the various congregations, to be held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, monthly, on Fridays, at 2.30, with tea at 4.30; 6d. each. The first meeting will be on Jan. 22. So that we have a week of excitement to look forward to next autumn, for the bazaar is to be held here in Manchester.

The monthly meetings of the Association at the various churches in rotation are as successful as ever. The next is to be at Longsight on Jan. 16, and the February meeting at Bradford.

We are not allowed to remain very long without some new scheme being proposed for the adding of interest to our church life. Some while ago one of our churches suggested to the Association that a periodic and organised exchange of pulpits might be a good thing, so that the congregations might have placed before them other men's views of some of the special problems which are not only of permanent but also of current and passing interest. Although the Association is not officially undertaking to carry out such a scheme, it has given it its blessing, and as a result the ministers of the district have had a conference on the subject, and are combining in an effort to give the idea a fair trial. Already some churches have completed arrangements for February.

It seems a little difficult to raise money just now, owing, probably, to the depression in trade. The building extensions at Bradford, which are absolutely essential if the work is to have its natural development, will cost £1,000. This is not really a large sum to raise, and there have been two or three very generous donors. There is a splendid offer made of £250 if the remaining sum of £170 is forthcoming within a few weeks. The work at Bradford has so grown, especially that part of it connected with the Sunday-school, that it would seem a sin not to provide the increased accommodation which is so urgently needed.

The Sunday following the closing of the Strangeways Unitarian Free Church at the end of October, a new effort was begun in Higher Broughton. The Cobden Hall was engaged for morning and evening services, and also for afternoon Sunday-school. Straightway the attendances all round were double what they had been in the church at Bridge-street, and the offertories showed corresponding increase. Many of the members of the "deceased" church have generously consented to transfer their annual subscriptions, so that the new movement is in the proud position of being from the outset self-supporting. Various committees have been appointed to superintend different branches of work, and a very hopeful spirit prevails. One committee attends to the visiting of absent friends, and the canvassing for new members; a ladies' sewing society is started; and, in other ways, an encouraging interest is manifesting itself. It is hoped these services will be continued throughout the current year, during which time the resources and prospects of the district will be tested.

The Christmas and New Year festivities are probably over by this time in all our centres. If only the energy put into them could be continued afterwards throughout the year for the advancement of the spiritual interests of church and school! That, perhaps, is too much to expect. Still, it is presumable that laggards are roused into fresh enthusiasm by the warmth of a Christmas party, and that for a time their new resolves will secure their more regular attendance at Sunday service. We Manchester Unitarians, although not satisfied with the present state of things, enter the new year hopefully and with a belief that our prospects are bright, and that our opportunities are not less but greater than before. If we are not just now growing in numbers we are certainly consolidating, and that is a prophecy of great things in the time to come.

CHARLES ROPER.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Aberdeen. — The annual Sunday-school soirée was held in church on December 25. There was a large and lively gathering. Books were presented to 109 Scholars for attendance, 17 being for perfection. The Sunday evening lectures illustrated by lantern brought crowds, and the lecture on "Ecce Homo" had to be repeated. The "Lily League" initiated by Mr. Webster, has proved a success. It is intended to provide a recreative association for poorer children, living around the church. These come swarming into the school-room on Friday evenings, and enjoy the amusement arranged for them. The ladies' working party have just completed a helpful piece of work and raised about £20 by means of a bed-spread for organ repairs and other necessary outlays.

Bootle. — On the last Sunday of the old year special musical services were held in the Free Church, in the afternoon selections from the "Messiah" being given by an augmented choir. In the evening, the music included Mendelssohn's quartette, "The Lord is mindful of his own," and a movement from a Mozart symphony rendered by an orchestra. The Rev. J. Morley Mills gave an appropriate address and the service closed with the "Hallelujah" chorus.

Cirencester.—On New Year's Eve, at the annual Christmas tree and free tea, prizes were distributed by Mrs. Austin, and useful presents given to all the scholars. At the close carols were sung, and prayer offered by the minister.

Clifton. — On the evening of New Year's Day the annual soirée of the Oakfield-road Men's Club was held in the church parlour. The club was formed three years ago for the purpose of affording the male members of the congregation an opportunity of meeting together once a fortnight for social intercourse, and the discussion of ethical and social problems pertaining to the advancement of liberal Christianity. The soirée this year was more than usually interesting. After the reception by the president, Dr. Warschauer' an enjoyable concert was given, and, after an interval for refreshments, a dramatic performance. At the conclusion, Mr. Furber, on behalf of the members made a presentation of a gold pencil-case to Dr. Warschauer as a token of esteem, which he warmly acknowledged, congratulating the members on the success of the club. The Rev. J. Wain also spoke, and Mr. W. C. Watkins, on behalf of the Lewins Mead congregation.

Derby (Welcome Meeting).—On Monday evening a very successful social gathering was held in the Friargate schoolroom, quite 150 being present, to welcome the Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, the newly appointed minister. Mr. W. G. Timmans, senior chapel warden, presided, and among those present were the Revs. C. D. Badland (a former minister), J. M. Lloyd-Thomas, and Dr. Griffiths. The chairman, Mr. W. J. Piper, and Mr. S. D. Hall, on behalf of the congregation, school, and other institutions, offered a cordial welcome to Mr. Buckland, in which the ministers present joined. Mr. Buckland, in acknowledging the cordial expressions used concerning him, said he had received nothing but kindness and consideration from the friends in Derby, and he could only humbly hope that he might show himself in some degree worthy of such generous treatment. He trusted they would find that in all he did he would show a broad and tolerant spirit. It was not his aim to preach merely to the righteous and faithful; he hoped to preach to the unrighteous and unfaithful as well; to men of all parties and all creeds, and those who professed no creed at all. A musical programme followed, and a very pleasant and encouraging evening closed with the singing of the National Anthem.

Leeds: Holbeck: (Appointment).— The Rev. W. R. Shanks, late of the Unitarian Free Church, New Bridge-street, Strangeways, Manchester, has received and accepted a cordial invitation from the congregation of the Unitarian Church, Holbeck, Leeds, and will enter upon his new ministry immediately. Mr. Shanks has had ministerial experience extending over twenty-three years, and before coming to Strangeways had held pastorates at Lynn, Newchurch (Rossendale), and Swinton, Manchester.

Liverpool: Ancient Chapel.—On New Year's Eve a large congregation joined in a special evening service, which was conducted by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, an address being given by the Rev. W. J. Jupp. Last Sunday morning, Mr. Jupp took the Communion Service. His ministry at the Ancient Chapel is now concluded.

London: Hackney (Resignation).—The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A., has given notice of his intended resignation, at Midsummer next, of the pulpit at the New Gravel Pit Church, Hackney. The intimation has been received with the greatest regret, for both the minister and his wife have won the friendship and respect of the entire congregation. It is understood that Mr. Bloor has received and accepted an invitation to the pulpit at Reading.

London: Wandsworth. — Among the successful candidates at the recent final "B.A." examination of the London University were Miss Lilian and Evelyn Oram, twin daughters of Mr. R. R. W. Oram, of Wandsworth Common, and grand-daughters of the late Mr. Richard Oram of East Stonehouse for many years a warm supporter of our Devonport church.

Manchester: Pendleton (Appointment).—The Rev. Neander Anderton, B.A., of Preston, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Pendleton congregation to become their minister.

Manchester: Strangeways. — The Rev. W. R. Shanks, who recently resigned the pulpit of the Unitarian Free Church, Strangeways, in view of the decision to dissolve the congregation, has received a testimonial and a cheque for a substantial sum from members of the congregation. The subscribers to the testimonial refer in sympathetic terms to the time of exceptional difficulty through which the minister and congregation have had to pass owing to causes outside of their control, and to their feeling that through it all he, as minister, was always earnestly desirous of doing what lay in his power to make the church a success, and express their best wishes for the future welfare of himself, wife, and family. Mrs. Shanks has also been presented with a gold bracelet and apurse from the ladies' congregational society.

Oldham.—On Christmas Day the usual congregational party was held in the school, Mr. Kinworthy, the president of the congregation being in the chair. The Rev. J. A. Pearson addressed the meeting and referred to certain important work which he hoped to see carried out during the coming year. On Sunday evening, December 27, Mr. Pearson reviewed the year's work in a sermon entitled "Carried Forward." On New Year's Eve a "Social" was held in the school to speed the parting year and welcome the new; whilst Saturday, January 2, saw the school crowded with merry children and happy parents who had again assembled to enjoy the increasingly interesting scholars' party. Mr. Pearson's first sermon of the year had for its subject the late Dr. Brooke Herford, whose manly career and Christian work were described in a most interesting manner. A large number of parents and scholars were present at the school in the afternoon of Sunday, January 3, to witness the annual distribution of prizes to 48 of the scholars whose attendance at the Sunday-school has averaged over 90 per cent. for the past year.

Pentre: S. Wales (Presentation).—On Tuesday evening, December 29, at a social meeting of the congregation, the Rev. D. Davies presiding, presentations were made to the Rev D. Rees (former minister of the church) and to his wife and daughter, in recognition of their services. Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible," and Driver's "Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament" were given to Mr. Rees; a silver tea-service to Mrs. Rees; and an ornamental clock, on behalf of the Sunday-school, to their daughter. Warm appreciation was expressed of Mr. Rees' five years of service in the Rhondda, and the best wishes for his welfare in his new sphere of labour.

Reading (Appointment).—The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A., of Hackney, has accepted the invitation of the Reading congregation to become their minister.

Sheffield.—The Upper Chapel and Upperthorpe congregations begin the new year by uniting to publish a joint calendar, The Sheffield Unitarian Monthly Record, which tells also of the Attercliffe Mission.

Stannington.—The usual New Year's Eve festival was held, when about 180 teachers and friends partook of tea. After an address by the minister, the Rev. Iden Payne, the evening was spent in an enjoyable manner in social conversation, and the singing of Christmas hymns, songs, &c. At midnight the gathering was brought to a close with prayer and the benediction.

DEATHS.

CROOK.—On December 29, at Ivy House, Swinton, Lancashire, Margaret Hannah Crook, aged 78 years, widow of Henry Crook, late of Ravenswood, Bolton, and eldest daughter of the late Rev. George Harris, of Newcastle-on-Tyne.

JONES.—January 4, at 11, Bertram-road, Liverpool, aged 52 years, Bertha Jones, wife of Edward Dukinfield Jones.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE publish this week the first of a series of articles on Joseph Priestley, by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, his successor in the pulpit of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, in view of the celebration of the centenary of Priestley's death, on Feb. 6.

THE seventy-fourth anniversary of the Brahmo Somaj will be celebrated in London at Burlington-road, Bayswater, W. (Mr. R. N. Ray's rooms), on the 23rd and 24th inst., according to the following programme:—Saturday, Jan. 23, 8.30 p.m., Opening Service, conducted by Mr. V. A. Sukhthankar, of Manchester College, Oxford; 9 p.m., Discussion, led by Mr. B. C. Ghosh, Cambridge, on "The Doctrines of Sin and Salvation in various Theologies." Sunday, Jan. 24, 12 noon, Divine Service: Minister, Mr. Sukhthankar; 3 p.m., Conference: Address by Mr. B. C. Ghosh, "The New Dispensation and the Brahmo Somaj," to be followed by other speeches; 5 p.m., Divine Service: Minister, Mr. B. C. Ghosh. Not only members of the Brahmo Somaj, but any friends in sympathy with the movement, are cordially invited to be present.

WRITING in the Daily News, Mr. A. L. Lilley gives some interesting particulars of the Abbé Loisy, whose work "L'Évangile et l'Église," has been both translated into English and placed on the list of forbidden books by the Congregation of the Index. M. Loisy is now forty-six years of age; he comes of peasant stock, and was for two years a village curé. But his ability being recognised, he was sent to study in Paris, where he displayed a special aptitude for Biblical studies. In 1883 he was appointed Professor of Sacred Scripture in the Catholic Institute of Paris, a post from which he was removed on the publication of an article criticising the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. Six years later he was given his present Chair in the School of Higher Studies at the Sorbonne. Suspicion, poverty, and continuous ill-health have been unable to subdue his humble but courageous and uncompromising spirit. The terms of the decree of December 16 are not yet known, but it is understood that the Roman Inquisition has condemned portions of his work as heretical. If this be so, it will greatly increase the difficulties of the many Liberal Catholics who desire to remain in loyal unity with the Roman Church without further sacrifice of conscience.

DR. DRUMMOND'S promised work on "The Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel" was published yesterday for the Hibbert Trustees by Messrs. Williams and Norgate. It is a substantial volume of over five hundred pages, embodying the lectures given by Dr. Drummond on this subject in Manchester College. It is dedicated to his own teachers in the college:—

> In reverent and loving memory of John James Tayler and James Martineau, who, while themselves fearlessly seeking for truth, taught others to follow evidence with their own independent judgment, however imperfect, and to "Call no man Master upon earth."

And in the preface Dr. Drummond tells how his two teachers, "men very dissimilar in mental constitution, but strongly attached to one another, and alike in their large attainments, the candour and simplicity of their judgments, and their conviction that the great realities of faith rested upon something far more profound than the critical investigation of documents," were agreed in rejecting the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel. And he adds:—

> Naturally, I should have been biassed in favour of their view, and yet I have never been able to see the evidence with their eyes. Nevertheless, I have not been moved by reaction against them, for I have never wavered in my reverence for them, and I have every inclination to suspect the soundness of my judgment when opposed to theirs.

Dr. Drummond's conclusion after the most careful and elaborate consideration of the evidence is in favour of the Johannine authorship. We hope before long to publish a full review of this book, which New Testament scholars of whatever school will study with the keenest interest, and which Dr. Drummond's old students will welcome with special gratitude.

AMONG the most interesting developments of the Summer School work in the Society of Friends, has been the formation of a Union for Social Study. The scope of this Union has been gradually widening, till at the end of last year it secured the services of Mr. Percy Alden as organising secretary and lecturer. Mr. Alden is well known among social workers; he was formerly Warden of Mansfield House, and is now the honorary secretary of the Lord Mayor's Committee for the unemployed. In this connection it is interesting to note that the Union recently offered a prize for a paper on the best practical methods for dealing with the unemployed. This was awarded to Miss Lucy Gardner, of Leeds, whose thoughtful essay appeared in the Friends' Quarterly Examiner for October last.

MR. F. LAWSON DODD, whose instructive address on "Religion and Environment" we reported a fortnight ago, regards the system of lay preaching as a natural stage in the progress from priestly control to such a ministry as will be in intimate relation to modern thought, and so able to afford direct and adequate guidance for the life of the present race of humanity. If this be so, the function and work of the lay preacher require to be defined and established on a firm basis. That some such need is recognised in the Society of Friends is shown by the settlement at Woodbrooke. The same problem has been engaging the attention of the Congregationalists. In May of last year the Union resolved—

> That in every county or district there should be in connection with the Union an Association of Lay Preachers, whose work should be fostered by the Union as an integral part of its own operation.

In October the Union held a conference on this subject, and since then funds have been raised for the purpose of the improvement and extension of this unprofessional ministry. It is now proposed to hold local conferences at various centres throughout the country. The further suggestion is made that the office of lay preaching needs a special preparation, such as may be afforded by lectures, classes for the study of Scripture and biography, and instruction in the art of preaching. In addition, book lists are to be prepared, with suggested courses of reading.

OUR own churches have long ago done something for the organisation of this auxiliary ministry, which is so essential to the effective operation of the minister at large. It can hardly be a fortuitous circumstance that the problem, whether in its spiritual form or in its machinery, should be prominent in the counsels of religious bodies of very different opinions or historical traditions. Indeed, were one talking by the fireside it would be natural, while speculating on the underlying cause, to suggest that this may be found in a shifting of interest from theological thought to the concrete facts of life, or from the scholasticism of the study to the aspiration of common humanity. One might even carry the suggestion further, and say that a recognition of the simple social instincts is found in the proposal to throw this lay ministry widely open to women as well as to men. This movement from priest to minister unordained, from minister to man, from (male) man to human, is a discovery that life alone has a message to life, or may even be described as a rediscovery in terms of emotion and thought of the Euclidean, "the whole is greater than its part."

THE Preston Corporation, which owns six licensed houses, has appointed a committee to consider the advisability of inserting a condition in the agreement of tenancy with a view to making these houses more generally useful and beneficial to the community. Dr. Rigg, who made the proposal, urged that with the results of recent experiments before them, such as those of the Public-house Trusts, they ought to insist that a board should be exhibited in every room used by the public and in the window also, setting forth the price at which tea, coffee, &c., might be obtained, so that people might be encouraged to ask for them and might be secured against extravagant charges.

The January Cornhill contains a short paper by the late Sir John Robinson on "Charles Dickens and the Guild of Literature and Art," the proof of which, the Editor says in a note, reached him on the last day of his life, so that it did not receive his final revision. Sir John was associated with Dickens in the Guild, and writes with vivid memory of their meetings. Mrs. Richmond Ritchie's "Blackstick Paper," in this number, is about the two Miss Berrys, "Horace Walpole's well-loved strawberries." In Scribner's will be found a description, with some striking pictures, of "A New Valley of Wonders," in Southern Utah, called by the Mormons "Little Zion," and said to rival even the Yosemite and the Yellowstone in beauty and grandeur.

THE January number of our Welsh contemporary, Yr Ymofynydd, contains a warm tribute (in English) to the Rev. Stephenson Hunter, a former Principal of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, from the pen of one of his old students, the Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon, of the Stamford Hill Congregational Church, London. A portrait of Mr. Hunter is also given. Born near Belfast in 1803, he was for thirty years Unitarian minister at Wolverhampton before his appointment at Carmarthen in 1860. It was on the death of Dr. Lloyd, in 1863, that he succeeded to the Principalship. In 1875 he died. Mr. Morgan Gibbon draws an attractive picture of the Principal as a teacher, and then proceeds:—

Of course the majority of us were separated from the Principal by a wide gulf of creed. He was Unitarian; we were Congregationalists. At least we heard from others that he was a Unitarian. We even read on the notice board of the Unitarian Chapel that a Rev. Stephenson Hunter was its minister. But sometimes we did not recognise the "Rev. Stephenson Hunter" in our Mr. Hunter. Never by word or look did he tamper with any man's orthodoxy. Yet he could not prevent the outflow of influences, which without his knowing and without our knowing changed the spirit of our orthodoxy. As we read St. John's Gospel in his room, as he prayed with us in the library, a gracious benignant presence enfolded us. Without ceding a single jot or tittle of his creed, every man was constrained to admit to himself that more than one path leads to the Temple, and that Christianity, like the New Jerusalem, has many gates.

Contact with men like Hunter and Higginson, while it invalidated no man's evangelicalism, led to the shedding of all "damnatory clauses," as Mr. Gladstone said. The declaration of a prominent Free Church leader a few years ago, that he could not pray with a Unitarian, must have taken old Carmarthen men with a surprise akin to terror. For to be candid, in our College devotion Hunter was almost the only man with whom we did pray. . . . With such perfect Christian gentlemen as Morgan, Higginson, and Hunter, the Carmarthen men of those far-off Victorian days had reason to be grateful. The longer I live, the more I value what I received from them, and I greatly appreciate the kindness which has permitted me to lay this wreath on my old master's grave.

SERVICES AT CAMBRIDGE.

SIR,—It will interest several of your readers to learn that, following upon Mr. Carpenter's Lectures, the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have made arrangements for a series of religious services at Cambridge. The services will be held on Sunday mornings at 11.30 at the hall, 10, Emmanuel street. The opening service will be on Sunday, January 24, when the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter will preach. He will be followed by Dr. Drummond on January 31. The Revs. J. Edwin Odgers, L. P. Jacks, and Henry Gow will be the other preachers during the present university term.

Mr. Claude H. B. Epps, Christ's College, Cambridge, is acting as local hon. secretary for the services, and he will welcome the assistance of students and others in making the services known among their friends. Those who are able to render help in singing the hymns are especially desired to make themselves known to Mr. Epps, or to Mr. Booth, also of Christ's College.

Essex Hall, London, Jan. 12, 1904.

HEAR BOTH SIDES.

SINCE the Rev. Hugh C. Wallace, minister of the David Thomas Memorial Church, Bristol, has thought fit to send to the British Weekly the following letter, to which, since we saw the original, he has added an offensive tail, we will give him the further advertisement of this publication.

Mr. Wallace sent us at Christmas the letter in question, saying he would be glad if we could see our way to publish it, adding:—"At first I thought of sending it elsewhere, but it occurred to me that it would be but fair to let you have it first." We replied that we had no desire to publish such a letter, and that if he was bent on publishing, he had better send it elsewhere—or words to that effect.

This is the letter, as it appeared in last week's British Weekly:—

UNITARIANS AND THE VIRGIN BIRTH.

To the Editor of THE BRITISH WEEKLY.

DEAR SIR,—Writing to the Daily Chronicle, an Anglican Clergyman declares that the Rev. William E. Addis, of Oxford, stated a short time ago that "The argument for the Virgin Birth cannot be put in a legal form convincing to a jury of unbelievers. It implies certain pre-suppositions, and only when Christ is accepted as the Man without sin, as the Risen Lord, and as the Very and Eternal God, the belief in the Virgin Birth becomes almost inevitable, and is clinched by the sufficient evidence of St. Luke. It is not enough to give the reason fair play; the heart also has its reasons, and it has enough to make the venture of faith and to rest for life and death, for time and eternity in Christ, the Son of Man and the Son of God."

I believe that Mr. Addis is one of the tutors at Manchester College, which, if I am rightly informed, is entirely supported by Unitarian subscriptions. With that fact in mind, I would like to ask if the above teaching is any more consistent with Unitarianism than that of Mr. Beeby is with Episcopacy?

A few days ago I sent the above to the Unitarian organ, the INQUIRER, but, in spite of its much-boasted liberality, and its oft-declared willingness to hear both sides, the editor did not see his way clear to insert it. We now know that Unitarians, in spite of all protestations to the contrary, can sit on the safety valve and stifle discussion.—Yours faithfully, HUGH C. WALLACE.

January 2, 1904.

[We understand that Unitarians claim considerable liberty of opinion on such points.—ED. B.W.]

Of Mr. Wallace we need not take any further notice, but the editor of the British Weekly is perfectly right. Unitarians do claim liberty of opinion, and, as regards belief in the Virgin Birth of Jesus, many Unitarians of former days have held it, on what they regarded as clear Scriptural authority. Such a question, however, ought not to arise in regard to the position of a tutor in Manchester College, from whom no dogmatic test is exacted. The College is maintained by Unitarians, not as a seminary for the teaching of dogmatic Unitarianism, but as a Free School of Theology. Mr. Addis holds his position in Manchester College not because he is a Unitarian (we judge from his recent writings that he is no longer a Unitarian), but because he is a distinguished Old Testament scholar, and an admirable and devoted tutor.

THE PRIESTLEY CENTENARY

I.

JOSEPH PRIESTLEY, SCHOOLBOY AND STUDENT.

ALL who revere the name and cherish the memory of Priestley are looking forward to the Centenary Memorial Volume, which is promised us by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. There is no man living who is more competent than Mr. Gordon, or, probably, in any degree equally competent, to write of eighteenth century Unitarianism and Unitarian divines. It is not the purpose of these articles to anticipate the forthcoming biography, nor does the writer pretend to relate the story with any fresh details, or otherwise than it may be found in the old and easily accessible sources. But as the readers of "Memoirs and Correspondence," edited by Mr. Rutt, are few, and, perhaps, not many the readers even of the unedited autobiography, it has been thought well in preparation for the approaching commemoration of Priestley's death, to put in brief form the story of his life, as told in great part by himself.

The staple industry of the West Riding of Yorkshire, long before it became a thriving home of the iron and engineering trade, was the weaving of woollen cloth. Before the introduction of steam power this was carried on in the homes of the people; and through all the villages for miles round about Leeds may be seen the old stone cottages, whose long low window in the upper story shows it to have belonged of old time to a weaver, whose loom stood under the window to obtain all the light available for his work. In such a cottage home at Fieldhead, a hamlet between Birstal and Brightlington, and some six miles from either Leeds or Bradford, was Priestley born on March 13, 1733 O.S. (i.e., 1734, if the year be reckoned to begin on January 1, and not, as was still the use in England, last of all countries save Russia to follow the lead of Rome, on March 25).

His father, Jonas, was "a weaver and cloth dresser." He wove the cloth and made a smooth surface to it, two trades which have been long distinct, and took the pieces of the week's work on ass-back to the Sunday market, then held on Leeds Bridge, to sell to the merchants. His mother was the daughter of Joseph Swift, a farmer of Shafton, six miles south-east of Wakefield. Within six years of the birth of her first child, who was to make the name of his humble parents celebrated throughout the world wherever the history of science was told and theology studied as freely as any other science, the poor mother bore five more children, and then, in the bitter winter of 1739–40, she succumbed and died. Of her the son, writing more than half a century later, could remember little; the less that he had lived much with his grandfather Swift, so relieving the crowded cottage and hard worked parents of the care of him. But she found time amidst all her labours to teach him the Assembly's Catechism, and at four years of age, his brother Thomas tells us, he "could repeat it without missing a word." Let us hope it was not "The Shorter Catechism," with its terrible stumbling-blocks for much older folk, "What is Effectual Calling?" and so forth, but that shorter still and yet too long, "for Young Children." But, writes Dr. Calamy, "It is well known that we have many children at four and five years among us, not to say younger, whose memories retain it (i.e., the former) most exactly," and no doubt Joseph was as quick to learn and remember as any of them.

After his mother's death he returned home, his brothers taking his place at their grandfather's. A sister of his father's, married to a man of some property, and herself childless, presently adopted him; and it is perhaps to this Mrs. Keighley, "a truly pious and excellent woman," and to her husband, "distinguished for his zeal for religion and for his public spirit," that we are specially indebted for the Joseph Priestley known to us, who might otherwise have been of necessity early set to help his father at the loom, and grown up without the education by which he was fitted for his work in life. By this aunt he was sent to several schools in the neighbourhood, and "at the age of sixteen had acquired a pretty good knowledge of Greek and Latin," and in holiday time learned Hebrew of a Dissenting minister who lived at Heckmondwick, hard by.

The home was a religious one of the old Puritan kind. There were morning and evening prayers daily. "The Sabbath was kept with peculiar strictness. No victuals were cooked on that day in the family. No member of it was permitted to walk out for recreation, but the whole of the day was spent at the public meeting, or at home in reading, meditation, and prayer, in the family or in the closet. We were all catechised in public till we were grown up, servants as well as others; the minister always expounded the Scriptures with as much regularity as he preached; and there was hardly a day in the week in which there was not some meeting of one or other part of the congregation."

"Many persons of better health and spirits," he writes, would have "been disgusted with these strict forms of religion, on which account I am far from recommending the same strictness to others"; but he was a delicate lad, so much so that the hopes which his aunt entertained of his becoming a minister were given up. This is a somewhat curious statement, as showing that the occupation of a minister, really, as statistics prove, an exceptionally healthy one, was then considered so arduous as to require more than ordinary strength on the part of those engaged in it. It certainly was not the preliminary studies they were afraid of, for the lad straightway set himself to learn French, Italian, and German in order to qualify himself for a position in a foreign counting-house, and made such progress in the first and last—the two which presented greater difficulty—that he was able to translate and write letters in those languages for an uncle who was a merchant. A post was actually engaged for him at Lisbon, and preparations made for his voyage, when his health improved, and he returned to his original purpose to become a minister of religion.

The religion with which alone he was then acquainted was of a very different kind from the confident optimism and cheerful trust which distinguished the faith of his later years. Its central doctrine was that of the necessity of the "new birth" or conversion. And while to some souls this is a source of strength and joy, to others, as the present writer can testify, it is productive of a misery which only youthfulness and animal spirits prevent from becoming chronic. "Not being able to satisfy myself," says Priestley (and, oh, how many can say the same!), "that I had experienced anything of this new birth, I felt occasionally such distress of mind as it is not in my power to describe, and which I still look back upon with horror." And he continues, as will many of us converts with him to Unitarianism, "The remembrance of what I sometimes felt in that state of ignorance and darkness, gives me a peculiar sense of the value of rational principles of religion, of which I can give but an imperfect description to others."

Yet there are compensations, as all history testifies, even for the terrors of rigid Calvinism, and Priestley looked back with thankfulness upon the religious influences to which he was subject as a child. Moreover, his aunt, with a happy and not uncommon inconsistency, "was far from confining salvation to those who thought as she did on religious subjects, and her house was a meeting-place for all the Dissenting ministers of the neighbourhood, even those who were the most obnoxious on account of their heresy, were almost as welcome to her, if she thought them honest and good men (which she was not unwilling to do), as any others." So here he met "the most heretical ministers of the neighbourhood," among them Mr. Walker, of Leeds, who, little as either of them could have suspected it, was even then preparing the way for Priestley to become the first avowed Unitarian minister of Mill Hill Chapel. Mr. Wicksteed records an oral tradition, which he came across seventy years ago in the early years of his ministry at Leeds, that a number of families had seceded from the congregation in consequence of a sermon in which he denied the doctrine of original sin. And he adds that a perusal of the only sermon printed by Mr. Walker—that preached at the opening of the New Chapel at Wakefield—makes it clear "that the worship of God in Trinity and the approach to Him by Atonement formed no part of his belief." As guests of a lady who was known for her strict orthodoxy, these gentlemen were no doubt very cautious of any expression of opinion which might give offence or pain. Still, the mere association with them was not without its effect on the hitherto cramped intelligence of young Priestley. He began to think for himself, however timidly at first, and the consequences came to light when he applied for admission to membership in the Independent Chapel at which he had been brought up. The old minister and his aunt were as desirous of it as himself, but the elders stood out against him, "because when they interrogated me on the subject of the sin of Adam, I appeared not to be quite orthodox, not thinking that all the human race were liable to the wrath of God, and the pains of hell for ever, on account of that sin only; for such was the question put to me." One would think it impossible! Dr. Priestley in his old age must have forgotten just what the question amounted to. But, no. There it stands in the famous Catechism, learnt of millions of children: "All mankind, by the fall of our first parents, lost communion with God, are under his wrath and curse, and so made liable to all miseries in this life, to death itself, and to the pains of hell for ever." So he had learnt at his mother's knees; and so—it was the first brave step in a brave intellectual life—so he did not believe, and would not profess that he did.

In these two years between leaving school and going to college, he was not idle. Never was, indeed, to the last day of his life, on which day indeed he was busy correcting proofs and dictating. Now he was occupied learning mathematics of one Dissenting minister, teaching to another Hebrew, studying by himself logic and philosophy, and adding Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic to his already large stock of languages. Shorthand he had already learnt out of school hours.

When the time came for his commencing the special studies for the ministry, the serious question arose to which of the several "Academies" he should be sent, and his aunt and all his relations, being strict Calvinists, were naturally anxious that he should go where he would be taught the orthodox faith. Plasterers' Hall, which in 1755 became Mile End Academy, was just such a place; and, moreover, they employed there a most ingenious device for keeping out any insidious germs of heresy. The student on entering was required to sign his assent to ten articles containing as in a sort of theological pemmican, the essential doctrines of Calvinism. But it is found that many are willing and even ardent believers before they begin to study, who decline from the faith as they learn to know it better. So it was the rule here that a subscription was to be renewed every six months; as if a clergyman were required to read himself in by reciting the Articles of the Church of England, and declaring his assent to them, not only on taking a benefice, but twice a year as long as he remained in it, which, I fancy would be a sore trial to many who can face the ordeal occasionally with more or less disgust.

Priestley however, wouldn't sign even once. So there he couldn't go, and had it not been for the good offices of his old schoolmaster, Mr. Kirkby, and the high repute of Dr. Doddridge, who had just founded an academy at Daventry, and the great respect in which that famous divine was held by his stepmother, who had formerly served him as housekeeper, the ministry must needs again have been given up, and some other mode of life been adopted. These various influences, however, happily prevailed upon his aunt, and so in September, 1752, in the nineteenth year of his life, he was entered as the first pupil—so he thought, but his name is fourth on the list—of this small seminary for the training of Dissenting ministers. A miserable little place it must have seemed in the eyes of neighbouring clergy, who had grown up, taking for granted the venerable traditions, the ancestral wealth, the beauty and the dignity of the old colleges at Oxford and Cambridge. There was nothing grand about this building, nor did any sacred associations hallow its homeliness. But while the lamp of learning burnt low in the ancient universities during the eighteenth century, their gates kept fast closed against all who were too intelligent not to doubt the doctrines of the Established Church, or too honest to conceal their doubts, it burnt bright and clear, tiny though the flame might be, in obscure and poor haunts like this of Daventry. As Priestley proudly, and not untruly boasted, at a later time, to the Prime Minister of England:

"Shutting the doors of the universities against us and keeping the means of learning to yourselves, you may think to keep us in ignorance and so less capable to give you disturbance. But though ignominiously and unjustly excluded from the seats of learning, and driven to the expedient of providing at a great expense, for scientific education among ourselves, we have had this advantage, that our institutions, being formed in a more enlightened age, are more liberal and therefore better calculated to answer the purpose of a truly liberal education. Thus while your universities resemble pools of stagnant water secured by dams and mounds, ours are like rivers which taking their natural course, fertilise a whole country." Rivulets, perhaps he had better have written, but who that has read anything of the Oxford and Cambridge of those days can deny their stagnant condition in which then they existed, unreformed and from within irreformable.

Of the academy at Daventry, and how religion and learning took up their abode under its humble roof, how Liberty, expelled from the august mansions where it should have been welcomed, found asylum there, how the little band of brothers, young tutors and young students, lived and worked together in freest intercourse of thought, differing in opinion and agreeing in fullest toleration and respect for each other, must be told in my next article.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

THE second volume of the Cambridge Modern History, dealing with "The Reformation," was issued from the University Press this week. Vol. 1 on "The Renaissance," and Vol. 7 on "The United States" are already published, and were reviewed in THE INQUIRER of February 21 and October 31 last year. In this second volume the section on Luther is by Dr. T. M. Lindsay, Principal of the Free Church College at Glasgow. Dr. Fairbairn writes on "Calvin and the Reformed Church," and the concluding chapter on "Tendencies of European Thought in the Age of the Reformation." Mr. A. F. Pollard writes on the "Conflict of Creeds and Parties in Germany" and on the "Religious War in Germany"; also on "The Reformation under Edward VI." The chapter on Henry VIII. is by Dr. James Gairdner.

THE real greatness of a nation lies in the observance of moral law and the time-honoured precepts of the ancient prophets.

LITERATURE.

THE DOCTRINES OF THE FALL AND ORIGINAL SIN.

"FROM a woman," says the Son of Sirach, "was the beginning of sin." The ambiguous word "beginning" lends itself equally to two positions, for it may mean that the first sin was the cause of all subsequent sins, or it may only mean that it was first in order of time. This may serve as an illustration of the questions considered in the book now under notice.*

The field of inquiry is one which the writer has already made his own. He gives us here the literary material out of which he fashioned his Hulsean Lectures on "The Origin and Propagation of Sin" (1901-2). From this separate treatment the book, as a composition, somewhat suffers. It shows not a little of the disorder of the workshop. The author turns over his stores, as they lie before him in the mass and in the rough. He handles them in blocks—each block a separate study. Consequently there is much repetition, much re-opening of questions which the reader has regarded as already settled. So much attention is given to minutiæ that the finished work in parts seems to be half buried under the chips. A more difficult book to read continuously could hardly be found. And yet to say all this is, from another point of view, to speak in highest praise. The book is a book for students, and will be all the more acceptable to them because the author's chief aim is to present the evidence intact, and to keep constructive argument and logical arrangement as much as possible out of view. He knows the danger that lies in the temptation to fit part to part, so as to give coherence to the whole, and to help on with rhetorical touches the general movement, wherever it may seem to flag. For these reasons the result of his labour will be of permanent, and, we may venture to say, of unique value. Mr. Tennant does not profess to be a specialist in any of the branches of learning involved, but his wide and varied scholarship has enabled him to gather in the fruits of first-hand investigation carried out by many hands, and, so far as the history of the earlier growth of these two doctrines is concerned, such a conspectus of its literature has never been furnished, nor probably has the attempt to furnish it ever been made.

For readers generally the main conclusion may be given in the author's own words at the close of the last chapter but one. Here, for the first time, he commits himself to strongly positive statement:—

It must be concluded [he says] from the foregoing chapters that the doctrines of the Fall and of Original Sin have their beginnings, as doctrines, neither in the Old Testament nor in the New, but rather in the Jewish speculation and the uncanonical literature of the age which intervened between them. It was thence that St. Paul derived, ready-made, his teaching as to the influence of the first man and his sin upon the race. It was, therefore, thence also, through St. Paul, that the Christian Church derived the main conception out of which the ecclesiastical doctrine of the origin and propagation of human sinfulness was at length elaborated.

To this may be added an equally positive statement, two pages before, that "strict exegesis fails to find a doctrine of inherited corruption of human nature in St. Paul's theology." In the face of Rom. v. 12-21 this is a bold step to take, but, if the ground is really secure, a very important conclusion follows, for it may then be maintained that the doctrine of the "infection" of human nature (Article IX., Of Original or Birth-sin) is no part of the essence of the Christian revelation. To say that human nature is "corrupt" is very far from saying that in a moment, and by one act, it was "corrupted."

Some interesting points present themselves in the course of the inquiry.

(1) The Fall-story of Gen. vi. 1-4 appears to have been the earliest basis for popular Jewish speculation as to the origin of the world's depravity. It certainly reappears in the Book of Enoch as the more fully developed legend of "The Watchers," whilst the Paradise-story of Gen. iii. is ignored.

(2) The Paradise-story is possibly of Canaanitish origin, and may subsequently have come under Babylonian influence. Its elements are certainly those which belong to the legendary lore of Semitic races generally.

(3) At the same time the closest parallel to the Hebrew Fall-story of Gen. iii. is supplied by Aryan tradition—the Greek legend of Prometheus. The resemblance may, however, be due rather to similar psychological origin than to common Ethnological source, unless, indeed, Phœnician legend may be taken as the link of communication with ancient Greece.

The book ends with a supplementary chapter on the Doctrines of the Fall and Original Sin in the Fathers before Augustine, but this part of the inquiry seems to belong rather to ecclesiastical history than to a literary study of the sources of these doctrines. The writer may be thought to have proved enough for the satisfaction of most minds, if he has conclusively shown that the completed doctrines of the sixteenth century find their point of definite development in Augustine, and their roots in Jewish apocalyptic literature.

It is one of the tendencies of religious thought, released from one extreme, to plunge into another. Perhaps we may expect to see in the next generation a violent reaction from the doctrine of Birth-sin, if not from the scriptural idea of sin altogether. It may be well, then, to remind ourselves here that, if there be no complete theory of the derivation and transmission of sinfulness in the New Testament, there is not the less an unmistakable doctrine of sin therein. Nor does it find a place only in the writings of St. Paul. It forms part of the teaching of Christ, and is nowhere more conspicuous than in the Sermon on the Mount.

THE spirit of self-indulgence reigns too often in the nursery and the family, and parents are content because the children are happy, having denied them the higher happiness implied in a training to the vigour of a self-denying will.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE first place in this month's Contemporary is given to an article on Herbert Spencer by Dr. Fairbairn, who describes him as one of that brilliant group in the Victorian era who owed nothing to any University, J. S. Mill, G. H. Lewes, H. T. Buckle, Tyndall, and Huxley—to whom Darwin is added, for on his own confession his time at Cambridge was wasted. Lewes Dr. Fairbairn describes as "the most accomplished amateur of the nineteenth century." The relation between Spencer and Darwin is admirably described. Spencer's generalisations on evolution began before Darwin's work was published.

It was Darwin's observations, especially as described in the "Origin of Species," which brought Spencer's theory down from the clouds and set it amongst the solid facts believed of men. But it was Spencer's large generalisations and speculative genius that so formulated the doctrine as to make it credible to the scientific mind.

Another article deserving of special attention is that by Mrs. Bosanquet, on "Physical Degeneration and the Poverty Line." Mr. Charles Booth's admissions in his recent volume are quoted, to show how uncertain as a standard of measurement in the matter of poverty is the money income of a family:—"In these bad streets there is generally money going; it is the way of spending it that is amiss." "Everywhere they suffer more from bad feeding than under-feeding." "They are very poor, but earn plenty of money—it is the drink." Mrs. Bosanquet urges the importance of getting at the mothers, and by every means teaching them the elementary rules of management, and especially of feeding their babies and young children—for it is in the first years that most of the seeds of misery and physical degeneration are sown. Thus it is not free meals at the schools that will remedy the evil. There is also a second valuable article by D. S. Cairns, on "Christianity and the Modern World," and Mr. F. W. Pethick-Lawrence proposes the taxation of foreign investments as a better way than Mr. Chamberlain's out of our fiscal troubles.

We noted last week the two articles in the Nineteenth Century and After on the Education question. There is also an important article by Sir Robert Giffen on "Ineffectual Preferences."

The Independent Review opens with a forcible editorial, "Land Monopoly: The Appeal to History," and a plea by Mr. Charles Trevelyan, M.P., for "Land Reform versus Protection." Especially notable is the Rev. J. T. Moffat's article on "Native Labour in South Africa," which is based on thoroughly competent knowledge of the country, and makes a plea not only for the natives but for the general body of settlers in the country, who have its natural industries to maintain, and suffer from the attempt to rush the mines at express speed. South Africa "needs the men on her own lands, and not locked up in the mining centres." Mr. H. W. Nevinson's description of "A Ride in Monastir" will also be read with painful interest.

The illustrated article in the Monthly Review is on "The Reconstruction of Karnak," by Mr. John Ward, F.S.A., with a number of striking pictures. In the same number the President of Magdalen has an article on "Tennyson and Dante."

OBITUARY.

ALDERMAN HARRY RAWSON, J.P.

WE briefly recorded last week the death on Thursday morning, Jan. 7, of Mr. Harry Rawson, of Manchester. When he was eighty, in November, 1900, the Watch Committee of the Manchester Corporation, of which he was then chairman, gave a luncheon at the Town Hall in his honour, and presented an address of congratulation and of gratitude for the eminent services he had rendered to his native city. Acknowledging the address, Mr. Rawson said that of late years it had sometimes been suggested to him that he might now fittingly retire from all public services to well-earned rest, but for himself he adopted the sentiment put by Tennyson into the mouth of Ulysses:—

> How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
> To rust unburnish'd, not to shine in use!
> As tho' to breathe were life.

To that spirit of strenuous life, devoted to daily duty, he was true to the last. He had recently suffered from serious illness, but was so far recovered that he was taking up work again, and the very day before his death was in his place at a meeting of the City Council. Less than a month ago he sent us some notes on a subject in which he was keenly interested, the establishment of a Theological Faculty in the Manchester University, saying that it was the first piece of work he had been permitted to do since his illness. It was the last of many acts of kindness which he had shown to THE INQUIRER, having been through a long series of years a valued contributor and a staunch friend. In his eightieth year, Mr. Rawson contributed two articles, published on Aug. 18 and 25, 1900, "Some Reminiscences of a Manchester Unitarian," which friends cannot have failed to recognise at the time as his. We speak of these things now with grateful memories, as one small instance among many, in the full measure of his diligent and faithful life, which make the thought of him now so happy in the sense of completeness, of opportunities of service used to the utmost, of a kindly gracious spirit and the brave integrity of a true manhood, steadfast to the end, ready when the call came quietly to lay down the earthly task—ready, from the very completeness of his service here, for the dawning of the new day.

Harry Rawson was born in Manchester, Nov. 26, 1820, and came (says the Manchester Guardian) of Radical stock, "for his grandfather, who was an ardent politician at Leeds, advocated reforms with an energy so little to the taste of the ruling powers that his imprisonment in York Castle was a consequence. Mr. Rawson's father was a man of superior intelligence for his station in life, but there were imperative reasons why his son should early begin the work of life."

As a boy, after very little schooling, he was apprenticed to Mr. Thomas Forrest, bookseller and printer. Ten years later, he and a fellow-apprentice entered into business on their own account, as Messrs. Johnson and Rawson, and after another ten years took over the old shop in Market-street, where they had served their time. For some thirty years this partnership continued, but since 1885 Messrs. H. Rawson and Co.'s business has been carried on at 16, New Brown-street. "Diligent in business," careful of every detail, Mr. Rawson never let his private concerns interfere with the wider interests of life, and from early manhood, by a wise apportionment of time and prompt attention to every duty as it came, he succeeded in rendering a large amount of public service.

As a boy he attended the Sunday-school connected with the old Mosley-street chapel, of which the Rev. J. J. Tayler was the minister. While still a boy he became a teacher and then librarian, and in 1836 saw the work transferred to the new Lower Mosley-street schools, while three years later the Upper Brook-street church was opened, where for the first time he heard James Martineau preach. Eager for knowledge, he attended evening classes at the Mechanics' Institute, and at twenty-one was made a governor. On the board he was especially active in promoting classes for girls and women. Those early efforts of self-improvement established one of the chief interests of his life, the promotion of popular education by means both of schools and public libraries. His connection with the Mechanics' Institute was unbroken to the end, and its development into the great Technical Schools was to him a matter of the utmost satisfaction. He served on the committee of the Whitworth Institute, and in 1895 was appointed a life governor on the Council of Owens College. He was for many years a member of the Committee of Manchester College, and had been chairman. At the time of the removal of the college to Oxford he rendered services of special value on the building committee. Of the Home Missionary College, also, he was a loyal supporter and a member of the committee, from its establishment as a board in 1854. In 1880 he served as President.

It was in 1856 that Mr. Rawson first entered the City Council, and quickly made his mark as a clear-sighted, public-spirited member. Then began his efforts on behalf of Free Public Libraries, and particularly for the establishment of branch libraries, which were so fruitful of public good. It was a fitting crown to such efforts when he was appointed chairman of the Council of the Rylands Library. In those early days also Mr. Rawson served on the Watch Committee, and his advocacy of Sunday bands in the parks drew down upon him the reprobation of the narrow Sabbatarians. Mr. Rawson's first term of service in the Council was unfortunately interrupted in 1860, by what the Manchester Guardian calls "a painful incident, which had, however, the effect of showing the thorough honesty and honour of Mr. Rawson's character." He had invested his capital in a firm of paper-makers in the South, and lost it by their fall. He resigned his seat in the Council, "with the express object of giving up everything to pay debts of which he had not incurred a farthing." How this incident was regarded in Manchester was shown by the presentation to him in the following year of an address together with twelve hundred guineas, "as a token of respect for his public services and of esteem for his private worth." Before long Mr. Rawson was able to return to his place in the Council, but a serious illness in 1864 led to his retirement, and it was only after twenty years, in 1884, that he again took up that special work, and in 1894 was made an alderman. To the honour done him on his eightieth birthday we have already alluded. He took a leading part on the Watch Committee, in the recent regeneration of the police force. He had more than once gratefully declined the offer of the mayoralty, and last year the highest honour was conferred upon him of the Freedom of the City.

In the same spirit in which he served his native city Mr. Rawson gave himself ungrudgingly to the work of the religious community to which he belonged. In the reminiscences above referred to he records his great indebtedness to the Rev. John James Tayler, under whose ministrations he grew up to manhood, and to Dr. J. R. Beard, with whom he worked and worshipped at Strangeways Chapel, as later also with the Rev. Brooke Herford. For two short periods Mr. Rawson was a member of the Cross-street congregation, and then for the last twenty years or more, living at Eccles, of the Monton congregation. But it was not to any individual congregation that his services were confined; he was one of the most trusted and influential laymen of the body.

As a boy in Mr. Forrest's shop he came to know many of the ministers of the Manchester district, and when in 1840 Manchester College returned from York to its own city, both teachers and students brought fresh stimulus and added to the circle of his friends. With the latter especially he worked in the Lower Mosley-street schools, and he had the most affectionate remembrance of Travers Madge, not only as worker in the schools, but for a brief period as a working printer with his firm.

In the forties Mr. Rawson was secretary of the Village Missionary Society, and in that capacity, with the Rev. James Yates, paid a visit to the chapels in the Peak district of Derbyshire. His relations with other congregations may be illustrated by the fact that for thirty years he presided over the annual meetings of the Dob Lane Congregation, and in the work of the District Association his interest was unabated to the end. He was an active member of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and in 1887 was elected President.

At a crisis in the history of the Association, in 1876, when there was a controversy over the publication of the works of Theodore Parker, and the late Robert Spears resigned the secretaryship, Mr. Rawson moved the resolution, at the special meeting, which successfully upheld the principle of comprehensive liberality in the administration of the Association; and in doing so expressed his indebtedness to Parker, as the teacher who at a time of serious questioning in his own religious life had saved him from drifting away from the fellowship of the churches.

To Mr. Rawson's connection with the Home Missionary College from its foundation, we have already alluded; he was also one of the founders of the Memorial Hall, and for many years Chairman of the Trustees. In 1899 he wrote an interesting historical sketch telling of the foundation of the Hall and of the principles of its management. For many years he was Treasurer of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, and of its advisory committee he was a trusted member; he was one of the first secretaries of the National Conference.

To the columns of THE INQUIRER, as we have already stated, Mr. Rawson made many contributions. In the Theological Review of April, 1869, there appeared a paper of his on "The Expediency of an Extended Lectionary in Public Worship." To the Manchester Guardian he was also a frequent contributor, especially of memorial notices of local men.

But perhaps the most notable of all the services rendered by Mr. Rawson to our religious community was in connection with work for raising the status of the ministry. His friendship with many ministers and his intimate knowledge of the difficulties of their lives rendered him specially sympathetic in this matter, and he brought all his wide knowledge and business capacity to bear upon it. With the late R. M. Shipman he made a careful and confidential inquiry into the circumstances of ministerial life, and later, at the first meeting of the National Conference at Liverpool in 1882, read the exhaustive paper which led to the establishment of the Ministers' Stipend Sustentation Fund. His services in the management of this fund, and also of the older Augmentation Fund, and in many other confidential ways for the welfare of ministers and congregations, it is impossible to estimate too highly.

In looking back upon such a life of unstinted service, it is pleasant to remember that it was not left without the acknowledgments of abundant honour and affection. Of the city's recognition we have already spoken. His own community also found a voice of gratitude in the presentation of his portrait, painted in 1902 by Sir George Reid, to the trustees of the Memorial Hall.

When last week he passed away, in ripe old age, the testimonies of public and general esteem were of the most impressive character. Monton Church, where the funeral service was held on Monday, prior to cremation at Withington, was filled by a great concourse of people. The city authorities, headed by the Lord Mayor and a large number of the Corporation and the city justices, were there; representatives of the Education Authority, the University, the Whitworth Institute, the Rylands Library, the North Western Branch of the Libraries' Association, Manchester College, the Provincial Assembly, the Memorial Hall, the Home Missionary College, the District Association, and many other societies and public bodies, as well as a large number of personal friends.

An impressive service was conducted by the Rev. Ambrose Bennett, minister of the church, who, in his address, paid a warm tribute of admiration to the work and character of their "beloved and venerated friend." "Mr. Rawson," he said, "was ever modest and of a humble mind. He did not ask for the praise of men, and was not easy in the hearing of it, but he valued deeply the responsive affection of his kind, and it was that which they were met to utter, for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

MISS BARLOW, NEWCTASLE-ON-TYNE.

IT will come as a surprise and shock to many of our ministers and active Unitarian laymen to learn of the lamented death of Miss Barlow, of Newcastle. She had been so long and honourably known in our Household of Faith for her kind and gracious hospitality, and for her deep interest in all things affecting the welfare of our ministers and churches that Newcastle will hardly seem the same now that she is no longer to be seen there. The friends at the Church of the Divine Unity to which she belonged, and in whose welfare she took so deep an interest, will miss her gentle and benevolent face from their midst, and visitors from a distance, who always had a warm welcome from her, will find the old city bereft of one of its cheeriest human personalities. As a young girl when helping her father and mother in that famous stationery establishment which was the resort of all the best men of the old town, she was brought into contact with the most progressive public men of the day, and from them she learned lessons of enlightenment which broadened and deepened her life and enriched it to its closing hours. When the Rev. J. C. Street began his ministry in Newcastle she hastened to make herself known to him, and soon laid the foundations of a friendship which only grew closer and more vital as years passed by. But she clung with unflinching fidelity to the church during the useful ministry of the Rev. A. Payne, and was a constant attendant on the services of the Rev. F. Walters. She was a steady and consistent supporter of the church, and loved everything connected with it. Miss Barlow was one of those modest retiring natures, utterly unselfish, and profoundly sincere, who never sought publicity, or cared to be spoken of in public assemblies, but was always ready to serve, to help a neighbour, to stand by a friend, and notably to lend a helping hand to the needy. Her religion was written in a sweet pure life, and enriched by all the graces which build up the character of a good woman. A daughter obedient, loving, and helpful, a sister always to be counted on for highest and lowliest services, a friend faithful and loyal unto death, she will be missed in many quiet lives and circles in which she was always helpful and beloved. Women like unto her make our Household of Faith so sweet and saintly. She was interred in the old cemetery at Jesmond on Tuesday, January 12, by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, her first pastor and her life-long friend, and his address, full of sympathy and pathos, was listened to with strained attention by a large body of friends who filled the chapel in the old quiet resting-place at Jesmond.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE BUTTERFLY.

AT Thusis there is no lake. A swift river rushes out of the gorge of the Via Mala, and dashes through the valley, on its way to become the Rhine. There are plenty of ruined castles to be seen, and the largest and oldest is on the heights at the entrance of the Via Mala, close to the village. But what interested us most in Thusis wasn't the castles, but the butterflies.

On a hillside just above the village was a beautiful clover field, which was a good place to find them. Butterflies are not very early risers. They like the dew to be dried, and the air warmed by the sun, before they venture forth. And this clover field seemed a favourite place for them to come and take their breakfast. There were blues and coppers, whites and yellows, meadow browns and painted ladies, now and then a yellow swallow-tail or red admiral. The rule was, to be satisfied with two of a kind, but sometimes there would sail by a specimen so much finer than any we had, that the rule had to be suspended. He wasn't always caught. Sometimes just as the net was coming down, he spread his wings and soared out of reach, or flew across the road and lighted far down on the steep bank below, where no one could follow him.

Also the swallows used to catch more than we. They had no rule about stopping at two. And I used to wonder whether the butterfly, if he could choose, wouldn't rather fall into the boy's hands, and be put in a case with his beautiful wings spread, and be admired by everyone who saw him, than be just gobbled by a bird, and there an end of him. But perhaps a butterfly doesn't care about glory, and Westminster Abbey, and would rather just live his life out in the sunshine.

Now as we came back from this clover field one noon, as we were entering the village, there flew out of the trees above our heads a large butterfly. He flew strong and fast. We could hardly tell what he was, only he was larger than anything we had, and gone out of reach. "Do you think he will come back?" said Harold. "I am sure he won't," said I, with thoughts of dinner in my mind.

But he did come back. The next morning we walked along the road leading to the bridge over the river. A little way along this road stood a silver birch, mixed up with some fir trees, whose main branches had been eaten bare in the earlier summer by caterpillars. It was a great resort for butterflies. Never did we pass it without seeing butterflies, and nice kinds too: red admirals, painted ladies, tortoise-shells, by twos or threes clustered on it. We called it the butterfly tree, and always stopped in passing to see what was to be found. A great many of our prizes had come from this tree.

And this morning—oh, what was this great butterfly circling in the sun round its top? Would he light? He came lower and lower. He did light. He opened and shut his wings. He settled himself more comfortably. Surely, surely, it was the same butterfly we saw yesterday. He sat there fanning with his purple-black wings bordered with yellow, a large, fresh Camberwell Beauty. Harold had never seen one before, except in pictures. It took his breath away to see it so near. So near? But after all it was fifteen feet away and the handle of the net was but six. Could we find anything to lengthen it with? Could one climb anywhere? "Do let me run to the hotel for my fishing rod," said Harold. But the hotel was ten minutes away. Twenty minutes, half an hour, perhaps—no, it was hopeless to expect a butterfly to stay so long. Better stay on the chance of his coming within range.

So we waited five minutes, ten minutes, and the butterfly waited. "Oh, if I had only gone for the rod at first! You wait and watch him. I'll go now," and Harold was off like an arrow.

Would you believe it? The butterfly still waited. He lazily opened and shut his wings. He rose a little way, and settled again. He had no sort of fear of what a boy could do to him. And he waited till Harold came back. He waited while the butterfly net was fastened to the long bamboo. He obligingly moved to where the net was less likely to be caught in the branches. Harold took the pole. Then a misgiving came over him. He was really very tired and very excited. "You strike," he said. "I know I shall miss."

The net rose to the tree-top. It seemed over the butterfly. It came down, and the butterfly spread his indignant wings and took his flight swift and straight over the tree-tops.

After all, if he had been caught, it wouldn't have been very satisfactory.

As we went back, Harold asked, "Won't you come to the tree again this afternoon?"

"Yes, if you will wait till three o'clock."

About two Harold began to get restless. "Don't you think I might go alone, now?" he said.

Harold is a very careful boy, but then he was only a lent boy, as one may say, and one always feels a double responsibility for what belongs to other people. Still I did not see what harm could come to him, and he started. I was just thinking of going to him when the door opened. There was Harold with a look in his face, not of triumph, not of joy, but of something deeper as of something unrealisable, something transcendent having happened.

"What is it?" I said.

"I have got him!" he replied.

And this was satisfactory, because he had done it himself.

That evening, Harold wrote a letter to his little sister, which as nearly as I can remember was like this:—

DEAR HILDA,—I have got such a splendid Camberwell Beauty to day, and I got it all myself. And I have nearly a hundred butterflies, and some are new kinds such as we don't have in England. And they are every one for you, to go into your collection.

HAROLD.

There are two morals to this little story. One is, if you keep on going to the butterfly tree, and try again and again, you will at last succeed.

The other is, if you keep on going to the butterfly tree, and run into danger again and again, some day you will be caught. Both these morals are true, only one is for the boys, and the other for the butterflies.

THE WEALTH OF SERVICE.

In Memoriam: HARRY RAWSON.

IT has been well said that the real tragedy of life is to be found not so much in the startling and calamitous events to which we are all liable as in the "great refusals" which most of us make. Not in the misfortunes which happen to us, not in the mistakes which we make, but in the neglect of lofty ideals, whose power we have felt, but upon which we have cravenly turned our backs, are to be found the landmarks of failure and the real elements of tragedy. That a man should in early life feel, as so many of us do, the claims upon him of some lofty and disinterested ideal, and be stirred by it to a generous enthusiasm, and then that the enthusiasm should slowly wane, the ideal lose its hold upon him, and its place be taken by mean ambition and selfish cares; that each year as it passes should leave him less of a spiritual being and more of a mere comfort-seeking animal; that is the great catastrophe in which so many lives, once full of promise, seem to end. The pity of it is indeed unspeakable, but it is so common that we rarely fully realise its sadness. When, however, the spectacle is presented to us of a long life, early illuminated by some noble purpose, and steadfast to the end in the pursuit of its ideal, then our faith in human nature revives. In such a case, though little may have been won of the wealth the world so dearly loves, though continuous toil may have left but little opportunity for the pleasures it so eagerly seeks, though no place among the great ones of the earth may have been achieved, we feel that a life has been lived which was worth living, and stand rebuked for our own faint-heartedness and selfishness.

Such are some of the thoughts which have come to us while pondering the life record of the honoured friend who has just departed from us. Looking at the story of his life it is clear that Mr. RAWSON must from very early years have been possessed by the great ideal of public service. It must have fired his imagination as a young man; it did not desert him to the very end. Many a man has felt the same impulse in his youth, but few have given themselves so with whole a heart to it. How many of us postpone the realisation of our best ideals until time and circumstance shall make it more easy to attend to them. And the time does not come, the circumstances are never so favourable as we desire, the years slip by and the vision grows dim, the end comes, and little or nothing is achieved. Such was not the case with Mr. RAWSON. Looking out upon the world as he grew to manhood, he must have seen how sorely it needed help, help in its ignorance, disorderliness, in its efforts to govern itself and to manage its affairs wisely. This was a kind of help which he must have felt himself qualified to give, and he recognised the call, and set himself to give it. To this ideal of public service he remained faithful throughout a life prolonged beyond the ordinary space, and occupied to the end with labours for the good of the community to which he belonged.

He had that feeling for the community and its rightful claims upon the individual, which is the root of true patriotism; but his patriotism did not evaporate in frothy language, nor serve as a mere cloak for personal ambitions. It proved itself in sustained efforts for the public weal, to be realised in better education, good government, and a higher public morality.

To say, as we sometimes do, in a spirit of self-excusing, that it is all very well for such men to devote their lives in this way because they enjoy the work, or find a pleasure in tasks which to others are irksome, is beside the mark. It is little more than a recognition of the fact that duty faithfully and cheerfully performed brings its own reward.

It is true we are not all called in the same way, not all competent to serve in the same manner. But it is true also that in some way or another all are called; to some service all must bind themselves if life is to be lived as it should be.

It is one of the most difficult problems of life to determine in what direction our real call is, what is the particular ideal that it is our task to make real. Too many of us, with good enough intentions, but with confused vision, uncertain purpose, or a mistaken estimate of our own powers, waste life in vacillation or the attempt to achieve tasks which are beyond our strength. It was not so with our friend. From the first he must not only have realised his particular call, but also made a wise estimate of his own strength, and the part he could best play in the great drama of life. Finding himself placed in two spheres of possible usefulness, as a citizen of no mean city, and as a member of a small religious community, he did not commit the common mistake of going out of his way to seek some novel and, perhaps, more distinguished field of activity; he accepted the position which circumstances assigned to him, and it may be truthfully said that to be an Alderman of Manchester is a finer object of ambition since he has held that post, and to be a Unitarian in Manchester is to start with a stronger claim to respect since he has lived.

Among the praises which are echoing round his grave, one hears it said that he was a self-made man. It is an ambiguous phrase, for too often it is used of men who have made wealth, position, power for themselves, but very little of themselves. If it be used of him, then let it be remembered that what he made was a true self, a character strong but kindly, distinguished by the wisdom of experience, and by a goodwill that grew with advancing years.

Upon his services to our religious community, and to the little group of churches with which his interest and affections were so deeply concerned, there is little need to speak here. They were great and lasting. Not least among them was the example to a fidelity to religious convictions, not of the most popular kind, which is not always conspicuous among men who rise to eminence in other spheres of life. That a man should work for us as he did, is a thing for which we must always be deeply grateful. That he should also win honour and respect among all the churches of the community in which he lived is, perhaps, to have rendered us a greater service still.

Let us not mourn overmuch that he is taken from us, for assuredly the flesh was growing somewhat weary under the unceasing burdens which the spirit laid upon it. Let us rather, as in thought we follow him thither, "where beyond these voices there in peace," rejoice that once more an example has been given to us of high-minded, unselfish life, and that the world, notwithstanding all its follies and weaknesses, has yet the grace to recognise the excellence, and do honour to the memory, of such a life.

MR. G. G. ARMSTRONG, eldest son of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, of Liverpool, who has recently been in London as second sub-editor of the Morning Leader, has been appointed editor of the Northern Echo, which is now working in co-operation with the Morning Leader. Mr. Armstrong therefore goes to Darlington. We congratulate him on the appointment.

AN OLD MYSTIC.

REVELATIONS OF DIVINE LOVE SHOWN TO THE LADY JULIANA.

II.

THE sixteen revelations fall, broadly speaking, into three classes. (1) Visions of the passion of Christ—1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11; (2) Illuminations or revelations of the true nature of the divine love and work, of sin, of prayer, of patience, and of the soul—3, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16; and (3) The alternations of delight and heaviness described in number 7.*

Our attention will be principally given to those of the second class, which seem most largely to have occupied and influenced Juliana's own mind—whose natural bent was for religious psychology—and which contain much that is of the utmost value to-day. We no longer claim infallibility, in the old dogmatic sense of the word, for any revelation; we recognise in each the human and personal element essential to it; but neither do we proclaim any longer that the canon of Holy Scripture can be closed by a council of the Church, and in the revelations of Juliana we are as deeply convinced of the inspiration of the Holy Spirit as in the Apocalypse of John.

And now as to the spiritual content of her revelations themselves. Their note is that of the satisfaction of heart's desire in her experience of the love of God to herself and in the revelation given to her of that love towards all men. It is true she is somewhat confused by the theology of her day. She desires to accept the "teaching of Holy Church," which includes the dogma of predestination, and occasionally confines her catholic statements of the universal working and redemptive will of God to those who are to be saved. But in such passages the reader feels at once that she is speaking what she has been taught, not that which she has seen. These men and women outside the love of God are phantoms beyond her realisation; she is not condemning the humanity that she knows. A charming example of her attitude towards ecclesiastical doctrine, and at the same time of her simple sincerity is found in these words: "I believe and understand the ministration of holy angels, as clarkes tell; but it was not showed me; for himself [Christ] is nearest and meekest, highest and lowest, and doth all."

It is hardly possible to give by extracts any true conception of the fulness of Juliana's consciousness of God's Love.†

The Passion of Jesus.

This was undoubtedly brought home to her by her realisation of the passion of Jesus. She entered into the anguish of his physical sufferings only to rejoice with him in his overcoming love for mankind; and she understood how God rejoices in all suffering that is borne in such overcoming love. "I saw," she writes, "that the love in him [Jesus] was so strong which he hath to our soul, that willing fully he chose it [the suffering] with great desire . . . and the cause why that he suffereth, is, for he will of his goodness make us the heirs with him in his bliss." And so great was his love that he told her in her vision "If I might have suffered more, I would have suffered more." "For," she says, "the pain was a noble, precious, and worshipful deed, done in a time by the working of love." She accepts, but does not dwell upon the orthodox view that the salvation effected was salvation from the pains of Hell, and the power of the devil. What impressed her was the humanity of the heart of God. All the passion of maternity is expressed for her in the love of Jesus, whom she calls over and over again "Our Mother," and the pains of his passion are not other than the pangs of a divine child-birth, the birth of the new Humanity. "Ye must be born again" was the word to Nicodemus. Sometimes it is shown to the mystic that the birth is accomplished through the passion of divine love. All this is far enough from the commonplace notions which have passed muster in most explanations of the nature of the Atonement.

Human and Divine.

The humanness of Jesus was made quite plain to Juliana, she felt that she could wonderingly understand his nature. But this is not to belittle him: it means that she understood more than others the divinity of our nature. She could not draw any line between manhood and Deity. She saw "no difference between God and our substance," though she understood that there is a difference, not of kind, but as between the All and the creature. "Whether we be stirred to know God, or our soul," she writes, "it is both good and true." "We may never come to the full knowing of God, till we know first clearly our own soul." The gentlest and humblest of souls, she is aware of the divine potentiality of man. God Himself expresses gratitude to her for her service; filled with "reverent dread," she sees that the divine passion is overpassed by the divine joy in the response of the creature; she beholds men and women as "the blessed creatures of endless life." This is all in keeping with the mystical conception of human nature, as capable of birth into the divine life by the divine process of love. This conception is set forth by Juliana where she says that body and soul grow up together, "either of them take [ing] help of other, till we be brought up into stature, and then in the ground of kind [nature], with working of mercy, the Holy Ghost graciously inspireth into us gifts leading to endless life." And elsewhere she writes, "I saw and understood full surely, that in each soul that shall be safe, is a godly will that never assented to sin, nor never shall," and that in this godly will it is always united to God. "For or [ere] that he made us, he loved us; and when we were made, we loved him." Man's soul is "made of God" and of naught beside, "and therefore it is that there may, nor shall be right aught between God and man's soul." But, besides soul, there is "our sensuality," that is to say our sense-life. These two were sundered and contrary; but in Christ they were restored into their original unity, they were "oned" in him, and became again one soul. In other words, the man-consciousness became also God-consciousness. Shall we not say that this indeed was the true Atonement, "The work of Christ for our salvation?" We may believe with the mystics that we have all a sinless soul within our soul, but as long as this is sub-conscious and unrealised in our life, what can the hypothesis alone profit us? The life of Jesus is the example which shows how the inner soul can be realised, how we can become conscious of the divine within us, how we can effectuate the thought of God which is the meaning of our existence, and the basis of our reality. And not the life of Jesus only, but the lives of all the saints.

Divine Immanence.

Following upon this conception of human nature comes, naturally, the general conception of the divine immanence and its relation to prayer and to sin. The mystics are always being accused of evading the question of sin, and weakening the sense of human responsibility. There are, of course, two sides to such an accusation, and a great deal may be said in defence of what W. B. Yeats, in one of his plays, calls the "irresponsibility of the Saints." It is doubtful whether the sense of responsibility can be made to fit into the gospel of the lilies of the field, and, perhaps, the best way to overcome sin may not be accompanied by reprobation of the sinner. But our present business is with Juliana's revelations.

The Scourge of Sin.

In the third of the revelations the meaning was as though God said in her, "See I am God: see I am in all things: see I do all things; see I never left my hands of my works, nor never shall without end; see I lead all [every] thing to the end that I ordaine it to, fro without beginning, by the same might, wisdom, and love, that I made it with. How should anything be amiss?" In the thirteenth revelation she was shown that "sin is behovely [necessary, or even advantageous], but all shall be well, and all shall be well, and all manner of thing shall be well." She observes, "I saw not sin; for I believe it had no manner of substance, nor no part of being, nor it might not be known but by the pain that is caused thereof: and this pain is something as to my sight for a time, for it purgeth and maketh us to know our self, and ask mercy." She does not understand why sin was suffered to come. She does not understand why we must see it blameworthy in ourselves and yet God does not blame us for it. But she sees there was more joy in the deed of Christ than ever there was woe in the deed of Adam. And that at the last, "sin shall be no shame but worship to man," when he shall have borne the

* About eight-ninths of the book is occupied with the revelations numbered 1, 9, 13, 14, 15 and 16; and more than half by the last three.

† Naturally enough Juliana writes generally of the love of Jesus, or of Christ; but at the beginning she explains that "when Jesu appeareth, the blessed Trinity is understood as unto my sight," and by the Trinity, she says she means God our Maker, our Keeper, our Lover, our Joy and Bliss, by, and in our Lord Jesu Christ. Any attempt to deduce dogmas from her terminology is vain; the problem of Unitarianism had not risen above her mental horizon. In Jesus she sees only and fully the passionate love of God revealed to men. Reading in this sense we need not be stumbled at dogmatic archaisms. If she saw God in the form and figure of Jesus, it was the actual love of God which showed itself to her.

full pain that sin brings, and triumphed over it." "Sin is the sharpest scourge that any chosen soul may be smitten with. Which scourge all-to beateth man or woman, and all-to breaketh him, and purgeth him in his own sight: so far forth that otherwhile he thinketh himself that he is not worth, but as it were to sink into hell, till when contrition taketh him by touching of the Holy Ghost, and turneth the bitterness into hope of God's mercy. And then begin his wounds to heal, and the soul to quicken . . . . [and after] that he be healed, his wounds be seen before God not as wounds but as worships." This is not, as she says, a comfort which makes light of sin, for as we understand love, we come to understand that sin is the one intolerable pain and Hell, and we shall "nakedly hate sin and endlessly love the soul," our own and our fellow Christians "as God loveth it."

The Nature of Prayer.

The divine immanence is happily illustrated in Juliana's statement of the nature of prayer, which is, I think, identical with that given by Madame Guyon in her Short Method of Prayer.

"Prayer" (writes Juliana), "oneth the soul to God, which is ever like to God in kind [nature] and in substance, restored by grace; but it is oft unlike in condition, by sin of man's party [part]. Then is prayer a witness that the soul will as God will; and comforteth the conscience, and ableth man to grace . . . . all the cause wherefore we prayer [pray], is to be oned into the sight and beholding of him, to whom we pray right marvellously, enjoying [rejoicing] with reverent dreed, and so great sweetness and delight in him that we can pray right naught but as he stirreth us for the time." "I am sure that no man asketh mercy and grace with true meaning, but if [unless] mercy and grace be first given to him."

All this is set forth in the words of her vision, "I am ground of thy beseeking [or beseeching]. First, it is my will that thou have it, and sithen [since] I make thee to will it, and sithen I make thee to beseek it, and thou seekest it, how should it then be that thou shouldest not have thy seeking?" For, "prayer, is a rightwise understanding of that fullhead [fulness] of joy that is for to come, with true longing and very trust." Let us not then dwell upon our sin and unworthiness, for this only produces doubt and fear which are "a foul blindness, and a wickedness [? weakness]." But let us have absolute faith in the love which "maketh might and wisdom full meek to us." "Some of us believe that God is all mighty, and may do all, and that he is all wisdom, and can do all; but that he is all love and will do all, there we fail." And at the close of her book she writes how after fifteen years she was given fuller light on the mystic words, "I am ground of thy beseeching."

"I was answered in ghostly understanding, saying thus: 'What? wouldest thou wit thy Lord's meaning in this thing? Wit it well: love was his meaning, Who sheweth it thee? Love. Wherefore sheweth he it thee? For love. Hold thee therein, thou shalt wit more in the same. But thou shalt never wit therein other, without end.' I learned that love is our Lord's meaning. . . . And in this love he hath done all his works; and in this love he hath made all things profitable to us: and in this love our life is everlasting: in our making we had beginning, but the love wherein he made us was in him fro without beginning.

At one with Humanity.

I can only refer to another side of Juliana's teaching, which is worthy of more consideration—her consciousness of her membership in the unity of the human race. Her visions seem to have special reference to herself, but she understands that they are for "the general man; that is to say, all man [every man] which is sinful, and shall be into [unto], the last day; of which man I am a member as I hope by the mercy of God; for the blessed comfort that I saw, it is large enough for us all." And, in another place, "the charity [love] of God maketh in us such a unity that when it is truly seen, no man can part himself from other." And, again, "our Lord oned us in charity."

As I turn the pages of Juliana's book, I am saddened to see how much I have perforce omitted, how much that seems essential to it has slipped between my fingers, and how little of its ineffable fragrance I have been able to carry away. For her book is a unity, and as it were a living thing that can only be known in its wholeness and personality. But so immanent is the personality in every part that one can hardly fail to convey some hint of its nature even in such inadequate notes as these. And a hint is enough. I do not know whether there is any book which is stronger in the spiritual attraction of sainthood than hers. The happy archaism of its style has a special charm, and will not hinder the meditative reader. And meditation must go with the reading of every mystical work; for the words speak rather to the soul than to the wit, and the soul must realise the realities which are only pictured by the mind, "for he will that we know that our soul is a life."

NOTE.—The edition quoted above is entitled "Sixteen Revelations of Divine Love shewed to Mother Juliana of Norwich, 1373, with a preface by George Tyrell, S.J.," and was published last year by Kegan Paul. There is another version edited by Grace Warrack, 1901.

A CASE which may be of some interest to Passive Resisters is reported in the Free Methodist. The Rev. J. Martin of Torquay, who with others had refused to pay the Educational Rate and was therefore subjected to a warrant of distress, wrote a letter objecting to the following charges made on him:—

Distraint (silver watch), 7s.
Possession on day of sale, 4s. 6d.
Cartage of goods (the watch), 1s.

It proved on investigation that the charges could not be justified. The charge for possession was withdrawn, the distress charge reduced to 3s., the cartage was insisted on, but 8s. 5d. was returned to Mr. Martin, and a corresponding amount to the other defendants, amounting in all to about £10. Along with the money a courteous letter of apology was sent to Mr. Martin from the superintendent of the Devon Constabulary. Moral: A Passive Resister should know the law.

NEW FAIRY TALES.*

A YEAR ago, just too late for the Christmas holidays, we received two new books of fairy tales, of which, both on account of their charming freshness and of the special interest of their authorship for many of our readers, we promised ourselves the pleasure of writing in these columns. When pressure of the New Year's work made it impossible, we thought: then, in the summer holiday, which is as fit a time for such enchantment as Christmas, among the little people whose home is in the woods, or with the meadow flowers, or the heather on the hill-side. But summer passed, and now, with another Christmas, has come another new book from one of our authors, to which we add a third earlier work, with this testimonial, that the children ask for its stories again and again.

Those who met Dr. Crothers, and felt the fine spiritual power of his religious utterance, at the meetings of the International Council in London, in 1901, will be delighted to meet him again, as the teller of a fairy tale. It certainly was a surprise to receive his dainty book, with its fascinating pictures and the delicate humour and unexpected imaginative playfulness of its story, but it was also an unmixed pleasure. No less unexpected was the discovery of the imaginative power and thorough sympathy with the children's love of a good fairy tale, in Mr. Harry A. James, who is a son of the late C. H. James, formerly M.P. for Merthyr, and an honoured president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Dr. Crothers tells of "Miss Muffet's Christmas Party." On that occasion, when the spider came and sat down beside her, Miss Muffet did not run away. They had an interesting conversation, and agreed to give a party to all the people in the story-books; and when the invitations had been written and despatched, the spider told her to go to sleep till all was ready.

Miss Muffet closed her eyes, and had already begun to dream of curds and whey, when all at once she was awakened, and found herself in a most wonderful palace. The walls and floors were made of the sheerest, flimsiest spider's web, woven into a thousand delicate patterns. A soft light shone through the tapestries, and the dewdrops on the roof sparkled like diamonds. The music that floated in through the open windows was not so much a sound as a part of the atmosphere. She was not sure whether she heard it or only breathed it in. Everything was so shimmering and so dainty, that Miss Muffet might have thought that she was dreaming had it not been for the spider, who looked so comical in his dress suit that she laughed outright. The moment she laughed, Miss Muffet knew that everything was real.

For a minute she did not dare to trust herself on the floor, but when she took a step she had the most delightful experience of walking on air. She went to one of the great windows. If the palace had been wonderful, how much more wonderful was the view from it. Far as the eye could reach were the shining paths of spider's web, each one leading over hill and dale to the palace door.

Then the guests begin to arrive, Cinderella in her coach, Alice and the people out of Wonderland, the Arabian Nights' folk, and Mr. Robinson Crusoe, "so solid and respectable," Hans Andersen's people, Miss Edgworth's children, Sandford and Merton, and many another. There is an inimitable scene, picturing the superior contempt of Mr. Æsop for Uncle Remus, who gets on much better with Mowgli, who came with Baloo and Bagheera; and one of the cleverest bits is the pleasant satire on the "Youths" out of the moral tales.

"Youths," said the Little Old Woman, "are easier to understand than boys and girls and other young folk. Youths have habits, and each one practises only one at a time. When they do a naughty thing, they keep on doing it regularly; that is the way you come to know which is which. . . . . Now, children are more changeable. When I lived in a Shoe I was driven half out of my wits, for I never could be thorough when I reproved them, they were always naughty in a different way. I don't believe that any one could have got any of my children into a book; they wouldn't keep still long enough to have their characters taken."

These are samples of the good things to be found in Dr. Crothers' story. Its charm is greatly enhanced by the illustrations, not the least amusing of which is the finale, when the little girl is fast asleep again, showing the spider mounted on the tuffet, putting an extinguisher on the candle.

Mr. James's imagination is of a different quality, but it is very vivid; he tells capital stories, and his books also are very well illustrated. The "Oddland" volume is a collection of short stories; each of the others is a continuous tale.

The "Doll-Man's Gift" tells of a wonderful apple tree, which grew up from a pip planted by the little girl, and there are many charming touches of sympathy with nature and of human tenderness interwoven with the magic of the story. "King Clo," Mr. James's new story, does not seem to us as a whole so successful as the other. The whimsical conceit of the Prince's discontent with his clothes is too long drawn out; but the story improves, and the later scenes, in which Mercy is the central figure, have much more in them and are more interesting as narrative. The climax, where Mercy, the blind girl, takes the place of the prisoner condemned to death, and is discovered only on the scaffold, and then the King himself is ready to give his own life, if there must be any more blood shed, is pictured with moving power, and the story has a happy ending. Mr. James amuses by the quaint fancies of his fairy tales, but he is at the same time a teacher of a wholesome humanity, and we shall be glad to welcome other stories from his hand.

RELIGION AND CULTURE.

ONE of the stock assertions of popular materialism is that religion is joyless. It would seem inconceivable that so solemn a reality should fail to dye the soul with a permanent melancholy. The converse is more true. It is a frivolous scepticism that is sad at heart. The pagan pleasure-seeker looked at the glad side of life and wept—wept through his laughter tears of infinite woe. But the Christian looked on grim and horrible things and smiled—smiled through his tears a radiant smile of triumph. Religion, when it is a real power, not only looks on tragedy and evil, but looks through them, as the saint looks through suffering and death and presently visualises the joy of his Lord.

Whatever is a solace or solution for life-problems is a serious thing. Art, which is a "joy for ever," is a serious thing. No true artist ever imagines that art is a toy, any more than a true saint imagines heaven a sweet illusion. There are, however, some people who seem to think that every function of our life should be judged, mainly, if not solely, by its moral purpose and effect. Art, they argue, should be appreciated in proportion as it ministers to the "good" life. Of a painting or a poem they ask, what moral influence does it convey? Pushing this home, they narrow all beautiful conceptions within didactic and ethical limits, and turn every lovely tale into a repellent lecture by tacking on "a moral." Their scheme of life offers no hospitable place for a pure pleasure, which, like the delight in mere colour, appears morally indifferent. They are puzzled to know what to say to men who pursue art while confessing:—

Of Heaven or Hell I have no power to sing,
I cannot ease the burden of your fears,
Or make quick-coming death a little thing,
Or bring again the pleasure of past years,
Nor for my words shall ye forget your tears,
Or hope again for aught that I can say,
The idle singer of an empty day.

Such art would seem a vagrant rogue, and they are embarrassed to find room for it in a Christian society. Now, the worst of this Puritan revolt against an irresponsibly jolly and ethically neutral art is that it has begotten the counter-revolution of "art for art's sake." As a counter-revolution, this is, perhaps, justifiable. Art for the sake of beauty has, at least, the advantage that belongs to every specialisation. It makes the profession in a certain degree self-sufficing and self-contained, independent of meddlesome "mongerers of moral half-truths." But when it passes from being a fighting motto into an authoritative principle, it becomes itself only an inverted Puritanism. It finds its logic in Rossetti's scheme of human society, wherein mankind is divided into two classes, the elect and the foredoomed, one to paint pictures, the other to buy them. Thus a great function of the human spirit is degraded into pedantry and reduced to impotence by removal from the freshening tides of moral desires and aversions. It was the neglect of the deeper maxim of art for life's sake that wrought the doom of Greece.

In much the same way, may it not be said that a similar error clings to the austere maxim, "Duty for duty's sake"? That the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath, means for everyone who will think it out to the bottom, that duties were made for man, not man for duties. Put in another way, this means duties for spiritual life's sake. The law which none may offend with impunity is what has been called the law of lifewardness, and this includes far more than morality as ordinarily understood. True, the overarching authority of spiritual life governs all our activities, but this does not make void the fact that life thus interpreted not merely coincides with morality, but may actually overlap it. Is there not a joy in beauty which is neither moral nor immoral, but simply non-moral, and for joy's sake eminently desirable? Even from a biological or evolutionary point of view, may it not prove a pleasant but ethically neutral epi-phenomenon? On the other hand, there may be a life of stern duty which is neither beautiful nor ugly, but destitute of artistic significance. And just as a certain too familiar type of art may not merely fall outside morality, but actually contradict it, so goodness may not merely fall outside art, but actually contradict it. There are, in a word, ugly duties, duties discharged by Whittier's "Reformer" for life's sake, even at the cost of wrecking things of nameless loveliness.

In addition to beauty and goodness there remains a third ideal which every soul perceives—truth. But here again we often stumble across the fallacy that the only truth that is valuable is the truth that contributes something to our moral life, as if there were no worth for life in a frank pursuit of truth simply to satisfy the prying curiosity of the intellect. Is it not more reasonable to admit that the instinct for truth, like the instinct for beauty, has a legitimate sphere of play outside the strictly moral realm? The quest of truth as such, apart from any exclusively moral purpose, may surely have a legitimate place in the fully cultivated life. This is often denied, and denied in unwise ways. The result is once more a counter-revolution, this time the counter-revolution of science which raises a fighting standard inscribed "Truth for truth's sake and knowledge its own justification." And then we have the horrors and inhumanities of a defiant vivisection, a pursuit of truth which is not merely non-moral but which is sometimes, if not indeed always, immoral and hideous.

Our wisdom is to hear the commandment which still thunders from the Mount, "Thou shalt have none other gods before me." And the God who speaks is He who is our life and the length of our days. He is a Trinity of three personæ, Beauty, Righteousness, Truth, and these three are One. The supremely spiritual life must include and unify them. Viewed separately, they may coincide with, they may fall outside of, they may even contradict each other. But taken together and correctively, they find their symmetry and proportion in the Divine life which embraces and harmonises them. In other words, in a completely religious life, truth, goodness, beauty, must exist in no disproportion or excess, but perfectly.

All this has an important bearing on the modern development of religious organisation. A church or a congregation is one-sided when it is, like Romanism or Anglo-Catholicism, more æsthetic than true; or like certain types of Dissent, more dissidently moral than true or beautiful; or like much Unitarianism, more true and good than beautiful. A really Catholic and Universal Church should aspire to see there three personæ as united through love, in the one God of its worship. It must strive to make the cord of its religion three-stranded, so as to blend the truest philosophy, the most adoring art, the highest morality in one reality of life. Such a church is for some of us the church of our dreams and of our prayers.

O heart of mine, keep patience; looking forth
As from the Mount of Vision, I behold
Pure, just, and free the Church of Christ on earth:
The martyr's dream, the golden age foretold.

THE CHRIST OF EXPERIENCE.

SIR,—I have just been reading in your columns Mr. Estlin Carpenter's answer to the questions of Mr. Edward Grubb,* and as the matter between them, viz., the interpretation of the consciousness of Jesus by the methods of historical criticism and modern psychology, is of general importance, I think I will run the risk of intervening in the debate. We shall all be indebted, in the long run, for anything, whether it be questioning or answering, or discussing and debating, which narrows the area of uncertainty as to what Jesus said and as to what he meant by saying it; and as it is my firm conviction that the area can be narrowed, I am grateful to Mr. Grubb for asking Mr. Carpenter what reasonable explanation he can give of the exalted language attributed to Jesus Christ in the pair of related passages, Matthew xi. 27 and Luke x. 22.

When we examine the proposed solution, we shall see (1) that Mr. Carpenter finds it difficult to believe that Jesus uttered such words, and on the double ground (a) that they are not a part of the Synoptic tradition and (b) that they disclose an exalted type of Messianic self-consciousness, which we can hardly reconcile with the reserve of Jesus previous to the colloquy with the twelve at Cesarea Philippi. (2) that with regard to the pendant to Matthew xi. 27 ("Come unto me," &c., certainly, to the ordinary mind, the most striking and original of Christ's sayings), Mr. Carpenter concedes the authorship ("there is no reason why Jesus should not have used them"), but limits the originality of the words by adducing a striking parallel from the Son of Sirach.

Mr. Carpenter's first objection, then, is that the pair of passages, Matthew xi. 27 and Luke x. 22, are an erratic block in the Synoptic tradition. I think this should be at once conceded, and that a good geologist like Mr. Carpenter should have told us something more of the origin of the erratic block. At the same time he should have recognised that when the block was marked as erratic, his second criticism, viz., that it was out of harmony with Christ's consciousness before Cesarea Philippi, is no longer to the point. Perhaps the block came from some setting where it was in perfect sequence and psychological harmony. But do not let us condemn it for being out of harmony with a situation to which it does not belong. Whether the passage will be ultimately found to be too exalted may also be left out of account for the present. Many people will think that the "meek and lowly" passage can take care of itself. But if it should be found otherwise, Mr. Carpenter will, no doubt, frankly admit, as he did recently with regard to the Messianic claim, that he is sorry that Jesus said such words (supposing them to be fairly established as a part of his teaching).

And now with regard to the "Come unto me" passage. What did Jesus mean by such words? According to Mr. Carpenter, nothing more than the usual prophetic terms. Equate, says he, the "Come unto me" of Jesus with the "Come unto me" of the other Jesus, Bar Sira. The advantage of this parallel for clearing up the sense of the passage is obvious, for (1) it can be proved that Jesus of Nazareth studied the book of his namesake; (2) with this fact in mind, the parallels become so conspicuous that Mr. Carpenter ought to have gone further and claimed one of these passages as the direct ancestor of the other. But even without going so far as that (and I myself think the connection is clear), we should, by the aid of other parallels from the Wisdom literature, be able to make it plain that if the invitation of the Son of Sirach is a call to the yoke of Wisdom, the New Testament passage must be interpreted in the sense that Christ speaks in the person of the Ideal Wisdom, the difference between the two parallel passages being exactly exhibited in the two formulas "Come unto her" and "Come unto me;" or "the yoke," and "my yoke." There is no difficulty in this supposed personification of Jesus as the Wisdom of God, for we have the very same thing turning up in another pair of similarly related passages, viz., Matthew xxiii. 34 and Luke xi. 49, where we have the alternation between "Behold, I send unto you prophets," and "Therefore, saith the Wisdom of God," &c.

And I think we should conclude that on one line of tradition, outside the Synoptic line, Christ was represented in the character indicated and made to speak in accordance with the character. If such a position were fairly made out, I suppose that Mr. Carpenter would say that it was an instance of the "vast hierarchy of superhuman powers and influences, in which an exalted place was naturally soon found for the risen Messiah." But I have forgotten that Mr. Carpenter has practically conceded that these are Jesus Christ's own words. What should one say in that case? Should be it a further regret that over and above the Messianic assumption, there was also the assumption of being the Ideal Wisdom. The erratic block would have been traced, in that case, to the Erratic Person? I finish with a query, as being suited to the pages of the INQUIRER.

ATTENDANCES AT OUR LONDON CHURCHES.

SIR,—Owing to the kindness by which returns from all but two of our London churches have been sent to me at different times during a period of over a year, I am able to confirm the impression produced by Mr. Perris's figures from the Daily News in a remarkable degree. According to the Daily News figures the average London Unitarian congregation is 72·6 and according to the returns made to me by the churches themselves in various weathers and circumstances it works out at 72·4. I ought to say that this may be slightly favourable, as no returns were asked for during July, August, and September.

Of the thirty-one churches mentioned by Mr. Perris the two in Croydon and the one at Richmond do not come under my survey; two have sent me no returns, thus reducing my numbers to 26. Out of these 26, 5 are missions, leaving 21. Now out of these 21, there are only 10 churches whose average congregation approximates or exceeds the general average; the average of these being 111·2 or 222·4 for the two services together.

Is there any general law such as Mr. Perris suggests? At first sight it appears not. For of these 10, only three could be called suburban; 3 others are strictly central, and the other 4 are in populous town neighbourhoods; while their foundation dates range from 1680 to 1901.

But it is surely not a mere coincidence that they lie without exception on the west of a line drawn north and south, through Dalston Junction. This statement covers missions as far as Sunday services are concerned, except for Mansford-street, which is the most easterly of our churches whose average congregation reaches the average for all London.* But no mission is to be judged by its Sunday congregations, and if we include Sunday-school and week day meetings in our account of activities, then we have to add three more, two churches proper and one mission, for on this method of reckoning, Hackney comes out fifth in all London, and Stratford sixth. Whereas Durning Hall, in Limehouse, shows numbers with which none but our larger missions can compare.

Surely without attempting any rigid rule on the subject this seems to indicate that when we get east of a certain line our general methods should approximate more to those of the mission, with manifold educational and social activities and less reliance upon Sunday services to do the spiritual work of the Church unsupported. Even in the more westerly districts vigorous week-night activities seem to be at least as important auxiliaries as the Sunday-school itself. Such a church as Essex Church, which with the possible exception of Wandsworth gathers the largest Sunday congregations, is largest, too,

* It should be mentioned that Forest Gate and Plumstead seem to reach beyond the shadow of the East, to some extent, and under their present ministers both have shown signs of marked progress, the latter biding fair to do as well as new movements in the West.

in week-night activities (except perhaps for Highgate). Essex Church has it is true, one of the largest Sunday schools outside our missions, but our Lewisham Church where the Sunday-school is at present worked under serious difficulties for lack of space, doubtless owes much of its success in gathering large Sunday congregations, to its immense activity during the week, making it fourth in this respect in all London. I cannot refrain from one word, however, on this point, which I regard as of real gravity. The minister who works both Sunday and week-day should regard it as nothing short of a religious duty to take his sabbath some time during the week. I am aware that there are more ways than one of entering into the peace of worship, but let no teacher believe he can feed men's souls, even though he may gather numbers, unless he, too, retires upon the mountains from his work.

Lastly, I would say that numbers, and deductions made from them, have their value for the spade-workers, as we mostly are. But the prophet ever scorns them; and, therefore, let us not allow ourselves to speak of the impossible in London. The above suggestions, if they show anything, show the heavy odds against which some of our faithful fellow-workers are labouring, and where, and how, future effort may be most hopefully directed. But while there is unquestionably fine work being done in every part of London, none of us can look upon its vast masses of starved souls without earnestly asking how we might do more. Surely the popular services recently held at Greenwich and Islington seem to answer with one suggestion. And yet there is, in my opinion, a deeper question still we have to face which these do not touch, and on which matter I shall, with your leave, write a few words next week.

MOVING ELOQUENCE.

SIR, — The extract you give in your review of the autobiography of Dr. Guinness Rogers as to the power of W. J. Fox as a speaker, reminds me of a similar experience when Dr. Charles Beard was the cause of a whole audience spontaneously rising to give effect to their feelings, raised to such forcible expression by his eloquence.

It was not a speech upon any current political topic, about which his audience already felt strongly, it was an historical lecture on John Hampden, given under the auspices of either the Liberal Association, or of a Liberal club, I do not remember which.

The scene was the concert hall in Lord Nelson-street, where he afterwards gave to crowded audiences on Sunday evenings his addresses on "Religion in Common Life."

The lecture on John Hampden was on a week evening, and the hall, though full, was not crowded. Dr. Beard had been talking of the arrest of Hampden, and of the effect upon the minds of the friends of the Parliament, and then of the way in which the news was received in his own constituency, among his friends and neighbours: he said, "Six hundred electors of Buckinghamshire mounted their horses and rode to London to ask for their member." So thoroughly had Dr. Beard imbued us with the interest and excitement of the time, that the whole audience, as I have said, rose simultaneously, and cheered for several minutes before they allowed the lecturer to resume.

I have heard him often holding a great popular audience by the force of his appeal, but I do not remember any instance which so clearly marked his power in this respect as the one I have ventured to narrate. I wish someone would give us before it is too late some memories of a life replete with interest, and of great service to Liverpool, and to the community of churches to which we belong.

BRAHMO SOMAJ SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

SIR,—Friends who are interested in the cause of female education in India will be glad to know what progress has been made in the new building scheme, to the funds for which many have subscribed.

I have just received a letter from Calcutta stating that a good site had been secured, that plans of the building and an estimate of the cost amounting to about £5,333 had been submitted and passed by the Public Works Department, and further that the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal had consented to lay the foundation stone on the 23rd inst. Towards the cost a grant in aid from Government of 25,000 rupees (£1,666) is expected.

The land and the buildings to be erected are vested in trustees whose names are published in the Indian Messenger, together with the text of the trust deed.

The trust deed states that the distinctive aim of the school is, and will be, to combine good secular education with sound religious and moral instruction based on Theistic principles, with special care to train the scholars in domestic economy so as to fit them for the discharge of the practical duties of life, and, later, to create an efficient class of lady teachers; that the school be open to the inspection of the Director of Public Instruction of Bengal; and that the building shall include a hall to be named "Miss Mary Carpenter's Hall."

Mr. Roy, the secretary, closes his letter to me by acknowledging the help received from English friends, saying that it is due to them and their practical sympathy that the Brahmo Somaj have been enabled to undertake what for them is a gigantic work.

SOCIAL ECONOMICS.

SIR,—May I be permitted to enter a respectful protest against Mrs. Helen Bosanquet's papers appearing under the heading of "Social Economics"?

They have nothing whatever to do with economics; they are purely charitable. Mrs. Bosanquet writes wisely and well, and, of course, the matters of which she treats are of great interest and importance. But they are obviously matters only for those who have time and strength and money to spend in their pursuit, and after all they are only palliatives. I suppose one ought not, but really at times one cannot help feeling very sick of this elaborate study cures for evils that ought not to exist.

When the Christian churches begin to bring their principles to bear on these things along the line of real Social Economics a good many of us will begin to feel more interest in them.

G. F. MILLIN.

Brixton, January 10, 1904.

THE thirteenth annual report of the Mansfield House University Settlement in Canning Town contains a record of large and strenuous activities. There are the familiar features: adult school, P.S.A., and a Sunday Union, whose members are pledged to "faithfully strive to serve God by helping their fellows in the spirit of Jesus Christ"; popular lectures, University extension lectures, classes, concerts; clubs for men and for boys; and a very successful lodging house near the docks. These and many other similar efforts have behind them men who are moved by human sympathy and a desire to rub off some of the sharp edges of social inequality. The more specific purpose, that of public work in the district, for which the Settlements stand, is not neglected.

THE year has witnessed many personal changes. One of the residents, Mr. Gladstone, has been appointed warden at the sister settlement in Tavistock Place. The Wardenship at Mansfield House has been taken up by Mr. Bruce Wallace. The task in a heavy one, but Mr. Wallace's enthusiasm and a strong idealism that knows no obstacles should equip him for the work. The Settlement is no longer in its youth. Both the men, Percy Alden and Will Reason, who gave it such a splendid start, are gone. Perhaps the bright hopes formed in the early Settlement days are, if not gone, yet touched with an air of more sad reality. The Social Problem is not to be solved by the mere fact that a few score of educated men go to live among the poor, or indeed until the millions of the poor share whatever is good in the life of the well-to-do. But while wealth and poverty continue side by side, as conditions of class distinction, the moral gain is immense for those men and women who freely choose the life of burden and stress that they may even in some degree share the life of the workers.

THE most popular exercise of the adult class was found in Biblical Discussion, which for over six months ranged round the theme of the Kingdom of God. "While the Kingdom in its inwardness, as within you, as an individual possession, and as a personal recognition of the rule of God, made its appeal to the men, yet it was the Kingdom in its outer aspect, as a social order in which every human interest became elevated, and every political and economic concern became sacred, that had peculiar attractions. If the Kingdom consisted in that relationship in which men manifest towards God the spirit of sonship and towards one another the spirit of brotherhood, then it naturally followed that injustice of every form would be banished, poverty would be removed, and all conventional inequalities would cease to exist."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Aberdare: Old Meeting.—The high esteem and affection in which the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., is held were marked by the celebration on Jan. 10 and 11 of the fortieth anniversary of his settlement as minister of the Old Meeting. Mr. Jones succeeded his father, who had occupied the pulpit for thirty years before that. Educated by his father and at Carmarthen and Glasgow University, where he graduated in 1863, Mr. Jones has long held a leading place among Welsh Unitarians, and he is known throughout Wales as a writer, and is specially distinguished as an antiquarian. He was one of the contributors on native subjects to the "Dictionary of National Biography." To THE INQUIRER Mr. Jones has long been a valued contributor. As head of the Treeynon Seminary he prepared a great number of students for the various theological colleges of Wales, and many leading ministers of the Methodist, Baptist, and Congregational Churches in the Principality owed their early training to him. A number of these took a cordial part in the congratulations of the anniversary. On Sunday special services were held morning, afternoon, and evening, the Revs. William James, John Davies, and David Evans taking part; while after the evening sermon Mr. Jones himself gave a brief review of his ministry, with many touching allusions to the changes the years had brought. At the close of the service there was an impressive celebration of the Communion, and four new members were received. The meetings were continued at 3.30 on Monday with a brief devotional service conducted by the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, Gellionen. Then Mr. Edmund D. Howell took the chair, and in a few touching and appropriate words congratulated Mr. Jones on the attainment of the 40th year of his ministry, and wished him God-speed in his future work. Messages of congratulation were read from the sister churches at Swansea, Gellionen, and Trebanos, and from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and others, and then followed a number of speeches, among those taking part being an ex-President of the Welsh Baptist Association, an ex-Moderator of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, several other members of other denominations, the Revs. J. Hathren Davies, J. Joseph George, W. Tudor Jones, J. Fisher Short, D. J. Williams, and David Rees. After the speeches the presentations were made in the form of a silver inkstand, a gold pencil case, a gold-mounted walking-stick by the three eldest lady members of the congregation. Then a beautifully illuminated address was read by Mr. Gwilym Griffiths, and presented by the chairman on behalf of the congregation to Mr. Jones, who replied in feeling terms, pointing out that Aberdare churches were noted for retaining their ministers, the Rev. Wm. Harries having but recently completed his fortieth year in an adjoining church, and there were several others on the border. The presentation meeting was brought to a close by the singing of a hymn, the Rev. J. P. Kane, Dowlais, pronouncing the benediction. After tea another service was held, the Rev. J. Grawys Jones (Congregational) leading the devotions, and two powerful sermons were delivered by Revs. W. James and J. Davies. Mr. Jones, with emotion which made speech difficult, then thanked all who had helped to make the series of meetings such a splendid success. Mr. Davies brought the meeting to a close by pronouncing the benediction.

Bootle.—A very successful meeting, arranged by the Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Society, was held in the Free Church Hall, Bootle, on Monday, Jan. 11, at 8 p.m. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong was in the chair, and Dr. Carter gave a most instructive address, entitled "The Advantages to Health of Total Abstinence from Alcohol." He treated the subject mainly from the scientific standpoint, enumerating the effects of alcohol in the blood, and drawing attention to the similarity of the effects of strong poisons. The paper was lightened by many interesting literary references. A resolution against interference with magisterial discretion in the re-issue of licences, and against compensation, was proposed by Mr. Schofield and carried unanimously. Mr. Pidgeon proposed a vote of thanks to the lecturer and chairman.

Chowbent.—£15 were this year raised at Christmas and New Year time for our Children's Homes, viz., Winifred House, London; Great Hucklow, Derbyshire; and Red Cross Convalescent, Blackpool; and £5 have been sent to each of these. The £15 is an increase of £1 10s. on the amount raised for the same purposes last year.

Gateshead (Appointment).—On Sunday services commemorative of Dr. Martineau were conducted by Rev. G. A. Ferguson; in the evening the readings, responses and hymns were selected from those of the great teacher. At the close of the service a meeting of the congregation was held, when a unanimous invitation was given to Mr. Ferguson to become regular minister of the church. Mr. Ferguson has accepted, and will begin his pastorate on May 1 next.

Lancaster.—The Lancaster branch of the National Home Reading Union, and made up of members of all denominations, at its first meeting in the New Year, presented to the Rev. J. Channing Pollard a very handsome reading-lamp, in appreciation of the valuable services he has rendered as leader of the circle during the last eight years.

London: Wandsworth.—At the New Year's party of the Social and Literary Union, January 7, which was in every way a success, a special feature was presented in the recitation of several pieces by Miss Margaret Capleton, youngest daughter of Mr. Edward Capleton, formerly secretary of the church, and now of Highbury. Miss Capleton, who has great natural ability which has been developed by careful training, showed herself equally at home in the tragic and comic element, and her pieces were heartily applauded. The Union, which holds fortnightly meetings, has so far had a very prosperous season.

Nottingham: High Pavement.—Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave a miscellaneous recital to the Elder Scholars' Institute on Saturday evening, when, amongst other items, he rendered "Shooting Experiences" ("Pickwick"), and "Neddy Fitton's Visit to Lord Derby," in the Lancashire dialect. The audience of upwards of 300 were exceedingly delighted. This is the third visit within the last three years which Mr. Harwood has paid to the High Pavement, each visit adding to the appreciation of his entertainment.

Preston (Resignation).—After a ministry of three and a-half years the Rev. Neander Anderton, B.A., has resigned the pulpit, having accepted an invitation from the congregation at Pendleton.

Raloo, co. Antrim.—The Raloo congregation have lost one of their original members, and a very loyal supporter, by the death of Mr. David Gray, in his seventy-eighth year. The funeral service on New Year's Day was conducted by the Rev. J. M'Cleery and the Rev. J. Kennedy, of Larne. Last Sunday a memorial service was conducted by Mr. M'Cleery.

Sunderland.—After evening service on Sunday last, the following resolution was passed:—"That in view of the apparent imminent danger of war between Russia and Japan, which might issue in complications involving our own country, this meeting respectfully but earnestly urges His Majesty's Government, acting in accordance with the Hague Convention, to suggest to the two Powers the settlement of the questions in dispute between them by a reference to the Hague Court of Arbitration." The resolution will be sent to the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary.

Tenterden (Appointment).—Rev. Harold Rylett entered upon the duties of the pastorate here on the first Sunday in the new year.

Whitchurch.—The Church of the Saviour has suffered another loss by the death of Mr. Gresty, one of its original members, and a principal supporter from its foundation in 1877. He was a man of bright and vigorous intellect, zealous for freedom, truth, and religion, following their guidance without fear, and generous in their support. He granted the land on which the church and schoolroom are built, at first on a lease for 21 years, with a ground rent of £15. But afterwards, in 1893, he transferred it as a free gift, a most generous act for a man whose business as a farmer, though prosperous, was only on a moderate scale. He was also generous in private, even beyond his means. He died on Tuesday, January 5, in his sixty-fifth year, rather suddenly at last. But his powers of body and of mind had long been failing, so that death came in the end as a release from a heavy burden.

CHRISTMAS AND SCHOOL PARTIES.—We have received this week a number of reports of children's parties, which we regret not to be able to publish.

DR. MARTINEAU'S UNITARIANISM.

THE following letter on "Dr. Martineau's Relation to Unitarianism" appeared in the Spectator of January 9:—

SIR,—The letters on this subject which have appeared in your columns (Spectator, December 12 and 19, 1903) must have evoked the keenest interest on the part of Dr. Martineau's old students who own a vivid remembrance of his teachings. But in the attempted estimates of his theological position one must notice a marked absence of reference to what may be fairly accepted as the final declaration of that position, which may be gathered from his work on "The Seat of Authority in Religion," published in the year 1890. That Dr. Martineau intended that work to embody his deliberately formed conclusions cannot, I think, be reasonably doubted. In a leter to myself bearing date July 30 in the year named he writes:—"The insensible changes of thought induced by experience and reflection had so accumulated during a long life, that the growing total of my erroneous teachings in the past became a burden upon my conscience; and I have felt it a duty, ere I leave those to whom my words were spoken, to correct whatever might mislead, and render a report as true as I can make it at the latest date. The revision necessarily brings me many reproaches; but they are more than countervailed by assurances of sympathetic response, and accepted help. In our time no path is so lonely and hard to keep as the via media in Religion, exposed as it is to the contemptuous shafts of agnosticism on one side, and the thunders of ecclesiastical artillery on the other." Thus clearly and fully does Dr. Martineau reveal his theological position. If the trend of that fearless work, "The Seat of Authority in Religion," is in what is commonly known as an orthodox and evangelical direction, then may our conscientious friends of those Communions claim Martineau for their own—but if not, then cadit quaestio. Those who knew our beloved leader most intimately will be the first to thank the Rev. A. H. Craufurd for his reference to Dr. Martineau's attitude, and his feeling towards the late Mr. R. H. Hutton, upon the latter's withdrawal from Unitarian Christianity. Dr. Martineau's words are the expression of his own noble and unselfish spirit, which finds a fitting parallel in that chivalrous courtesy beneath which a true knight would lower his own lance's point before a brother in the lists whom he at once honours and loves.

BOWDEN HILL CHAPEL
(1729),
CREDITON.

APPEAL FOR £360.

THIS CONGREGATION of Working People appeal to their more favoured brethren of our Churches for help in aid of the Restoration and the Re-roofing of their Chapel. For many years little was done to the Chapel and the Trust-property, with the result that until two years ago both were in a deplorable condition.

Last year a comfortable School room and a Lecture-hall were provided, by enclosing the space under the galleries with a partition of wood and glass.

But the larger work of Restoration and Re-roofing can no longer be delayed, for the leaky state of the roof is seriously injuring the Chapel walls, and rendering the entire fabric insecure. The floors have decayed, the windows shrunk, and the arrangement of the old oak pews is unsuitable to-day.

The Congregation is thoroughly united, and the members are working earnestly to make good their scheme.

The morning congregation is composed mainly of scholars and teachers. In the evening the attendance varies from forty to eighty adults, and on special occasions exceeds a hundred. The Sunday School is well cared for

This appeal on behalf of one of our old Chapels, served by a long succession of honoured ministers, is heartily commended by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and by the Western Union.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received and acknowledged by the Chapel Treasurer, Mr. W. H. GILLARD, Church-street, Crediton; Miss STEWART, The Studio, High-street, Crediton.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE further letter from the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed on "Attendances at our London Churches" we must hold over until next week.

THE celebration of the seventy-fourth anniversary of the Brahmo Somaj, to be held in London to-day and to-morrow (Saturday and Sunday, Jan. 23 and 24), will be, as we announced last week, held at the rooms of Mr. R. N. Ray. His address is 34, Burlington-road, Bayswater, W.

OF the annual meeting of the trustees of Manchester College, Oxford, held on Thursday afternoon in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, we shall publish a full report next week. The Address of the Committee contains much interesting matter, including the record of Professor Upton's retirement, and the appointment of the Rev. L. P. Jacks to the chair of Philosophy and the Tate Lectureship, and also the appointment of the Revs. R. A. Armstrong and P. H. Wicksteed as Visitors, in succession to the Revs. S. A. Steinthal and C. Hargrove, whose lengthened term of service has been of signal benefit to the college.

ON Wednesday and Friday last week, January 12 and 14, Professor Estlin Carpenter delivered two lectures (in French) at Brussels on "How to Read the Gospels in the Light of Modern Criticism." The lectures were given at the Hotel Ravenstein, and were an unqualified success, the gratitude of the audience being expressed by M. Hocart. A fuller report we must reserve for next week.

THE insidious possibilities of the London Education Act are plainly exposed by Mr. A. J. Mundella in a letter headed "No more Board Schools." He emphasises the fact that under the new law any ten ratepayers may stop the provision of new schools by appeal to the Board of Education, and that the principle of having "regard to the economy of the rates" will inevitably lead to sectarian offers to provide the mere shell of a building where the whole cost of education must be borne by the ratepayers. Mr. Mundella says:—

All that the "philanthropist" has to do is to provide, or grant the use of, a building for five or six hours a day, five days a week. The ratepayer must furnish it, clean it, paint it, provide fuel and light, books, desks, maps, prayer books, crucifixes, &c., must pay all salaries of teachers, caretakers, pay, in fact, all expenses, including wear and tear of the building. The proprietors of the building will meanwhile "have all powers of management" over the school, including the appointment of the teachers, and subject only to such control as the Board of Education exercises at present over all public elementary schools. The proprietors of the building will also have free use of the rooms, furniture, &c., for other purposes on Saturday, Sunday, and before and after school hours on other days. The bare provision of the shell of a building makes them owners in perpetuity of the institution maintained at the sole cost of the ratepayers. The public may nominate a minority of one-third of the managers, but apart from that they are mere paymasters for any adventurer who chooses to appropriate for his own private or sectarian purposes the public provision for the education of the people. How inefficient and obnoxious such schools would generally be the whole history of English education will tell.

AGAIN, Mr. Mundella points out, the Act specially provides that no school may be closed as unnecessary, by either the Board of Education or the Local Authority, so long as it keeps up an average attendance of thirty scholars, so that, he adds, "we may see London covered with little schools maintained in every interest except that of education." It is of vital importance to remember that the transfer of control is not simply from the School Board to the County Council, but "from the School Board and the old law to the County Council and the new law." The disasters latent in the new law are so serious that it is imperative that the operation of the Act should be delayed as long as possible. The "appointed day" may be deferred till May, 1905, and, says Mr. Mundella, "it would be an act of treachery for any Progressive Councillor to suggest or accept an earlier date." Certainly, the only reasonable course would seem to be that of waiting for the amendments which must be made in the Act, as all thoughtful men on both sides are convinced.

ESSEX HALL was the scene of the fifth annual meeting of the Garden City Association, when a large and enthusiastic gathering was presided over by Mr. E. R. P. Moon, M.P., the principal speakers being Sir John Gorst, M.P., Mr. Rider Haggard, Mr. Malcolm Morris, F.R.C.S., and Mr. Richard Whiteing. A report was presented by Mr. Haggard, who, as a "practical agriculturist," had been asked to inspect the recently acquired estate. The meeting received with evident satisfaction his opinion that the site is in every respect an extremely good one, and the confession that though he had been a sceptic in regard to the Garden City scheme, he now saw no reason why it should not prove absolutely successful. Among other vice-presidents who expressed regret that they were unable to to be present were the Bishops of London, Rochester, and Hereford, the Rev. Stopford Brooke, Dr. Macnamara, M.P., and Mr. H. G. Wells.

SIR JOHN GORST, who wished Godspeed to the Garden City, illustrated the need for it from a medical report on the condition of the children in the schools at Edinburgh. Dr. Mackenzie had made inquiries as to the home life of the pupils in one of the poorest schools. He classified them according to the number of rooms occupied by a family, and found that in every respect but one the children who came from one-room tenements were in a worse condition than those who lived in tenements of two or three rooms. The exception was in regard to cleanliness: the poorest children were not more dirty than the less poor. But they were inferior in height and weight, they suffered from more grave defects of sight and hearing, they were less capable of instruction. In every particular, whether physical or intellectual, the result of bad housing was found to become more aggravated with the increasing inadequacy of the dwelling place. Sir John Gorst concluded that no attempt at social reform could be successful that did not begin by providing healthy homes in a good atmosphere, and that it is exactly this that the Garden City will secure.

MR. MALCOLM MORRIS, treasurer of the National Society for the Prevention of Consumption, also approached the question from the standpoint of the health of the people. Magnificent progress has been made in sanitation since the founding of the Health of Towns Association two generations ago; but much remains to do. Death has been put back and the average of life increased. It is not enough to diminish the rate of mortality, it is also necessary to improve the standard of health. We keep less healthy people alive, we must insure that those who live shall be more healthy. Mr Morris is of opinion that the Garden City movement will achieve an improvement in the quality of life not less than has been effected in its length by the sanitation of the past.

We none of us doubt the mischief of congested town areas; perhaps the most important arguments were those of Mr. Haggard and Mr. Whiteing, who dwelt on conditions of life in the country. Housing is bad in the rural districts. Life there is poor, "a life of low wages and no prospects." Mr. Haggard described the tragedy of the rural exodus as a silent revolution. The houses fall into decay, the people leave. The land where men should live is turned into game preserves. Where are the expatriated villagers to go to? To the town slum? Or to garden cities? If the latter, then this new movement will be a twofold blessing—good in that it draws people from the unwholesome court, doubly good in that it will prevent them from going there, and from the physical degeneration involved in such a habitation.

In one suggestion made at the meeting there lurks a danger against which the promoters of the Garden City will do well to set their faces. The estate at Hitchin is only thirty-five miles from London, near enough to become a London suburb. We hear of the rows of villas that may be erected. Now a suburb cannot be a city. The choice between them must be made. There is a great future for this movement; it is a creative effort for good that is entirely practicable. Yet there are many awkward problems to be solved before the original project can be carried to completion, and the difficulties will be enormously increased if any large proportion of the inhabitants are to be City men who merely sleep and golf in a country suburb. The strength of a city lies in the vigour of its civic conscience. This is a thing of slow growth, and is hardly likely to thrive unless the citizens are in every sense members of the community. The more immediate financial success which might possibly result from the formation of a new suburban district would be obtained at too high a cost if it should impair the great objects for which Mr. Ebenezer Howard is working with the splendid pertinacity of faith.

The first two numbers of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's Sermons for the Day for the present year, dated for January and February, are now issued, the subject of the two discourses being "Morley's Gladstone." The first deals with "Mr. Gladstone's Religion," the second with his "Mental Development." Of the presentment of the great statesman's religion by his biographer Mr. Armstrong speaks in the highest terms: "No nobler thing has been achieved in literature in the whole history of letters than the exposition of Gladstone's religious life by Morley with so so perfect and understanding a sympathy and reverence." And of that religion itself, and its power in the public life of this country, as it lived in the man, he says:—

It was a man lifting politics and statescraft out of the mire of personal ambitions, sordid jealousies, the meannesses and basenesses of party, and presenting them pure and true in the free air of God to the consciences of his fellow-men. And so, though many of the best and truest were unable to see with him eye to eye, or to think the thoughts he thought, yet none came away who did not feel that there was that in his noble oratory which not merely pleased the ear, but penetrated to the hidden soul, and touched the spirit to loftier issues. And to multitudes it was a baptism and a consecration to hear the swelling music of his speech as it fell upon the ear. Since Cromwell there has been no statesman who could so touch the better conscience of the world. All the world is the poorer since the seal of everlasting silence has closed his lips. There has gone out a great light from English public life. Gross ideals and materialistic purposes fill the air unchecked. Petty rivalries soil the arena all unrebuked. It is for all patriot hearts to pray to God to send to England once again a man of his noble type and power, that once more in English statesmanship there may speak and act a mighty leader who shall realise the high behest, "Stand, therefore, having girded your loins with truth, and having put on the breastplate of righteousness, and having shod your feet with the preparation of the gospel of peace; withal taking up the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked."

In the January Good Words Canon Hensley Henson begins a series of papers on "Reason v. Rationalism from the side of Religion." These papers, he says, are no attempt at a formal and complete apology for the Christian Religion. His aim is simply to suggest answers to some of the more urgent and weighty objections now current.

Something will have been gained if it is made clear that the Christian believer is not, in that character, necessarily committed to a depreciation of his own reason, or to a dread of scientific research, or to indifference towards the interests and hopes of civilised life; that, in truth, to be a Christian is to possess the self-respect which venerates reason, and the love of truth for its own sake which is the temper of genuine science, and the self-surrendering habit which is the condition of social happiness.

The Sunday Magazine has an account of the work the Rev. Silvester Horne has taken up at Whitefield's Tabernacle, and there is also the first of a series of articles on "The People of the Abyss," by Mr. Charles Ray, telling of what is being done to help the poorest of the poor in great cities. This first article gives pictures of Carrington House, Deptford. Canon Hensley Henson also writes in this month's Sunday Strand, on "Is Church-going Unpopular?" opening a symposium on the subject, and one of the illustrated articles is "An Hour with Dr. Barnardo."

After January 31 the Primrose Press, conducted at 168, Fleet-street, will be known as the Orient Press. The work of the firm will be mainly devoted to placing before the public a shilling series of small attractive versions of the great Oriental religions and literatures under the title of "The Wisdom of the East." The first volume, ready January 31, will be "The Duties of the Heart," translated from the Arabic by Rabbi Bachye, with an introduction by Edwin Collins. No English version of this remarkable book has yet appeared. It will be followed at short intervals by "The Sayings of Confucius," "The Odes of Confucius," and "The Sayings of the Brothers of Sincerity." This latter will contain an abstract of the teachings of this interesting sect, which flourished in Persia and Arabia in the ninth and tenth centuries, and will be edited with an introduction by Dr. Paul Brönnle. The Indian religions and literatures will be generally edited by Dr. S. A. Kapadia, secretary of the Northbrook Society.

The Laymen's Club.—On Tuesday evening the Laymen's Club held an At Home for the Unitarian Sunday-school teachers and helpers of London at Essex Hall, when about 300 members and guests were present. The proceedings took the form of a social and musical evening, a most enjoyable programme being rendered by Miss C. Hall, Mrs. F. L. Sargent, Messrs. A. Savage Cooper, M. Hall, V. Hall, and Rev. R. H. U. Bloor. During the evening Dr. Herbert Smith (President) made a short speech outlining the position and hopes of the club, and heartily welcoming its guests, for whom Miss Marian Pritchard made a brief reply. The Hall was decorated with some beautiful flowers and evergreens very kindly sent by Lady Durning Lawrence, and the refreshments were provided by Mrs. Herbert Smith and several other ladies, to whom, in company with all other helpers, a very cordial vote of thanks was returned by the assembly. The playing of the National Anthem brought a most successful and pleasant evening to a close.

VERSES BY JOHN BYROM.

Set not the faults of other folks in view,
But rather mind what thou thyself should'st do;
For twenty errors of thy neighbour known
Will tend but little to reform your own.

A graceful manner and a friendly ease
Will give a "No," and not at all displease;
And an ill-natur'd or ungraceful "Yes,"
When it is giv'n, is taken much amiss.

To give reproof in anger, to be sure,
Whate'er the fault, is not the way to cure;
Would a wise doctor offer, dost thou think,
The sick his potion scalding hot to drink?

Faith, Hope, and Love were question'd what they thought
Of future glory, which religion taught;
Now Faith believ'd it, firmly, to be true;
And Hope expected so to find it too;
Love answer'd, smiling with a conscious glow,
"Believe? Expect?" I know it to be so.

THE PRIESTLEY CENTENARY

II.

JOSEPH PRIESTLEY, STUDENT AND MINISTER.

A GOOD friend of mine and of us all, whose name we are glad to find again in the Essex Hall List of Ministers, would seem to entertain a special animosity to Dr. Priestley as the man who introduced the spirit of sectarianism and dogmatism among the hitherto liberal and catholic-minded Presbyterian churches. I believe the very opposite to be the truth. He was a man of open mind and most tolerant spirit, living among men who were for the most part—whatever their religion or irreligion—intolerant and self-confident. The head and front of Priestley's offending has this extent, no more, that he professed openly and valiantly defended all that he in his heart believed, however contrary to the old and accepted faiths of Christendom. He became a Unitarian and straightway declared himself such and took the name; but I know of no evidence that he sought to bind down his fellow believers or their successors to the holding of the doctrines preached by him. It is true that though at one time he had much objection to the recitation of any creed in public worship, he afterwards, in consideration of "general instruction" as one great object of Christian assemblies, recommended the recital of the Apostles' Creed as corrected by Mr. Lindsey, but it was to be as a statement of fact, not as imposing an obligation. "So I, so we, do believe," without asserting that others are bound to believe the same, or even that we bind ourselves for the future.

He certainly did not believe that he had attained to "the truth," and therein should rest satisfied. Taking leave of his congregation at Leeds, he writes of the gospel he has preached among them as "free, I trust, in a great measure, from the impure mixture of the doctrines and traditions of men;" and he warns them that "better had it been for them to be Papists or Pagans than lukewarm professors of genuine Christianity." Assuredly these are not the words of a bigot or a dogmatist.

The man who is persuaded that the convictions, in matters of religion, at which he has one way or another arrived are the final and absolute truth, will urge them as such upon all whom he can influence, and will especially insist upon their being taught to those who are being trained, that in their turn they may teach others. But it is, I think, certain that if Priestley, convinced Unitarian as he was, had ever been called upon to draw up the constitution of a new college or academy for students for the ministry, it would have been after the pattern of that adopted later on by the institution now called Manchester College. It would not have been Unitarian, nor for the teaching of Unitarianism; its object would have been the untrammeled pursuit of truth. Nor is this a mere impression of my own. Writing in the year 1795, when he had borne his testimony, and had gone into voluntary exile to escape the persecution which it had brought upon him, at a time when some bitterness against the old doctrines might have been excusable, he refers to the Daventry Academy, where he passed three years in preparation for the ministry, having been then "in a state peculiarly favourable to the serious pursuit of truth." One who reads no further might suppose he intended to imply that teachers and students were all of what we should call "the advanced school," and open to the reception of new ideas. But this was not Priestley's idea of "a state favourable to the pursuit of truth." It is by controversy, by questioning, by opposition, by denial that opinions are tested and their worth determined. Without these a speculation will too often be welcomed as a discovery, and a mere suggestion of a master be accepted as ascertained fact. It was far otherwise at Daventry. There "the students were about equally divided upon every question of much importance, and all the articles of theological orthodoxy and heresy: in consequence of which all these topics were the subject of continual discussion." Nor only so, but the teaching staff itself was of different ways of thinking, the principal taking the orthodox side and the assistant that of heresy, "though always with the greatest modesty." Modesty—that, indeed, is the merit which the best and wisest do often so sadly lack. Hence the absurd and mischievous persuasion of each individual that his particular opinion is the truth, and that all who differ from him or her are in error and to be converted or reproved. But with modesty it is possible enough to be friends, and even fellow-workers, with those we most disagree from.

So it was at Daventry. Tutors and students, who might have been constantly bickering, each of the two parties trying to constrain or oust the other, seem to have lived in the most complete amity. "They indulged us," Priestley writes of the tutors, who even though young did not imagine themselves to know everything, "in the greatest freedoms, so that our lectures had often the air of friendly conversations. We were permitted to ask whatever questions we pleased, and we did it with the greatest freedom. The general plan of our studies was exceedingly favourable to free inquiry, as we were referred to authors on both sides of every question, and were even required to give an account of them."

And what was permitted him at Daventry he himself allowed when a tutor at Warrington:—"He always encouraged students to express their own sentiments and to urge any objections to what he had taught. His object was to engage the students to examine and decide for themselves, uninfluenced by the sentiments of any other person." The true principles of religion he "thought to be best promoted by the most thorough, liberal, and unbiassed inquiry into the evidence." So writes a former pupil in the Monthly Repository of April, 1813 (vol. viii. p. 229). These are not the methods approved or employed by the founders of new sects, whether orthodox or heretical.

We have seen that when the young student of nineteen entered the Academy he was well equipped for the study of theology. He had learnt more or less of Greek, Latin, Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, French, German, Italian, mathematics, logic, philosophy, "and made such a proficiency in other branches of learning" that he was excused all the studies of the first year and a great part of those of the second, thus reducing the requisite course of preparation from five years (?) to three. No doubt his acquaintance with these numerous subjects was not full or exact. Even in Latin or Greek, which he had learnt at school, it is likely enough that he would not have been able to pass an examination for honours at the present day. But for his Greek at least we have evidence that he had an intimacy with the language which I believe few first-class men of to-day could boast of. It is incidentally and quite as a matter of course that he tells us how he and the companion who shared the same room with him used to rise early to get through "many articles of business. One of them, which continued all the time we were at the Academy, was to read every day ten folio pages in some Greek author, and generally a Greek play in the course of the week besides." It may be an unscholarly opinion, but I would far rather have a language so known and read—as the most of us know our own tongue—than have a prize-winning temporary acquaintance with syntax and criticism without the facility of easy use.

On the completion of his course at the Academy Priestley received a unanimous invitation from the little congregation of Needham Market, some eight miles distant from Ipswich. Optimist that he was by constitution and on principle, he sums up his experience of three years at Needham as "far from unhappy," and we can believe him, but he had to endure enough to sour the soul of an ordinary young man and disgust him of the ministry. For salary the most he ever received was £30 a year, about eleven shillings a week; and, as the remittances from the aunt who had adopted and maintained him hitherto ceased, "owing in part to the ill offices of orthodox relations," he found it hard to make ends meet. The expense of his board, he tells us, exceeded £20 a year; and efforts to augment his income by taking in—washing? No, though that would probably have paid quite as well, but—pupils, to be taught "classics, mathematics, &c.," at half a guinea the quarter, or to board in the house at the rate of a guinea a month, proved wholly unsuccessful. But twelve lectures on the "Use of the Globes" found ten hearers, and the five guineas they collectively paid was welcome, as it left something over after the globes had been paid for.

And to the pecuniary embarrassments, which the utmost economy could not avail to prevent, was added the humiliation of "a low despised situation." He was suspected by the more orthodox members of his own congregation, who were always attentive to apprehend him of heresy; and neighbouring ministers were shy of inviting him. He had no popular talents, and was much troubled by a hesitation in speech which at times nearly amounted to a stammer. "The more genteel part of his hearers," a friendly neighbour told him, "always absented themselves when they heard Priestley was to preach." Yet he was "not unhappy." "I firmly believed," he writes, "that a wise Providence was disposing everything for the best, and I applied with great assiduity to such studies as required but few books," for these, indeed, he had not the means of buying.

While at Needham he made great advances in the direction of the religious views which he later on adopted under the name of Unitarian. He set to work first on the doctrine of the Atonement, and his plan of investigation—supposing (what as yet it had not occurred to him or to any he had met to doubt) that the Bible was the word of God—was truly scientific; it is thus he describes his method and the result:—"I set myself to peruse the whole of the Old and New Testaments, and to collect from them all the texts that appeared to me to have any relation to the subject. This I did with the greatest care, arranging them under a great variety of heads. At the same time I did not fail to note such general considerations as occurred to me while I was thus employed. The consequence was, what I had no apprehension of when I began the work, a full persuasion that the doctrine of the Atonement, even in its most qualified sense, has no countenance from Scripture or reason." These conclusions he embodied in a tract which he submitted to Dr. Lardner, who approved it, and published about half of it as a pamphlet, without the author's name. The other half, containing "remarks on the reasoning of the Apostle Paul," by no means complimentary to his fame as a subtle and profound disputer, did not commend itself to Lardner. There were plenty of other deep questions which engaged the attention of this young minister, and if it be a charge against him that he was too bold in setting aside the teaching of all his elders, the apology will be found in the care and labour which he devoted to every study to which he turned his attention.

"An accurate comparison of the Hebrew text of the Psalms and Prophets with the Greek version, noting all the variations, &c.," would be for an ordinary student sufficient work for three years, but Priestley had half accomplished it before he left Needham, along with much other work, and a more than ordinary attention to the duties of the ministry.

"While I was in this retired situation," he writes, "I had, in consequence of much pains and thought, become persuaded of the falsity of the doctrine of Atonement, of the inspiration of the authors of the books of Scripture as writers, and of all idea of supernatural influence, except for the purpose of miracles. But I was still an Arian, having never turned my attention to the Socinian doctrine, and contenting myself with seeing the absurdity of the Trinitarian system."

And all this before he was yet twenty-five! The passage is characteristic, but if it emboldens other youths to a like dealing with all that has hitherto been held sacred among us, let them see to it—first that they are as well prepared for a genuine inquiry into the subjects on which they undertake to decide as Priestley was: and, secondly, that they give as "much pains and thought" to the business as we know that he did. If in these two respects, and in natural ability, they can honestly claim to be Priestley's equals, we shall none of us have the right to find fault with them because they arrive at conclusions with which we cannot agree.

But the experience of hnmiliation and poverty was near an end. Friends who knew his circumstances procured him an invitation to preach as a candidate at Sheffield. The Upper Chapel folk had not the gift of insight to discern in the youthful preacher, with an impediment in his speech, the man who was to be the most illustrious ornament of the Unitarian ministry, and they would have none of him. I don't suppose Mill Hill would have known better then. So he went on to Nantwich, and how it fared with him there and at Warrington and Leeds we shall see in our next article.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

FOR THE HEALING OF THE NATIONS.*

I SUPPOSE that all of us, whatever our views on the Boer War may have been, or may be, are deeply conscious that the South African problem was not solved by the cessation of hostilities. I suppose, too, that the bitterness felt by many Englishmen during the war, even if they still think it was justified, must now be lost in the sense of compunction at the thought of the price which the late Boer Republics have paid for whatever action they took, and stand they made, against England. Heavy as our own loss of every kind was, those who believe that our cause was righteous, must feel that our sacrifices and miseries are as nothing compared with those of our late foes. It is only those of us who have to reckon a moral loss on the side of England, that can deem our country less fortunate than those that she has conquered. All of us alike, then, must be filled with deep sorrow for the stricken ones who are now our fellow subjects. It is a sorrow with which we cannot make much show. If it speaks in deeds it must do so in a somewhat shamefaced manner; and if it speaks in words it must almost fear to hear its own voice. Yet the hopes of a brighter future for South Africa must largely depend on the depth of our sympathy with the Boers, and its alertness in watching for opportunities of unobtrusive expression.

There are many books written by Dutch, and not a few written by English soldiers, which will tend to foster the spirit on which we must build our hopes; and now we can welcome a volume of English verse whose "leaves" will be, as we sincerely trust, "for the healing of the nations." Of the other two books that stand at the head of this article, the first is a collection of poems written in the Taal, or Boer Dutch of South Africa, selected, and in many cases composed by F. W. Reitz, late "State Secretary of the South African Republic." They all date from before the last war, though many of them refer to the earlier war of twenty years ago. It is unfortunate that the language in which they are written must make the number of their English readers so extremely small, for the study, or even the cursory reading of them, would serve better than volumes of formal history to bring us into touch with the inner life of the peoples whose future is now so largely in our hands. Many of the poems are adaptations of popular English songs or ballads, from "John Gilpin" and "Young Lochinvar" down to "The Laird of Cockpen," and "Duncan Gray," or even "Villikins and his Dinah." The lilt of each poem is so faultlessly preserved that an English hearer could at once identify it, though read in the Taal; but the local colouring of the Transvaal or the Free State is introduced with such point and skill that the transplanted flowers seem to be of native growth. Many other poems, on the same general plane, are wholly original; and naturally these give one a still deeper insight into the life of the old Boers, with their deep and narrow devoutness, their profound suspicion of all innovations however innocent or salutary, their dismay at the ways of their daughters or sons who had picked up European notions, their simple shrewdness and their sturdy patriotism. Of the songs of war and peace I will not speak, save to say that no patriot, whatever be his fatherland, can read them without deep emotion, or think without a pang of all the memories that they must still awaken, and of the buried hopes for which they must stand to the Boers to-day. A few lines of rough translation of one of these poems must suffice. It speaks of the dash of wind and wave on the Cape Rock, and of the first European eyes that saw it:—

> The sturdy seaman long agone
> When sailing o'er those waves unknown
> Gazed on that rocky giant's form,
> And, shuddering, named it "Cape of Storm."

Then we learn how the land of storm changed its name:—

> Oh, land of hope, thy future lies
> Fair as the heaven before thine eyes.

The early years of struggle are past and the taint of slavery is removed. It shall

> Wipe out that evil word of yore,
> "The earth's slave market" now no more.

Its banner shall be inscribed with the name of freedom:—

> And the world's hoary age shall see
> Her fairest, freest child in thee.

Such were the aspirations cherished by the noblest sons of the vanished Dutch Republics, one of which was, by universal consent, no mean forerunner and representative of the regenerated South Africa of these dreams.

And now the inheritance of these aspirations (to whomever the praise or blame may be due) has fallen upon us, and one of the first conditions of our worthily fulfilling our mission must be an adequate comprehension of the long agony of the war, the desolate sense of inexorable defeat and bafflement on more than the battle-field, which came with the peace, and the terrible want and suffering that follow in the train of war.

The two other books to which I am calling attention, both written by women, one a Boer and the other an Englishwoman, will alike foster this human sympathy. Different as they are in outward form, they tell us so essentially the same tale that for one who has recently read them both it may be difficult to disentangle the details of the one from the details of the other. Mrs. De La Rey's story of her wanderings is an entirely artless narrative; the mere record by one who has no skill in composition, or gift of speech, of the life of a fugitive. She is essentially inarticulate, and yet by sheer force of directness and simplicity, her story burns itself into the mind. When her husband and her two sons went to the war she bade the boys never cease to look to the Lord, and prayed that if she never saw them again on earth, she might meet them in heaven, "and as I said these words my dear Adriaan looked at me." That is all she can tell us. Not long after this, Adriaan and his father, after a hard fought battle, were walking together when a shell exploded between them. "Has it hit you, father?" asked Adriaan. "No," said De La Rey; and they walked on in silence some hundred and fifty paces; then Adriaan had to sit down, the shell had hit him, and the next morning he died in his father's arms. When Methuen came to her home he showed her some kindness, and allowed her to keep her lost Adriaan's horse, which would otherwise have been requisitioned, but her house was doomed, for she had been guilty of "sheltering General De La Rey," and she only had her choice between the life of a captive and that of a fugitive. She chose the latter. Methuen subsequently fell, as we all remember, into the hands of the Boers, and Mrs. De La Rey paid him many attentions. When she cooked a chicken for him some of her friends expostulated with her for unnecessary consideration for a man who had done them all such terrible injury, but she replied (with a charming avowal of her mingled motives) that she had not sunk so low as to hate anyone, and besides, she should like to show him that, for all his devastations, they could still produce a few delicacies at a pinch.

But the sense of fate is upon us, as we read her pages, as much as if we were reading the Œdipus of Sophocles. The Inexorable closes upon her; her brave spirit is numbed if not broken; the longing for rest seems to absorb her whole powers; yet when peace comes at last, it sounds like a knell.

The Englishwoman has evidently drawn the details of her picture from many sources. She has entered with deep affection into the lives of those of whom she writes, and has vividly realised the local surroundings and conditions. Deep human sympathy speaks in every line she writes. How far she has drawn directly on Mrs. De La Rey's narrative I cannot say, for there is a sad uniformity about the basal material of all such narratives; but to me, passing straight from one to the other, the effect is that Miss Buckton has interpreted Mrs. De La Rey, and made her articulate to the English reader. She adopts a great variety of metrical forms, but they are all simple, as the subject demands, and appropriate to the various moods and motives of the "Ballad-Epic." There is something like a studious avoidance of mere richness of poetic or imaginative phrase (which Miss Buckton has shown us elsewhere she can command when she chooses); for the theme demands, above all things, simplicity and directness. The passion of sympathy that speaks throughout, has found relief in the restraint imposed by the dramatic conditions under which Miss Buckton writes, for it is in the person of Engela, the Boer wife and mother that she speaks. She guides us through the apprehensions that preceded the declaration of war, the solemn reading of the story of Deborah, "a mother in Israel," and Engela's silent surrender of her stalwart son, just under the age liable for military service, on into all the incidents of the war, as felt and seen from the home, from the fugitive's wagon, from the concentration camp, with the incident of the young British officer nursed in the home subsequently burnt down, with deep compunction, by one of his fellows, and the deaths of old and young.

Under the wild moon
A rough stone stands,
Raised too soon,
Marked by alien hands,
Glimmering white afar
In the dead lambs' fold.

"Jaapie—prisoner of war—
Ten years old!"

Then at last:—

O sad-eyed Peace,
Implored in vain,
Frighted afar
By blood and war,
Return and make thy home with us again.

Thy outstretched hands
Are bleeding yet;
Thy garments worn
With dust and tears, thou canst not yet forget!

O brooding Peace,
Banished so long,
Forgive, forgive
These hearts that grieve,
Checking their grief to hail thee with a song!

We have no palms,
No gifts to bring,
And lay as meet
Before thy feet,
But a people's heart, made great by suffering!

The whole closes with the widow's thoughts of the wounded husband who never reached the land of his exile:

Whose sleep was still under the ocean wave.

WOODS AND GARDENS INSTEAD OF SLAG-HEAPS.

MANY are the laments over the frequent destruction of natural beauty by commerce and manufacturing industries: the proportion of England which is left unspoilt is reduced every year. But those who lament this destruction are not content merely to put obstacles in the way of its increase. They have, in some cases, set to work to restore to beauty or mitigate the ugliness of even such places as have been most damaged. In the Midlands of England a Re-afforesting Association has been formed to promote the planting of waste ground in those parts of Worcestershire and Staffordshire known as the Black Country. There are great waste areas, heaps of slag from the furnaces, and other expanses with nothing on them but filth and ugliness, some of which possessed at one time great beauty. No less than 30,000 acres, equivalent to a square of land seven miles each way, are capable of cultivation, so the Association affirms on the advice of experts, and of this area some 14,000 acres are no longer in use even as ground on which to tip rubbish, and are ready for immediate development.

It is pointed out that most of the waste ground could be planted with trees of an appropriate kind with no great trouble, and that such plantations would be commercially profitable, producing timber and improving the value of building land in the neighbourhood. The healthiness of the district, and the pleasure and refreshment to the eyes of people dwelling in it is a matter of great importance. Ugly pit-tips should be hidden if possible. It has been proved in foreign lands as well as in some parts of England, Wales, and Scotland that trees will thrive on pit-waste and furnace slag. The greatest difficulty is the state of the atmosphere. But the vitiated atmosphere which is preventive of the healthy growth of trees must be harmful to human beings, and every effort should be made to purify it, or rather to abstain from polluting it, for so soon as the pollution is stopped nature will improve it. It is stated, however, that the Black Country atmosphere is not so impure as it was, that the use of producer-gas is reducing, and will further reduce, the smoke, and that most of the present smoke could be prevented. It is proposed that the seed should be sown broadcast in the parts where trees are desired, and nature left to do the rest. This, though contrary to the rules of good gardening, is declared to be good forestry.

The idea is attractive. The names of Honorary Consulting Experts, and Honorary Consulting Chemist, on the list of officers seems to imply that the Association will be able to give good advice. Further information can be readily obtained from the secretary, Mr. Herbert Stone, of Bracebridge-street, Birmingham. It would seem, however, that the funds for the work ought to be freely contributed by the landowners whose property adjoining that which is to be beautified will be materially increased in value if they adopt the suggestions of the Association. In fact, it appears to be their especial business.

It would be a good thing if the Association were to demonstrate that these proposals would be remunerative, by purchasing land at present waste and useless, if it can be obtained at a low price, and, reserving part as a free public park, repay the outlay by selling or letting the remainder at the increased price resulting from its improved value for residential purposes.

THE CHRIST OF EXPERIENCE.

SIR,—I understand Dr. Rendel Harris to admit that the passage in Matthew xi. 27 (parallel with Luke x. 22) is "out of harmony with a situation to which it does not belong." When he can show us the situation to which it does belong, and the setting where it originally was "in perfect sequence and psychological harmony," we shall be better able to estimate the probability that it was, or was not, a real saying of Jesus. For such a demonstration all Gospel students will thank him.

With respect to the Matthean pendant, "Come unto me," Dr. Harris has, by an accidental misquotation of my words, ascribed to me a confidence in its authenticity which I did not profess. After pointing out the fact that its phrases are in part those of ancient prophecy, I wrote: "That [i.e., that fact] is no reason why Jesus should not have used them [the phrases]." Dr. Harris cites me as saying, "There is no reason why Jesus should have not used them [the words in question, 'Come unto me'], " which is a very different thing. Apart, however, from this personal matter, even if it be established that "Christ speaks in the person of the Ideal Wisdom," I do not see that the passage supports the contention for which I understood Mr. Grubb to produce it, viz., to show that Jesus interposed himself between us and God as a mediator in prayer, or other forms of religious experience. At the most it could only imply that he claimed the character of the Ideal Teacher. And can we suppose that he consciously did so for a world that was to last thousands of years, and contain thousands of millions of people?

But the identification which is buttressed by a reference to Matt. xxiii. 34, 35, and Luke xi. 49-51, is not, after all, so historically secure. In what sense could Jesus say, "Behold I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: some of them shall ye kill and crucify"? Wise men and scribes were no teachers of the early church, whatever may have been the significance of "prophets." The despatch of prophets is, in the Old Testament, the prerogative of Yahweh (Isaiah vi. 8; Jer. vii. 25, &c.). When, therefore, Luke (xi. 49) attributes this to the divine wisdom, we begin to suspect that the words "Therefore also said* the wisdom of God," put into the mouth of Jesus in the middle of a speech, are not a quotation by himself from a past discourse of his own, but really introduce a citation from some lost work in which Wisdom is the speaker. There is no need to recite the various forms of this conjecture from Paulus onward.† That alien elements are now associated with genuine words of Jesus in Matt. xxiv. is becoming more and more generally recognised. It is not at all impossible, therefore, that the adjacent passage in xxiii. 34, 35 may be due to a similar amalgamation. If Jesus bore in the devout phraseology of the Apostle Paul the designation of "the wisdom of God" (1 Cor. i. 24), this may have facilitated the ascription of such language to him. That the passage is of later date is certain if the identification of Zachariah, son of Berechiah, with Zachariah, son of Baruch (slain by the Zealots in the Temple during the last days of Jerusalem), be admitted. At least, the words "ye slew" point to some recent event, and not to a murder in the days of King Joash (2 Chron. xxiv. 19–21). Into the difficulties attending this hypothesis I do not enter now. It must be enough to indicate how many possibilities are open, and how far from assured is the solution proposed by Dr. Rendel Harris. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

* Dr. Harris cites this as "saith," as if Jesus were at the moment speaking in the character of Wisdom. But the tense was clear to both King James's translators and the Revisers.

DR. CHARLES BEARD.

SIR,—It is to be hoped that Mr. Robinson's wish respecting some chronicle of the life of Dr. Charles Beard may meet with the approval of his relatives and be fulfilled. Some time ago I suggested to Mr. Tarrant that it would be helpful to many if he could reproduce a portrait of Dr. Beard as a frontispiece for the "Helper," with a suitable memoir amongst the letterpress, but it was then too late to do so.

The curiosity of the present generation of young men is aroused by repeated references to his name and teaching, but definite knowledge of the subject does not seem to be easily attainable. We know more or less vaguely that he was an eminent and exceedingly conscientious scholar; that he was a first authority upon Luther and the spirit of his age; that he was a staunch liberal in politics and religion, being on the friendliest terms with some of the first politicians of his day, and a recognised leader of the most Catholic influence within his own particular group of free churches; and that he was a Christian gentleman. If this is a correct outline, it is worthy of some detail in the shape of colour, light, and shade; and if Mr. Robinson's wish be attained you may count on at least one subscriber from Bethnal Green.

CHILDREN AND BUTTERFLY-CATCHING.

SIR,—I must express my surprise at the appearance in "The Children's Column" of such a story as that entitled "The Butterfly" (January 16). It is not strange that anyone should write this story, for many persons have not the faintest conception either of the rights of animals or the demoralising effect upon human beings of violating those rights, but it seems to me very strange that it should be inserted as suitable reading for the young.

I believe it was Ruskin who made some trenchant remarks to the effect that while he often saw among children's pictures the representation of boys and girls chasing butterflies, as if that were a pretty and guileless pursuit, he would take severe measures to check such actions among his own children.

Science is, of course, the nominal reason and, as it were, the excuse for the cruelty of destroying the living flowers which so greatly enhance summer's beauty; but do the collections made by boys and girls during a few years add much to our entomological knowledge, and even if they do, is not the price thereof too heavy? Would it not be better to have less science and more pity?

"It is a fine day. Go to; let us kill something," is said to be the Englishman's motto, and the "lent boy" in this story is a promising specimen of his race. He cannot be satisfied to see the lovely rainbow-hued insects flying about in the sunshine; he must rob them of that existence which has become a symbol for light-hearted bliss. Never does a feeling of compassion cross his mind, though again and again the victim makes a bid for it. "The butterfly had no sort of fear of what a boy could do to him. He waited. He obligingly moved." Would not this confiding unconsciousness have appealed to the boy's chivalrous instinct, if he had had any? But he is already a finished sportsman, and neither this nor the flight for life that follows moves him in the slightest degree. His sentiments are shared by the writer, who glorifies his cruelty as an act of perseverance. The tone of the story all through is callous in the extreme.

The case of the swallow-hunter is entirely different. The bird is intent only upon its food; the superior human being might be supposed to have an appreciation for beauty and tenderness for the weak.

Such a story would never have found its way into Young Days. The tales contributed to that magazine by the Rev. E. P. Barrow preach a true gospel. Is it not better for children to be too tender-hearted, illogically so, than for them to become the hard-headed, hard-hearted, scientific little wretches they may develop into if butterfly-catching, badger-hunting, and kindred cruel pastimes are upheld as proper sports for young people?

"C. A. F." says that there are two morals to this story, but it seems to me that there is only one, and that a bad one. THEODORA MILLS.

Leckhampton, Cheltenham:

HEAR BOTH SIDES.—We have received from the Rev. Hugh C. Wallace a letter with reference to our note of last week in reprinting his letter to the British Weekly. We there stated that in declining his letter, we added "that if he was bent on publishing he had better send it elsewhere—or words to that effect." We spoke from memory of a letter written in a very busy time, of which we had kept no copy, but Mr. Wallace now assures us that in our letter there is no word about "sending it elsewhere." The point is of the very smallest consequence, for that is what Mr. Wallace had himself said he should do. We certainly thought we had added the phrase in question, and are sorry for the lapse of memory.

OBITUARY.

MR. G. S. DARBISHIRE.

MR. GEORGE STANLEY DARBISHIRE, whose death occurred at Wandsworth on Jan. 7, was the fifth and oldest surviving of the family of six sons of the late Mr. James Darbishire. He was born at Green Heys Hall, Manchester, in 1827, in the house which was built by the father of Thomas de Quincey, all trace of which has long since disappeared. Mr. Darbishire, although in consequence of increasing infirmities he had ceased to be actively interested in denominational affairs, was to the end of his life a sincere and consistent member of the Unitarian body. For many years he undertook the duties of honorary organist at Monton, and subsequently at Cross-street Chapel, where the musical services were an acceptable manifestation of his energy, taste, and skill. The fine organ in Cross-street Chapel was erected by him in 1864, in conjunction with his wife and brother-in-law, Mr. Wm. J. Carver, as a memorial to James Darbishire and to John Carver, both of whom were treasurers of the congregation at the time of their deaths. Mr. Darbishire was a magistrate for the county of Lancaster, and a member of a family which for several generations has been closely identified with the principles of Nonconformity. His remains were laid beside those of his wife, who died in 1882, in Monton Churchyard on Tuesday, the 12th inst., when the Rev. Ambrose Bennett conducted a deeply impressive service in the presence of many of his most intimate friends and relations.

THE ONLY GIFT.

A HEART of love I bring to thee—
Forbid me not,
A heart of love though mine it be—
Forbid me not;
Thy poorest servant here below,
I bring the only gift I know.

Though all the stars in heaven are thine,
Forget me not;
Though but a little world is mine,
Forget me not;
The flower is safe beneath the sky,
And safe within thy love am I.

Ah, when my lamp of life burns low,
Forsake me not;
When stumbling in the dark I go,
Forsake me not;
Come then, and fill my heart anew
With love like thine, for ever true.

My only gift to thee I bring—
Forbid me not;
One prayer I breathe, one song I sing—
Forbid me not;
I sing the love that loves me still,
I pray to know and do thy will.

W. G. TARRANT.

WHEN Thy face looketh forth from all men's faces,
There will be room enough in crowded marts;
Brood Thou around me, and the noise is o'er,
Thy Universe my closet with shut door.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE KNIFE.

THIS knife was a present to Harold when he was leaving Switzerland. Boys, I believe, care most about the blades of a knife, but the most interesting thing about this knife was its handle. There was a bit of botany, a bit of zoology, and a bit of history on it.

Everyone who has been in Switzerland knows what a flowery country it is. The very meadows are not grass like ours, but are masses of flowers. But perhaps the two Swiss flowers one thinks of oftenest are the Alpen-rosen and the Edelweiss. The Alpen-rosen are bushes much like azaleas, with crimson blossoms. The Edelweiss is a white flower that looks as if it were cut out of flannel. It only grows a few inches tall, and is found in very high places. But you need not go to find it, because the boys and girls offer you bunches of it everywhere. So on this knife-handle was, first, a tiny bunch of Alpen-rosen and a stalk of Edelweiss.

When he had put on his Swiss flowers, the man who designed this handle thought he would put on it a Swiss animal. When I think of Swiss animals, I always think first of the Swiss cow—that gentle Swiss cow with her bell, whose feelings I am sure would be hurt, if you didn't speak to her as you pass. Or perhaps of a goat, one of the string of goats which the village goatherd drives to pasture every morning, and whose bells tinkle along the village street every evening. But, after all, there are cows and goats in other countries. What animal belongs to Switzerland and nowhere else? Why, the chamois, of course. A chamois is a sort of glorified goat. He lives on the heights of the mountains, and bounds from peak to peak (at least, that is my impression) when the hunter pursues him. I have never seen a live chamois. But I have seen a great many wooden ones, so I know just how the chamois should look. And here he is on the knife ready to spring into space.

Below the chamois is a man and a boy. The man carries a bow and arrows. It is a great many years since people in Switzerland have gone about with bows and arrows. So this story—if it be a story—must be of something that happened long, long ago.

One day—this is the story—about 600 years ago, a peasant and his little boy came down from their farm on the hillside to Altorf. Altorf is still a big village, embowered in orchards, a little inland from the Lake of Uri. It was market day, and the little square was full of country folk, come to buy or to sell, just as it would be to-day. In those days the Austrians ruled Switzerland, and the governor's name at Altorf was Gessler—a harsh, cruel man, they say. He had lately set up in the market place a pole with his hat on it, giving orders that every one, under pain of death, was to bow to this hat on the pole as if it were himself.

The peasant and his boy came into the market place, and saw the pole. He was known to many of the people, for he was the best hunter and the best marksman in the canton Uri. "What bit of foolery is this?" he said. "Oh," said they, "this is the governor's hat, and everybody must bow to it as they do to him!" He said nothing, only he straightened himself, and walked round the pole.

Now Gessler himself was on horseback in the crowd, on purpose to see who would bow to the hat and who would not, and when he saw this peasant defy his orders, he bade the soldiers bring the man to him. So they brought him—him and the little son. And Gessler, in a rage, asked him why he had not bowed to the hat? "It must have been my stupidity," said the man; "if I were a quick-witted fellow my name wouldn't be Tell." When Gessler heard his name a cruel thought came into his mind, for he had heard of Tell's skill with his bow. "Here," said he, "I have heard how well you shoot. Shoot me an apple from your boy's head. If you hit the apple you shall go free."

In vain the father begged that his skill might be proved some other way. The boy was placed in position, and the apple put on his head. Then the father took two arrows and one he fitted to the bow. He took aim, but his heart failed him. If he should hit his dear little son? But the boy called out cheerfully, "Shoot, father, I am not afraid." And at that the father shot, and his arrow cleft the apple on the boy's head.

Then Gessler saw the second arrow lying there, and demanded what that arrow was for, and Tell answered, "That arrow was for you, had I shot my boy; and be sure the second time I should not have missed."

There are some people who doubt whether this is a true story. But at least this is true about it. It has been believed, and told over and over again, for generations, and each time it has been told it has made men indignant at injustice, oppression, and cruelty. It has made them love liberty, and courage, and heroism.

For my part, I am glad Harold's knife will remind him of this story. But I am not sure after all which bravery I admire most: the bravery of the man who wasn't afraid of the tyrant; or the bravery of the little boy who wasn't afraid of his father's arrow. C. A. F.

WE learn from the Christian Register that Dr. Edward Everett Hale, the veteran Unitarian minister and philanthropist, has been elected chaplain of the United States Senate, his appointment taking effect on New Year's Day. To this announcement the Register adds: "Dr. Hale had planned to spend the winter in Washington, and, of course, it occurred to his life-long friend, Senator Hoar, that the Senate could not do better than to secure his services. It has never been the custom of Congress to choose chaplains for their eminent position and influence. Mr. Milburn, the blind preacher, was chosen for sentimental reasons which were honourable both to him and to those who elected him. But why should not this new departure be made the beginning of a policy which will place always in the chaplain's office someone who will illustrate the best religious life of the people, and give dignity to the position?"

"THE INHERENT WEAKNESS OF UNITARIANISM."

THE justice of this phrase, as descriptive of the quality of a little book, in which three sermons by the Rev. C. G. AMES, of Boston, were last year republished in this country, was challenged by the Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, in a letter to the Liverpool Daily Post, in which a brief review of the book had appeared. Mr. ROBERTS's letter was not published, but in the Daily Post of Jan. 14 was made the subject of editorial comment.

The teaching of the book in question* is that of a very earnest and clear-sighted man, who believes thoroughly in the divine capacity of human nature, and the necessity for each one to "work out his own salvation"—a work best accomplished under "the Leadership of JESUS." An idea of the quality of the teaching may best be given by two brief quotations. The Fatherhood and Brotherhood of which Dr. AMES so earnestly speaks, belong, he says, together. "The more fully we receive the Sonship, the more we shall see in Divinity and in Humanity." And just before comes this passage on the essence of Brotherhood :—

> The love of our human kind, like our sympathy with lower creatures and our affinities with inanimate nature, puts sweetness into every cup. It invigorates every faculty and makes life better worth living, by claiming all resources and energies for honourable and happy uses. It cures us of weak self-pity and silly self-conceit. It enlarges life to make room for every variety of human interest. It is the only antidote for a thousand virulent poisons,—personal, domestic, social, and international. And it opens the door of the heart to the love of God, which flows in more abundantly as we give it free outpour in self-forgetting service.

That is wholesome doctrine, and it points clearly to the emphasis which is laid by Dr. AMES on character as the essential thing in human life, by which alone a man can be brought genuinely nearer to GOD, and in his own measure come to be "perfect," as the "Father in heaven is perfect."

How the "Leadership of JESUS" helps in the formation of that true character is not the specific subject of either of the discourses in this little book, but it will not be difficult to see for anyone who reads these discourses. What Dr. AMES means by salvation the following passage may show :—

> This idea of Salvation by Character needs to be emphasised for a quite serious reason. It is to be feared that many have been looking for salvation in the wrong direction. They have been asking, "What will become of us?" when the more vital question is, "What ought we to become?" They have been seeking for safety when they should have been seeking for soundness. They have been concerned to escape the consequences of sin rather than to escape from sin. This is much as if the sick man should be more anxious to be rid of pain than to be restored to health.

Such teaching, we are to understand from the critic of the Liverpool Daily Post, displays the "inherent weakness of the Unitarian position." It may be content to rest under that severe condemnation; but what is most curious to us, and so interesting that it seems well to us to reproduce it here, is the EDITOR's subsequent comment, with its doctrine of the proper function of the non-sectarian journal. Thus we read in the Liverpool Daily Post :—

> What we saw of "weakness" in this book was not in its title, but—treating the matter as one of prevalent theological opinion—in the absence from it of a recognition of that unique relation of JESUS to His FATHER in Heaven which is generally regarded in Christendom as running through the Gospels. Whichever doctrine may be true, the predominant idea of Christendom is that it is a weak position to be content with CHRIST'S morally perfect character; to claim from this that He fully realised and revealed the true relations between GOD and mankind; while rejecting half His declarations about His own Person. "Orthodoxy," even if it has no other rights, is entitled to govern the common parlance of non-sectarian journalism.

> A daily paper in England is in the ordinary way assumed to adopt the Trinitarian standpoint of the majority, and the majority certainly consider that the Unitarian position has "inherent weakness." This, therefore, was a natural enough thing to say, and ought not to be taken offence at by those whose views of doctrine are held by a minority. It is the duty of a general newspaper to avoid, rather than to make, any overt discriminations between controverted dogmas; but it is its duty to make rather than to avoid such observations on theological writings as differentiate between their respective schools. Mr. ROBERTS'S aim, he says, in writing his first letter to us was to give a fair counterpoise to the sort of slur which he detected in our review. He desired "to let ordinary people understand that every book of any weight written on the Gospel of Jesus emphasises Fatherhood, Brotherhood, and Character; and that the more learned writers dwell on Christian origins the more they lay the significance on these factors as the essentials of the Gospel." Granted. A good view. But our view was good, too, in the sense of being an accurate classification of the theology of the writer of the book briefly criticised. It is well for both readers and writers to understand and appraise such points of journalistic treatment.

We gather from this passage that "the common parlance of non-sectarian journalism" has to follow the opinion of the majority, "whichever doctrine may be true," and that, therefore, those who in the matter of doctrine are in the minority have no just ground of offence when they are condemned, even though the truth is on their side. We do not complain of this if the position is clearly understood. We are to conclude, then, that the "general newspaper" speaks with the voice of the Trinitarian because that is the doctrine of the majority. But it appears to us that one who is in the minority and holds that his doctrine has been unjustly condemned ought in a "non-sectarian" journal to have the opportunity of putting forward another view. And we add this further remark, that if such is the inevitable position of a journal towards the majority and the minority, the value of its judgment on books suffers from a somewhat serious defect.

THE COTTON CRISIS.

THE year is opening sadly in Lancashire. Some months ago we referred to the disaster which then seemed to be impending over her staple trade, the great cotton industry. Now it appears that the evil which was then feared is being rapidly realised. The price of cotton has been raised to such a height, and subjected to such sudden fluctuations, as to make profitable business almost impossible. Manufacturers are threatened with ruin; operatives with "short time," to an extent which must involve great want and misery. There must be many in our Lancashire chapels and Sunday-schools who are burdened with painful anxiety as to the future, or indeed already caught in the toils of a suffering which is due to no fault of theirs. To them our hearts go out in deep sympathy.

Such a state of things would be a sufficient reason for sadness from whatever cause it might have arisen; but when we realise that it is in a large measure due to the greed of a group of gamblers, we ought to feel something more than sadness. We ought to be filled with a burning indignation against the men whose commercial ideals are so low that they can do this thing. But are we, that is, the general public, so minded? Is that our feeling? That is one of the most important questions that arise in connection with this crisis. That wrong is being done is beyond all question. What does public opinion say about it? If it is leading to the formation of a sounder public opinion upon such subjects, then it may be that the evil is bringing with it a hope for the future that will be in some degree a compensation for the sufferings of the present.

To some extent, at least among those more directly affected, this would seem to be the case. Meetings have been held at which "international gambling," as it is somewhat curiously called, has been vigorously denounced, and there has even been a call for Government interference. It is a gain that we should be getting past our ambiguous term "speculation," to the plain one "gambling," but it seems rather futile to call upon the Government for help. No government or combination of governments could probably do anything effectual without such an interference with individual liberty as would not be tolerated. This is essentially a moral question, and the best of governments must always leave it open to men to act immorally in some directions, if they are so minded. Something, no doubt, might be done to render these mischievous transactions more difficult and hazardous than they now are, but the combined ability and greed of the offenders may be trusted to find a way round or through the provisions of the best-intentioned Acts of Parliament. One suggestion which has been made, that of specially taxing certain classes of contracts, would, even if it were possible, only aggravate the evil by officially countenancing it.

There is, indeed, only one public authority which can effectually deal with evils of this kind, and that is the authority of an enlightened public conscience expressing itself in a stern public opinion. These gamblers do not play for money alone. It is for what wealth can bring them in influence, power, and consideration among their fellow-men, that they care, even more than for the money and the material objects it can buy. It is within the power of public opinion to deprive them of these things, to make them what they ought to be, gilded pariahs, tainted outlaws of society. To such treatment they would respond, for they are human, only too human, and to the settled contempt and aversion of his fellows man is apt to respond by an endeavour to mend his ways.

It is to the cultivation of nobler ideals of the dignity of commerce, and the significance of wealth, ideals already operative in the minds of thousands of honourable business men, that we must look. So long, however, as we have among us large numbers of men operating on a small scale, who have low ideals of the objects and methods of business, regarding it simply as a process for enriching the individual, and not recognising in it a sphere of duty which affords a continuous opportunity of serving the interests of mankind, so long shall we from time to time be subject to such attacks upon the well-being of society in the interests of a few at the hands of clever and powerful men operating on a great scale. The little man and the fool speculate in a small way, and possibly do not do much harm directly, except to themselves. Indirectly, however, they help to form the atmosphere, the corrupted public opinion which prepares the way for the big and clever man operating and gambling on a great scale. They, the small men, must be held responsible in some degree for the mischief he does, for they help to make his career possible.

It may be asked, why does THE INQUIRER trouble itself about matters such as these? Are they within the province of a religious newspaper? In our opinion they are, for we believe that it is largely to religious agencies that we must look for the formation and spread of the nobler ideals and sounder public opinion which are so sorely needed. Organised religion in the twentieth century will have to speak more boldly and more definitely on such topics as these if she is to strengthen her waning hold upon the minds of thoughtful men. She will have to realise more clearly than she has done that life, the life of the men and women of to-day, is her great province, and the facts of life the most important objects of her studies and her labours. The message which men are awaiting from her is one that shall pertain to their daily lives, and help them to make those lives nobler and more beautiful by presenting them with lofty ideals, and, when needful, admonishing them with stern rebuke, in every department of their activity.

IN connection with Mr. Wicksteed's article "For the Healing of the Nations," we would call the attention of our readers to the following passage of a letter from Mr. C. E. Maurice:—

"The South African Women's and Children's Relief Fund, which was formed to assist Miss Hobhouse in her work in South Africa, is still being carried on by the same committee. Miss Hobhouse's last visit to South Africa has been most successful. The Government have consented to re-open the Repatriation Fund, which they had treated as closed. But in the meantime the funds of the committee are being freely spent, and many farmers have been supplied through Miss Hobhouse's help with teams of horses. In some cases these have been passed on from one farmer to another. Money has also been sent to a Rescue Home. Fowls have been supplied to start a destitute widow in her home; help has been given for rebuilding houses; and many instances could be mentioned of relief in sickness and accident. Miss Hobhouse has consulted with the Dutch ministers and others about the cases to be relieved, and all care is taken that the help should reach the right people. Miss Hobhouse is expected shortly to return to England, when she will be able to give further information. In the meantime, any money may be sent to the treasurer of the Fund, Lady Farrer, at 3, Whitehall Court, Whitehall-place, S.W., or to the Secretary, at 59, Holbein Mansions, Sloane-square, S.W.

M. LOISY AND ROME.

I.

THE ABBÉ LOISY AND THE LIBERAL MOVEMENT IN THE CHURCH OF FRANCE.

SOME two years ago (I shall perhaps be pardoned for this personal reference) I received from a distinguished French Lazarist, who presided over a seminary for the training of priests, and himself taught Hebrew, a request for permission to translate and reprint for the use of his students the analytical tables of the Mosaic Laws contributed by the Rev. G. Harford to a certain edition of the Hexateuch. It was my first intimation that the modern critical views of the Old Testament were making way into the instruction of the Catholic clergy. Francis Lenormant, two decades before, had brought his brilliant erudition to bear on the early chapters of Genesis; but his researches into the "Origins of History" did not commend themselves to his Church, though he died (I believe) in full communion with it. The cuneiform texts must of necessity be left to experts: and their bearing on theology was not then fully apprehended. Delitzsch had not lectured, and the German Emperor had not written a famous letter.

To-day, however, France is face to face with much more serious questions. Everyone has now heard of the book published a little more than twelve months since by the brave Abbé Loisy, on "The Gospel and the Church." A number of vigorous publications had preceded it. One volume after another, on the Canons of the Old Testament and of the New, on the Hebrew text and the versions, on Job, on the Synoptic Gospels, on Babylonian myths, on the history of Israel, bore witness to the author's indefatigable industry, and his wide learning; just as his pious and devoted life attested the sincerity of his religion. But in L'Évangile et l'Église the Abbé entered on a new path. Desirous of winning back to the Church minds that were repelled by the apparent conflict between traditional dogma and historic investigation, he descended from the professor's chair, divested himself of technical apparatus, and appealed to the laity under the shelter of the great conception of evolution.

The method of the book was in part prescribed for the author by his desire to oppose to the Protestant principle of Harnack, which may be briefly summed up in the formula "back to Christ," the Catholic principle of development. Starting from the frankest recognition of the results of modern critical inquiry, he argued that the divine germ in the Gospel could only accomplish its great mission for the salvation of men by the aid of a society which should foster its growth and carry it forth to win the world. Such an organisation must create its own forms of teaching and administration. It must be able to defend the right doctrine against the wrong; in other words, to define dogma; it must nourish devotion by worship, and for that end it must institute a priesthood and provide sacraments. But at any given moment its organisation, its teaching, its cultus, must adapt itself to the life around it. If the philosophical conceptions, by the help of which its theology has sought expression, are transformed by advancing knowledge, it must recognise these changes, and itself restate the truths committed to it. The intellectual forms of one age cannot be imposed upon another without alienating minds that are open to the new influences streaming in upon them. The Church, therefore, which has justified itself by the fact that it has supplied the religious needs of so many generations, ought to acknowledge that a time may come when the movements of human thought may require new presentations of old ideas. Nay, in M. Loisy's judgment, it ought to realise without delay that such a time has come; science, philosophy, history, all combine to demand that the essential elements of Christian experience shall be re-interpreted.

In defending the Church, therefore, against Protestant attack in the person of Harnack, M. Loisy appealed to it to advance yet further along the path it had already trodden. To formulate its Christology it had availed itself of the aid of Greek thought in the fourth century; to define the significance of the Eucharist it had used the ideas and language of the thirteenth. Why should it not employ the methods of criticism and the principles of investigation which would bring it into harmony with the mind of to-day? The answer of the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris was not long in coming. He appointed a commission of theologians to examine the book. By Jan. 17, 1903, their report was ready. It was declared to have been published without the imprimatur required by the laws of the Church; and to be of a nature calculated to cause grave disturbance to the faith of believers in the fundamental doctrines of Catholicism especially the authority of the Scriptures and of tradition, the divinity of Jesus Christ, his infallible knowledge, and the like. The clergy of the diocese were forbidden to read it. The Archbishop of Cambrai and six bishops issued similar prohibitions. M. Loisy, in a dignified letter, himself condemned the errors which might be deduced from it by interpreters who adopted a wholly different point of view from that assumed by the author, and then remained silent. He was removed from his post as ecclesiastical teacher; but his pen could not be hindered. Last autumn he issued two remarkable volumes, one a commentary on the Fourth Gospel, the other a series of letters to eminent Catholic dignitaries gathered under the title Autour d'un Petit Livre. Deferring for the present an account of the latter, in which the positions of the incriminated book are reasserted with exquisite skill, let us say a few words concerning the treatise on John.

It is a massive volume containing 960 pp., full of daring criticism which tests to the utmost the scope and application of the author's principles. The introduction occupies 150 pp.; the main portion of the work consists of exposition and commentary, scene by scene and verse by verse. The discussion of the value of the ecclesiastical tradition leads to the conclusion that from the point of view of history the evidence cannot justify an unhesitating assertion of the apostolic authorship. The residence and the death of the apostle John at Ephesus are not historically certain. It is possible that there was a confusion between John the apostle and John the elder, the disciple of the Lord. But, further, the composition of the Gospel by John of Ephesus, whether apostle or elder, cannot be considered as beyond doubt when Polycarp and Papias are silent and the Alogi contradict. The question must be decided rather by internal considerations than by external attestation. From this point of view the answer is decisive. One word is the key to the whole: it is not history but symbolism.

With extraordinary patience, with wide command of patristic exegesis (in which the presence of allegory is constantly recognised, though its significance is so often obscured), and with all the resources of modern scholarship, M. Loisy pursues his way from the prologue to the close, and never falters in the application of his key. Into the details of the elaborate structure which is thus reared, it is impossible to enter here. It supplies the clues to the peculiar chronology of the Gospel, to the fresh personalities which it introduces, and the new phases of the old familiar figures. Nicodemus, for example, plays the part of the young man who asked the teacher what he must do to "inherit eternal life." The answer is given in the doctrine of the new birth and the reference to baptism. The sequel asserts that Jesus baptized in Judea, like John. Was this, then, proper Christian baptism, for does not the Gospel itself tell us (vii. 39) that there was as yet no holy spirit, because Jesus was not yet glorified? And if so, how is it that Jesus can expound a theory of the sacrament to Nicodemus, and even himself perform the rite? This is, indeed, corrected afterwards by the statement that Jesus himself did not baptize, but only the disciples. Was there, then, already an organised society? Matthew ascribes the rite to the command of the risen Christ, which implies that it originated historically with the Church. The fourth Evangelist, however, contrasting Christian baptism with that of John, brings them into imaginative contemporaneity, while he pays homage to fact by admitting that the rite was only performed by the followers of Jesus, and the gift of the spirit, which was its seal, did not arrive till after his death. In what sense, then, could Jesus allude to it in conversation with Nicodemus? It is because Nicodemus represents the reluctance of well-meaning Judaism, which could not get rid of its legalities and its Messianic hopes; while the discourses of Jesus are the words of the glorified Christ assigned by anticipation to his earthly career. The utterances of the Teacher are thus transformed into sayings which reflect the consciousness and embody the sentiments of the Church.

What, then, becomes of the beloved disciple, and the occasional historical detail which gathers round the form so long identified with the son of Zebedee? Every reader of the Fourth Gospel is, of course, aware how different are its portraits compared with those of the first three. Peter, indeed is there; lodged, like Pilate, too firmly in the story; but, like Pilate, conceived and drawn afresh. The Teacher's mother is there, too, but no longer in the simple yet august relation delineated by Luke; she has become a typical creation; she represents the Synagogue and the Judeo-Christian community of which the Church was the issue. But where is John? He is nowhere named in the body of the Gospel. If it was he who stood beside Andrew (i. 35-40), why is he not identified, and why is he associated, not with his own brother James, but with the brother of Peter? The fact is that the beloved disciple is no historic personality. He is the representative of the Church of the future. He is the symbol of spiritual Christianity, as it was realised by Hellenism. On the last night, when Jesus unfolds the secrets of the Church's life at a distance of two or three generations, it is he who lies upon Messiah's breast, as the friend who knows his inmost secrets. The perfect disciple, according to the ideal of the fourth Gospel, is superior to Peter, whose primitive Christianity inadequately expressed the Master's mind. If he is present at the foot of the cross, it is as spiritual witness of its saving power. And if to him is committed the charge of the dying Saviour's mother,* it is because Hellenic Christianity could not disown its filiation from the Old Testament; but the elder Judaism must make its home with the new faith. No part of M. Loisy's exposition will seem to the casual reader so like a gratuitous extravagance as this. But it cannot be judged apart from the scheme of the whole. Once grant the existence of symbolism in the book, and any special interpretation becomes only a question of the legitimate limits for the application of an acknowledged principle of literary method.

The conclusion is that there is no proof that the beloved disciple ever actually existed. Nothing compels us to suppose that he belonged to the apostolic college: there is no hint in the book itself that the writer wished to put him into any special relation with John, the son of Zebedee. The author intended to remain unknown. He was a Christian of Judeo-Alexandrine education. His interest, his pre-occupations, were with theology rather than history; he had no scruple in turning tradition into a vehicle for doctrine. He was separated from the Christ who lived on earth by a farther distance than Paul; he was, in fact, a disciple of the great Apostle of the Gentiles, or rather of his writings, for he must have belonged to the third Christian generation. His object was not so much dogmatic as didactic. He is more concerned to confirm the faithful in Christian experience than to prove a thesis in Christology. The fundamental conception of the whole is the mystic union of Christ and the believer, the mutual indwelling of the master and the disciple. The Johannine ideas are only the intellectual form of this faith, the essence of which is the fellowship of the Christian with Christ conceived as the heavenly Word. The peculiar modes, however, in which this faith is expounded, could not have been intelligible beyond a limited circle. The gospel was not a book for popular reading. It could be understood only by those who were prepared to apprehend its meaning by some prior training in symbolic expression. Long has the clue been lost. A book written for small groups of the initiated has been treated, on the one hand, as actual history; on the other, as a complete philosophy of theology. It is neither. It is a book of religious imagination. The Christ whom it portrays is not the "Prophet of Nazareth," as he moved among his countrymen; it is the spiritual ideal which invigorates and unifies the Church. Until the author is recognised as the first and greatest of Christian mystics rather than the last of the biographers of Jesus, "the seven seals of the Apocalypse will remain on the Gospel of the Spirit."

* M. Loisy is careful to point out that, according to Synoptic tradition, no woman was present at the crucifixion, and Mary was not even in Jerusalem.

No one will be surprised that Rome should have spoken at last, and put this courageous book upon the Index, along with the two little volumes which contain its fundamental propositions in popular form.

How can such interpretations be conciliated with the dogmas of Catholic faith? To this question, discussed in one of the brilliant letters which make up the volume Autour d'un Petit Livre, we must return again.

ROBERT COLLYER'S "MEMORIES."

FROM the summit of his eighty years Robert Collyer is contributing to the Christian Register a delightful series of articles, entitled "Some Memories," telling of his early life, in his Yorkshire home. The first article appeared in the Register of December 3, and except in the number which reported the celebration of his birthday, have been continued from week to week. How far the story is to be carried we do not know, but for the sake of the wide circle of Mr. Collyer's English friends, we trust that we shall be forgiven for reproducing some passages here. Copies of the Register can be ordered through Essex Hall, or direct from the "Christian Register Association," 272, Congress-street, Boston, Mass. The price, with postage, is fourpence a copy.

His Love of Reading.

The cottage home in Yorkshire, and his simple and wholesome bringing up, Mr. Collyer vividly describes, and then tells how having once as a small boy a penny to spend on sweets, he bought instead from the one village shop a tiny book, "The History of Whittington and His Cat." Then, after some other memories, he proceeds:—"And now I will return to note that the spark struck out on the day when I bought the tiny book at prime cost was not as a fire enfolding itself, to be no more seen or heard of. It must have started a fire in my nature which has not yet burned down to white ashes; for, when I had learned to read to some purpose, I see myself in the far-away time and cottage, reading, as I may truly say in my case, for dear life. There was a small store of books in our home, and among them Bunyan's 'Pilgrim,' 'Robinson Crusoe,' and Goldsmith's histories of England and Rome. These, I may say, I almost got by heart. The rest were religious books: they did not suit me, so I let them hang on the shelf—more's the pity, do you say? And I answer, I am not so sure about that, because I think it was then I must have found the germ in those I did read of my lifelong instinct for the use of simple Saxon words and sentences which has been of some worth to me in the work I was finally called to do.

"My father noticed in good time my hunger for books, and, as there was no money to buy more, the dear good fellow began to borrow them from far and wide in our small commune. He found Burns and Shakespeare for me, with more I do not remember, and brought them home; but he laid down the law that I should not soil them, and should return them when they were well read to the owner, so I think the lenders had no reason to complain with our dear Sir Walter Scott that some of his friends were good book-keepers, but bad accountants.

"Now I come to Ilkley again, where in the first year of my 'prenticeship I found one of the friends that sticketh closer than a brother. He was some years my elder—ten, I think—a working man who never married, and was beyond all comparison the best read man and of the finest culture among the native men of the town. John Dobson—let me write his name for love's sake—was my whole college of professors, if I may use the term, through the twelve years of my life there as apprentice, and then manager of the forge. There was no library where we could borrow books, so he must buy them out of his scant wages; for I had no money. This he would gladly do, sparing to spend, and bring them to me with shining eyes.

"I had no dream of the worth which might lie in the hunger, any more than that I should sit here this morning touching these memories while the soft thunder of this great city steals through my library. The worth lay in the reading, in which not seldom I would 'plunge soul headlong, impassioned by the beauty and salt of truth.' And I still remember how I would climb up to the moor on Sunday afternoons in the pleasant summer-time with some book—I always went to the old church in the morning—sit down on one great gray crag to read a chapter and to watch the sunshine ripple over the heather like a great translucent sea, and listen to the music of the bells in the dark old tower at Haworth meet and mingle with the music from the tower of our own church below, where the Longfellows worshipped through some centuries of time. Then something I had read would set me thinking and talking back, as we say, with no audience but the moor sheep looking up in wonder as they fed.

His "Conversion."

"Then the memory comes of a change through a great sorrow which befell me, when my life was dark in the shadows of death, for which I found no help in books and must find help in God. I did not consult with flesh and blood, not even with my dear friend and good helper, John. The whole experience seemed too sacred. The secret lay between God and my own soul, and seems still so sacred that I hesitate over these lines.

"But in about a month my heart was quiet. I had found rest in Him, and then must needs find fellowship among those who were like-hearted; for the great woman well says: 'On solitary souls the universe looks down inhospitable, and the human heart finds nowhere shelter but in human kind.'

"There was a band of Methodists, my old neighbours and friends, who met in a small chapel. There I went and told them in not many words how it was with me. They wondered first and then gave me a warm welcome. I had found out that one stick is not good for a fire. I knew how they would have loved to have a share in my conversion, open and above board, with Hallelujahs and Amens; but there I was, take me or leave me. They were not over-particular about the sticks if they would burn well, while in the burning a certain gift of speech came I must have inherited from my mother, in the prayer and class meetings, of which this was the upshot. In about a year the preacher in charge of the churches came to see me, and told me this story, how the brethren in the quarterly meeting on the previous Monday had risen one by one and said it had been borne in upon their hearts that I had a call to preach the Gospel. They were local preachers, with a gift for this work, and rustical men, with one exception, who made their own living as artisans and small farmers, and preached on Sundays for the love of God and of human souls, while some of them answered well to the canon of the great Swiss reformer, 'A man who is truly called to preach the Gospel may know many things, but must know two—God, and how to speak to the people.'

"Shall I say that there have been moments in my life when what 'Friends' call 'the inward light' has shone or flashed for me on turning points always I as see now? Well, this was one, and the first. I told good old Michael that I should be glad to try, and he said I must be ready when he called. So I went home to think out a sermon from the text, 'As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of a sinner.'

His First Preaching.

"The word came duly that I must preach at the chapel in Addingham, three miles up the river. It was Sunday afternoon. Luther loved to preach on Sunday afternoons because the men servants and maid servants could come to hear him then in great numbers, but I found only a handful. And here I must make confession. The sermon was divided into three parts: the firstly and lastly were my own, the secondly I stole from a sound Scotch divine.

"I must have no paper, so I had none, but managed somehow to get through. There was no greeting from the hearers as I came out of the chapel to go home; but half-way there I halted, for I found I had quite forgotten the secondly I had stolen. And then came the painful conclusion that it served me right, and my text should have been by good rights, 'Thou shalt not steal,' while from that time to this I may say in all honesty I have stood true to Paul's words, 'Let him that stole steal no more.'

"There was no inward light for me then. I had meant to do a mean thing and had failed, but by heaven's grace the failure opened the way to my ordination as a Methodist local preacher. I felt no great eagerness to try again: my sin had found me out. They did not know my secret, and old Michael sent me on a Sunday soon after to preach in a farmer's kitchen, on the lift of the moor, where they only had preaching now and then, and where I may suppose he thought poor provision might pass where the feasts came few and far between.

His True Ordination.

"It was in June. I see the place still, and am aware of the fragrance of the wild uplands stealing through the open lattice on bars of sunshine, to mingle with the pungent snap of the peat fire on the hearth which gives forth the essence of the moorlands for a thousand years. And I still mind how heavy my heart was that afternoon. I had been trying all the week to find a sermon in a parable, but there was no pulse to answer, no vision, and Bishop Horne says, 'If you distil dry bones, all you will have for your pains is water.'

"Still there I was, the preacher, and they were simple-hearted folk up there, of the old Methodist election unto grace, eager, and hungry for the word of life, and ready to come in with the grand Amens.

"The big farm kitchen was full, and they were just the hearers to help a poor soul over the sand bars on the lift of their full hearts. So they sang with a will; and where in all the world will you hear such singing with a will as in Yorkshire and Lancashire! Then I must pray. Father Taylor said, "I cannot make a prayer," nor can I. But, with those hearts filled from the springs of life, I felt that day the prayer was making me. Then the time came for the sermon. Some stammering words came to my lips, and then some more, while gleams of light began to play about my parable. And their eyes began to shine, while now and then the grand Amens came in as a chorus from the chests of men who talked to each other in the teeth of the winds up there from the times of the Saxons and the Danes. And now, after all these years, I felt sure it was given me that day what I should say.

"So the service ended, and the good man of the house came, laid his hands on me, and said very tenderly: 'My lad, the Lord has called thee to preach the Gospel. The Lord bless thee and make thee faithful in the truth.' And all the people said Amen, while I have always said that this was my true ordination."

DOCTRINE alone, however true, is like an unlighted lamp. We must explore and appropriate the truth with our hearts as well as with our intellect, that we may find those deep things of the spirit which are only spiritually discerned.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM IN AMERICAN EDUCATION.

THE American Unitarian Association has shown enterprise and courage in its publication department, and several interesting and valuable books dealing with a wide variety of topics have been issued recently. Among these books, Dr. J. H. Crooker's "Religious Freedom in American Education"* "Religious Freedom in American Education." By Joseph Henry Crooker. (American Unitarian Association.) Crown 8vo, 216 pp. price 5s. net. merits more than a passing notice. It is an instructive and helpful contribution to the study of a problem which is disturbing and perplexing many earnest men and women in England at the present hour. Indeed, all over Europe, to a greater extent than in America, the Education question in its political and religious aspects is a constant source of bitterness and worry.

Dr. Crooker begins by giving a brief historical summary of the rise and growth of the Secular State. He contends that in the United States, the Government is neither Christian nor infidel; it is simply non-religious; and while it may be proper to speak of America as a Christian people, it would be improper to speak of it as a Christian nation. The Constitution of the United States prohibits the enactment of laws for the establishment of any religion; and though it cannot be claimed that the spirit of religious liberty is never violated, in the majority of States there are ample guarantees for freedom of thought and of worship. Church and State are absolutely separate and apart.

It follows that in such a State the public schools are secular. The teaching of religion in such schools would involve the recognition of one or more forms of faith by the State. Schools are, however, not godless because they are secular. The intelligence and character of the teachers mould and influence the scholars in the direction of a pure and noble life. In theory, the public schools of America are free from every taint of ecclesiastical or theological domination; in practice, there are parts of the country where, directly or indirectly, the ecclesiastic and the theologian still exercise considerable power.

In America, as in England, considerable controversy has centred round the question of the Bible in public schools. The Bible is read in a number of schools; and its sectarian use is by no means easy to avoid. Many enlightened men are anxious that the Bible should be read and studied as literature, not as dogma; but the great body of Christian men and women are not yet prepared to place the Bible on a level with Homer, Shakespeare, Milton, and Wordsworth: it is to them a divine or supernatural revelation. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin, so recently as 1890, decided unanimously that the Board of Education had the right to exclude the Bible from the public schools. Dr. Crooker tells as that in disposing of the case the Court used the following striking language:

> The reading of any version of the Holy Bible in the common schools as a text-book without restriction, although not accompanied by any comment by the instructor, is sectarian instruction within the meaning of Section 3 of Article X. of the Wisconsin Constitution, and is thereby prohibited; nor is the prohibition removed by the fact that any child may withdraw from such schoolroom during such reading.

In Connecticut, Maine, and Massachusetts, teachers have the right, under the Constitutions of these States, to read the Bible in the public schools. In New York permission is given, by an Act passed in 1851, to include the reading of the Bible. There is, therefore, no uniformity of law or practice throughout the whole of the United States. Dr. Crooker would exclude the Bible from all public schools, and would throw the entire responsibility for its teaching upon the home and the Church. He argues with much force that this is the only just and satisfactory solution of a vexed problem.

The chapter dealing with the religious question as it affects colleges and Universities is a very interesting and instructive one. Previous to the year 1870, the work of higher education in America was chiefly in the hands of the various denominations. Since that time, owing to the foundation and development of State Universities, a great change has taken place, and the number of students in connection with these unsectarian institutions far exceeds the number attached to the denominational colleges. Moreover, in recent years the denominational colleges have themselves become broader and more tolerant. It sounds very odd to our ears to hear that it is in the Agricultural Colleges of America that the narrower orthodoxy finds a home; In many of the Normal Schools, as in the training colleges for teachers in England, old-fashioned ideas and methods prevail.

In regard to the Universities, the plan adopted at Harvard is commended as the wisest and best. Attendance at the religious services is entirely voluntary; distinguished preachers belonging to different denominations conduct the services in turn; these preachers are for the time being officers of the University, and have a residence provided for them, which enables them to maintain pastoral relations with the students. The late Professor Henry Drummond is quoted as saying that these Harvard services were the most religious he had ever seen.

There are other aspects of the problem unfolded by Dr. Crooker, which we should like to discuss with him, but our space is exhausted. Dr. Clifford, we learn, has already read the volume. We would commend its earnest study to the Bishops of London and Rochester before they proceed farther with their educational propaganda in the metropolis.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTH MIDLAND LETTER.

ALTHOUGH it must come as a shock of pain to many of your readers, I must begin my letter by reporting a case of real gravity in the North Midlands. When a matter has already been freely and publicly ventilated in our police courts, it is clearly futile to try to hush up the scandal out of feelings of charity toward the persons implicated. When, further, the guilty minister is a veteran who has grown grey in the service of our churches, or one who has become prominent in the cause of temperance and social reform, it may be that pain will deepen into something like personal humiliation.

I am referring, of course, to the Revs Peter Dean and Dr. Griffiths, who have both been before the magistrates and sold up as "Passive Resisters." It must be added that I myself am in like disgrace, and daily expecting the policeman to give me a summons to appear before certain magisterial members of my congregation. They may thus have a unique opportunity for coming into fresh and vivid relations with their minister.

I hope no one will be so superficial as to think that I have opened this letter in a spirit of frivolity. The fact that the matter can be put in that way only shows the folly and futility of the law which has called forth our protest. The legal injustice is clearly brought to mind when we remember that some of our most religious and earnest men have suffered imprisonment, and that nearly 10,000 citizens have had police-court proceedings taken against them as a consequence of the Education Act.

Doubtless some of your readers will think this irrelevant to our denominational interests. I would ask them to consider what social topic can be more closely relevant to our denominational life than the subject of National Education. When it ceases to be felt as such we shall have to confess what we are sometimes inclined to suspect, that our salt has lost its savour. However diversely we may interpret our duties in this connection it will certainly not do to strike a superior pose and loftily sneer at the attitude of our Nonconformist brethren. They have, at least, kept the soul of England alive and indignant to iniquities of the recent legislation. Dr. Paton bears a name honoured by all educationists. It was once hoped that his conciliatory correspondence with the Archbishop would lead to some eirenicon. But the Romanists and Anglicans are implacable, and now Dr. Paton is compelled to add the weight of his long life's service to a personal protest delivered to the Mayor of Nottingham in a letter of great dignity and impressiveness. That a man of such moderation of judgment and catholicity of mind has been driven to "passive resistance" should at once convince us that this movement is not the freak of a few fanatics, but a moral force that must be acknowledged with respect.

It is a long time since my last North Midland letter appeared, and it is impossible to take up the tale where I then left off. Turning to the present position of our churches we see extraordinary ministerial changes all round. The Rev. Francis Revitt, of Lincoln, has been removed by death. The Rev. H. Gow left over a year ago to settle at Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead. The Rev. John Birks, after some twenty years' ministry at Derby, has gone to Yarmouth; the Rev. E. R. Hodges recently left Newark for Guildford; the Rev. W. Whitaker has taken up the ministry at Cardiff; the Rev. Peter Dean has just resigned the charge of Loughborough; the Rev. Dr. Griffiths will in April conclude his three years' term of district missionary work. There are rumours of one or two other resignations. It would be difficult, I imagine, to match so many changes in a single district in so short a time. The dislocation and unsettlement are naturally much felt. Morever, the losses are severe — especially severe in the case of Mr. Gow, who was for over nine years the secretary of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, and of Mr. Whitaker, the secretary of the N.M. Sunday-school Association. We welcome, however, a strong man in the Rev. E. W. Lummis, who succeeded Mr. Gow at the Great Meeting, Leicester, and who has already thrown himself vigorously into the general work of the district. On Jan. 4 the Derby congregation formally welcomed the Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland into the ministry of Friar Gate Chapel. It was in every respect a capital meeting, full of earnest purpose and glowing enthusiasm. Everyone present must have felt that the congregation is making a fresh start with the most happy and hopeful auguries of success. Guildford took from us Mr. Hodges, but it is Guildford that has sent us Mr. Buckland, who has thus already received a hearty reception to the fellowship of the North Midland Churches.

I am glad to report one congregational accession. The Northampton Church has joined our Association, and they and their minister, the Rev. Arthur Harvie, will bring much needed strength to our local efforts. The Free Christian Church, Leicester, is still without a successor to Mr. Whitaker. Loughborough, Newark, and Lincoln are vacant. Some provision will at once have to be made for Ilkeston and Burton-on-Trent. One of the most satisfactory things to report is the successful and amicable termination of the Lincoln Endowment case. New trustees have been appointed, and there is now a yearly sum of £150 available for a minister's stipend. There is a prospect of effecting an arrangement for working Lincoln and Newark together. With the aid of grants it is hoped that a minister of exceptional ability may be secured, who will reside in Lincoln and take both churches under his care. It has further been suggested that Loughborough might be worked by our Leicester friends to the relief of the funds of the Assotiation.

It must be admitted that the general outlook reveals a position full of the gravest difficulties, but we are grappling courageously with them. In this task the Association is fortunate in having as its President Mr. J. Harrop White, the Town Clerk of Mansfield, who is a tower of strength to our cause. The Rev. E. Gwilym Evans is doing good work in Chesterfield, and has gathered round him a large congregation. We have encouraging reports of the Great Meeting, Leicester, and the Old Meeting, Mansfield. Some of our smaller congregations keep pegging away cheerfully, and maintain their steady average of solid and sincere work. When the many vacancies in the district are filled we shall have received a large infusion of new blood, which will, we all trust, quicken the life of our churches and more than restore their former condition.

Here in Nottingham we have been singularly fortunate in having had the rare stimulus of Mr. Carpenter's lectures. These were in every respect a great boon, and were thoroughly successful in every respect. We are now eagerly looking forward to another visit from him in March, when he has kindly promised to take our anniversary services at the High Pavement Chapel. Another event of great interest will also take place in that month, in the unveiling of the window in memory of the late Mr. P. W. Clayden. This window will add much to the comfort of our worship, and give to a noble building, not only an added beauty and warmth of colour, but the beauty of a memorial of a rich and strenuous life.

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

ROCHDALE.

THE BATHE TERCENTENARY.

IN the Blackwater-street Church, Rochdale, a series of windows has been placed as memorials by members of various families. Another window marks the 225th anniversary of the founding of the congregation after 1662. Most of the oak screens also have a commemorative significance, and there are tablets and a baptistery, all of which recall the memory of some old member. In the choir vestry is a complete set of ministerial photographs from 1806 (when the Rev. Joseph Cooke began the Methodist Unitarian movement of Rochdale and Rossendale) until 1890, when the Clover-street congregation was amalgamated with that at Blackwater-street. A similar series for the older church is nearly complete for the last century, and within a few days a photograph of Dr. Cooke, who was here in 1776—1778, has been added. Then in the church there is a tablet recording the amalgamation in 1890, and also a great slab of marble with the names of all the ministers of the two congregations.

To this large number of historical memorials a most interesting addition has been made through the kindness of Mr. Richard Heape, who, with other members of that family, has recently contributed greatly to the beauty and interest of the church. This is the tercentenary year of the birth of Robert Bathe, vicar of Rochdale, 1635-1662, and the new tablet is erected to his memory. It bears the following inscription:—

Their altars they forego, their homes they quit,
Fields which they love, and paths they daily trod,
And cast the future upon providence.

To the memory of Robert Bathe, M.A., for twenty-six years vicar of Rochdale, who (together with his curate Zachariah Taylor) suffered ejection for the sake of conscience in 1662. He founded this—the first Nonconformist Church in the parish—for which "he laboured with extraordinary zeal and energy." "He spent much time in visiting the sick. . . . He was a gracious, humble and peaceable man, a faithful friend, and good in all relations." Born in Kent in 1604: died at Rochdale, and, as directed by his will, was buried in the chancel of the parish church, 12 March, 1673-4. This tablet was erected in 1904—the tercentary of his birth—by Richard Heape.

On two Sundays there have been special sermons, and on Saturday evening last there was a public meeting in the church for the purpose of unveiling the tablet. The ceremony was performed by the Mayor of Rochdale, who by a happy coincidence is one of the best known antiquarians in the North of England. Colonel Fishwick has written the History of the Parish of Rochdale, and many local pamphlets, and has edited several of the publications of the Chetham Society. So that it was expected he would have an interesting contribution to make to the Bathe discussion. He told the results of investigations he had made since receiving the invitation, with a view to dissipating some uncertainties as to Bathe's birthplace, his marriage to a niece of Laud, and his age, which had been mentioned in the memoir published in the Blackwater-street Monthly Messenger. The information elicited was interesting, but too lengthy to be reproduced here. Passing on, Colonel Fishwick contended that Bathe was probably more of a Puritan than a High Churchman at the time of his settlement in Rochdale. Canon Raines and others had taken the opposite view, and the former had scarcely done justice to the subject of his sketch in the "Vicars of Rochdale." The ejectment of 1662 was described as "a vast mistake on the part of the Church, which instead of broadening its basis so as to keep men within it, narrowed the structure and brought it to an apex, so that there was no room for men who would not swallow the doctrine as it was put to them." He did not think that Bathe had to leave the town on the passing of the Five Mile Act, as stated by Calamy: The Act was winked at in many places, and in Rochdale there was such sympathy for the persecuted cause that it was likely Bathe might be preaching in one place and another during the tenure of the succeeding and non-resident vicar. Bathe was no more perfect than other men, but we owe more to Vicar Bathe than to any other vicar who has lived here. They were not met to celebrate the triumph of one party or another; but Bathe and his friends brought about a complete revolution in liberty of conscience, and that was a great matter. Had they remained silent for many years longer, the people of England would have had no opportunity to praise God in their own way and in their own buildings. They gained for the country the greatest boon—which is liberty.

The Rev. J. H. Hollowell also delivered an address, in which he proposed to answer the question why the names of Robert Bathe and others like him had not been submerged in the welter of the centuries. It was first because of the great times in which they lived, and secondly because of the great spirit in which they met those times. Civil and religious liberty was at stake then, but there was also an uprising of conscience and the national spirit. The audacious claims of the times received answer for part in the Covenant, and part of the answer was Oliver Cromwell in person. By the subsequent death of Cromwell the pivot of the Commonwealth was dropped out of the mechanism of the State. His death was the loss of a century to the progress of England. One of the bitterest ironies of English history was that then, under Charles II., an Act of Uniformity was pressed upon consciences like that of Bathe. It showed what compulsory sectarianism was worth in any country when it was enacted by Charles II., whose reign was characterised by the Act against which Bathe made the grand protest of his life. This man left the political, the State Establishment, but he did not leave the whole Church of God behind him. The gospel he preached by coming out of the Church was louder, more penetrating and ennobling than before. To think of such men made us a little more patient, a little less restive, and better able to understand why the great Establishment is so slow to extend, to practise, and to love those principles of liberty which were outraged on that historic occasion; and the thought urged them to cultivate the loyalty to conscience and bravery of action of which those men were examples. After 300 years the fame of Bath's integrity was still strong and sweet in Rochdale, and was a living force in bringing together that congregation, and the church that meets within those walls to-day with its special possession was the fruit of the deliberation which went on after his death.

There were other speeches by Rev. T. P. Spedding, who presided, by Alderman Topper, Treasurer, and Mr. W. W. Hadley, chairman of committee, who spoke to a vote of thanks, and the proceedings closed with hymn and prayer.

On Sunday evening the sermon was preached by Principal Gordon, of Manchester.

T. P. S.

WHERE is the use of the lips' red charm,
The heaven of air, the pride of the brow,
And the blood that blues the inside arm,
Unless we turn, as the soul knows how,
The earthly gift to an end divine?

Robert Browning.

"FOR Goodness and For Truth. A Motto for the New Year." Such is the title of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. On the title-page he prints the following passage from the address of the Rev. Charles Wicksteed at the laying the foundation stone of the present Mill Hill Chapel, April 26, 1847:—"Our prayer is that within these walls we may engage in the earnest and conscientious pursuit of truth; and so far as we may attain to it hold it and speak it boldly as we ought to speak. Our desire is that we may live in harmony one with another and at peace with all mankind, 'as we have opportunity doing good to all men.'"

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Chester.—At the close of the ordinary service on Sunday morning, Jan. 17, an interesting ceremony took place in Matthew Henry's Chapel, when a brass tablet, set in some of the old oak of the chapel, to the memory of the late Major Bryan Johnson, was unveiled. The tablet, which is placed immediately over the pew where he was accustomed to sit, bears the following inscription:—"To the memory of Bryan Johnson, born Nov. 29, 1823; died May 28, 1903. During his whole life he was a constant worshipper in this chapel, and for forty-two years one of its Trustees. By his integrity and kindliness he won for himself the high regard and esteem of his fellow citizens. And to record their affectionate remembrance of him this Tablet is erected by the members of the Congregation." After the singing of Hosmer's beautiful hymn, "I cannot think of them as dead," the Rev. H. E. Haycock delivered a memorial address, recalling the admirable qualities of their old friend, and particularly dwelling on his unswerving faithfulness to unpopular principles and beliefs as a staunch Unitarian. At the close of his address Mr. Haycock then unveiled the tablet, and with prayer and benediction the impressive ceremony was brought to a close.

Coventry (Presentation).—On Thursday, Jan. 14, in the Great Meeting-House upper school, a congregational tea party was held and numerously attended. Miss Davis, in the name of the ladies connected with a recent "sale of work," in kindly appreciative words, presented the Rev. George Heaviside, B.A., with a purse of gold. Mr. G. S. Smith added a few remarks testifying to the affection and esteem felt by the members of the chapel towards their minister. Mr. Heaviside, evidently taken by surprise and deeply touched by the kindness of his friends, thanked them one and all for such proof of their attachment to him, and assured them that, as long as he lived, he should treasure the memory of that pleasant gathering. He reminded them of his now long ministrations (forty-three and a half years) in Coventry, and the deepening interest he took in all that affected their spiritual and denominational welfare, and referred to the unavoidable isolation in which he was placed through inability to endorse the popular creeds. Comparing himself to the Old Man of Hoy, a lofty, separated mass of rocks, standing in the Pentland Firth, he spoke of the trials of his position—how that winds of suspicion and dislike blew over him, or swelling waves of theological odium dashed their proud waters against him—but, in the strength of his faith that he only wished to serve his brother men sincerely and devote his whole being to God, he had so far been enabled to maintain his position, and, heaven helping, would endeavour to maintain it to the end. The present generosity of his lady friends was as a burst of sun on the old rock, and, for the time, made remembrance of stormy days fade into the distance. Mr. J. C. Heaviside, treasurer, then read the balance-sheet of the sale of work, showing how successful it had proved. The rest of the evening was enlivened by vocal and instrumental music.

Horsham.—The annual scholars' festival was held at the Free Christian Church on Tuesday evening, when addresses were given by the Rev. J. J. Marten, who was in the chair, and the Rev. G. Lansdowne, and the prizes were distributed by Miss Marian Pritchard, president of the S.S.A. Miss Pritchard spoke earnestly to the children of their duties as scholars, and expressed special pleasure at learning that some of the elder scholars were joining the ranks as teachers, and so having the privilege of passing on to others the help they had received from the school. Later in the evening some of the children gave a performance in the schoolroom of Miss Pritchard's play, "The Prince's Triumph." Recitations followed, and a distribution of gifts, a happy evening closing with votes of thanks. On the previous evening a fair audience gathered in the chapel to listen to a lecture on "The Poem of Job," by Miss Pritchard, who gave an interesting address on the subject, to which she has devoted so much time and thought, with illustrative readings from the metrical version prepared by herself and lately published. The Rev. J. J. Martin, in thanking Miss Pritchard, said it was one of the good signs of the times that more interest was being manifested both by laymen and laywomen in Biblical study.

Hull.—We regret to hear of the decease, at St. Thomas's Home, London, on Wednesday morning last, after a serious operation, of Mrs. G. W. Brown, of Hull, daughter of the Rev. H. W. Perris, and sister of the Rev. H. S. Perris, at the age of thirty-two years. The loss of this bright and energetic spirit will be deeply felt through a wide circle in Hull, where her personal qualities, not the least of which was her power of throwing herself unselfishly into the lives of others, won her general regard. Her musical and other gifts were always at the service of the Park-street congregation; and during her father's more recent ministry at Forest Gate, her practical sympathy had often been shown to his people.

Kilmarnock (Resignation).—The Rev. A. Irvine Innes has announced his resignation, with the intention of terminating his ministry at the end of March.

Saffron Walden.—The annual financial meeting of the General Baptist Church was held on Jan. 13, when a full and clear statement of all income and expenditure for the years 1902-1903 was given. They were considered very satisfactory, and showed that solid work had been done. During these two years upwards of £100 had been expended in alterations, renovations, and additions. The whole has been paid for, and a small balance is in hand. This is entirely separate from trust funds; it is congregational effort. Resolutions of various kinds were passed, especially one of sympathy with Mr. Charles Wright in his illness. On Sunday morning the service was an "In Memoriam" for the late Lord Braybrooke, with whom Mr. Brinkworth had been personally acquainted for years. This church originated with Robert Cosens, chief steward of Audley End Palace, in 1711. Appropriate hymns were sung, and the Dead March in "Saul" was rendered by the organist, Miss Brinkworth.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meetings were held at the General Baptist Chapel, Nottage, on Monday, January 18, Lt.-Col. Thomas Phillips (President) in the chair. There were also present the Revs. W. J. Phillips, T. J. Jenkins, David Rees, R. J. Jones, W. Whitaker, D. R. Davies; Messrs. G. L. Thomas, W. A. Moore, W. J. Williams, T. Gammon; Mrs. Phillips, Mrs. W. J. Phillips, and others; Mr. John Lewis and Rev. D. J. Williams, hon. secs. The delegates met at 3.15 p.m., when the usual business was gone through. The secretary reported that an offer of a series of "People's Services," to be held in some large town in South Wales, had been received from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and that it had been decided to hold these services at Merthyr Tydfil on the Sunday evenings in the month of March. Short reports were received from the churches, which were considered satisfactory, the pulpits being more adequately supplied than has been the case for years past. We hope to be in a position to report in a short time that all the pulpits are filled by regular ministers. The movement at Bridgend is in the capable hands of the Rev. Dr. Rees. A very hearty welcome was extended to the Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., who has recently settled in Cardiff, on his first appearance at the meetings of the Society; also to the Rev. D. R. Davies on his settlement in the Rhondda Valley. At the close of the business meeting Mr. John Lewis, Pontypridd, read a very thoughtful and comprehensive paper on "How to improve the condition of our Churches, from a layman's point of view." The discussion which followed testified to the importance of the subject, and the strength of the ideas and arguments advanced by the reader of the paper. After tea a devotional service was conducted by the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, followed by a public meeting, when the chair was taken by Mr. G. L. Thomas (Merthyr Tydfil), acting as substitute for the president, who was obliged to leave by an early train. The Rev. W. Whitaker delivered an address on "The Religious Outlook," which he considered was full of hope and encouragement. The address gave a masterly summary of the condition and prospects of the leading religious communities, and indicated the special characteristics which distinguished each. Mr. Whitaker was followed on the same subject by the Revs. D. Rees, D. J. Williams, R. J. Jones, and the chairman. Votes of thanks brought a very successful meeting to a close.

SOCIETY FOR THE ABOLITION OF VIVISECTION.

Offices: 23, NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, W.C.

IN the "Journal of Physiology," Feb. 1899, is described the results of the removal of large portions of the kidneys of 49 living dogs. The object of the experiments was to discover how the animals could sustain life, and for how long, with portions of their kidneys cut out from time to time. The anæsthesia legally required in the initial operation having passed off, the dogs were kept for observation in chambers, the floors of which were composed of glazed earthenware and the sides of glass. One dog died on the fourth day, and another on the sixth, from loss of blood; one died 36 days after the operation. In one who survived the first operation 63 days the pelvis of the kidney was found to be full of stones. One died from shock: the operation in this case consisted in cutting a wedge out of the second kidney. In 14 cases the second operation was the removal of the entire kidney from the opposite side, after which the average duration of life was from two to three weeks, the animals becoming extremely emaciated and so weak as to be unable to stand, with ulcerated sores on the lip and cheek. In some cases more than two operations were performed on the same animal. Two puppies were experimented upon, both survived the operation four months.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE chief celebration of the centenary of the death of Dr. Priestley on Feb. 6, 1804, is to take place at Leeds on Friday and Saturday next. On Friday evening the Rev. Alexander Gordon, Principal of the Home Missionary College, is to give a lecture on "Dr. Priestley among his Friends," and on Saturday afternoon a memorial service is to be held in Mill Hill Chapel, with a sermon by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, followed in the evening by a lecture by Dr. Thorpe, F.R.S., on "Dr. Priestley as a Scientific Discoverer."

A SUCCESSFUL beginning was made last Sunday at Cambridge with the morning religious services, to be conducted by Unitarian ministers during term in the Hall, 10, Emmanuel-street. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, and the attendance fully came up to the expectations of the promoters. To-morrow (Sunday) Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, is to be the preacher.

MR. CARPENTER'S new course of lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" begins next week, at Cardiff on Tuesday, Feb. 2, at Aberystwyth on Wednesday, and at Manchester on Thursday. The course is of six lectures. At Aberystwyth the chair is to be taken or the first lecture by Professor Foster Watson, and for the following lectures by other college professors and lecturers.

AN important step has been taken by the London County Council this week in the adoption of a scheme to be submitted to the Education Department in connection with the working of the Act passed last year. The committee responsible for the scheme have undoubtedly benefited by the fact that they had before them the schemes sanctioned in the case of the great cities in the provinces; but their own proposals show no lack of courage and originality. In substance the plan recommended by the Council is that a committee of its members shall form the education authority for the whole of London, free from outside representatives elected by sectarian or other bodies. In compliance with the beneficial provision of the Act, five women are to be co-opted to the committee, and for the first period of administration (nearly two years is suggested) five members of the present School Board are also to be included. The whole committee is to number forty-eight members; and the proposers of the scheme are confident that the work to be undertaken is well within the competence of the Council.

IT will be seen whether or not this is a sanguine view. We hope not, but we cannot repress a fear lest in place of a wholesome personal interest on the part of the members of the "authority," there may be developed a more or less purely official control of the schools. The scheme provides that after the first period the committee should retire annually: of course there is a probability of re-appointment in the case of efficient members, but we cannot contemplate these rapid changes of the administrative personnel without anxiety. The work of the Board Schools has been too vast to be easily compassed; what will happen when the "non-provided" schools are added one can only guess. The proposers of the scheme point out that there is the more reason to concentrate control in the Council's hands since the local managers are to be, as to two-thirds, appointed by the borough councils, and in "non-provided" schools only one-sixth of the managers will be in the nomination of the County Council. The speeches made by Progressive leaders on Tuesday show that their ideal is one of absolute impartiality as to the sects. They take up the administration of the Act well aware of its defects, but as good citizens desirous of making the most of it, in which spirit they have our cordial sympathy. The "appointed day" proposed is May 1, 1904, when, if the scheme is sanctioned, the School Board will cease to be.

THE Bishop of Hereford published last week a very vigorous letter on the controversy between the new Protectionist propaganda and Free Trade, taking high moral ground in his opposition to Protection.

What weighs on my mind (he says) as I follow the controversy is the thought of the serious moral issues involved in it, the harder conditions of life which it will lay as a fresh burden on our poorer classes, thus making their moral and spiritual progress more difficult, the corruption of politics, the baneful domination of capitalist trusts, vested interests, and monopolies, and so forth. It is not seriously disputed that, should this propaganda succeed, these things will be prominent among the consequences of that success; and yet benevolent and well-meaning people on all sides seem to disregard them, as if they were of little or no account.

Every Bishop has solemnly promised to be merciful for Christ's sake to poor and needy people; but this Birmingham Gospel is all in the interest of the rich, and is without mercy for the poor and needy. Therefore, as I understand the matter, it is my bounden duty to oppose it.

In whatever specious garb it might be dangled before men's eyes, it is in fact one of those erroneous and strange doctrines, based on selfish interest, appealing to low motives, and fostering feelings of antagonism, jealousy, hatred, and bitterness, which are directly contrary to the spirit of God's word. Consequently every minister of Christ is bound to do his part in banishing and driving it away.

The doctrines of the retaliatory and Protectionist tariff-monger, making food dearer, clothing dearer, and almost every necessary of life dearer, will sink the poor into deeper poverty; they will make it more difficult for every labourer to bring up his children in a decent home, or to keep them in good health with sufficient food and warm clothing; and they will grind down every poor working woman to a still harder lot. And we have to remember that the poor, who will thus be affected—and their name is legion—cannot suffer in this way without losing mental and moral as well as physical vigour. In other words, this Protectionist policy will depress and degrade the poorest and the weakest of our people, and will make the work of the social reformer, the philanthropist, and the minister of Christ harder than before.

THE Protectionist propaganda, the Bishop of Hereford further declares, "appeals to the lower and baser motives, and will be the nurse of antagonisms, jealousies, rivalries, vested interests, industrial monopolies, selfish warfare in trade and industry, both as regards our relationships with one another here at home, and with our Colonies, and with foreign countries. It will corrupt and debase our public life by the cabals, intrigues, and lobbying which are found to be inseparable from such a system of preferences, retaliation, and protective tariffs."

Hitherto the Free Trade system of England with its vast ramifications and far-reaching, expansive activities, and its open door for free and healthy competition from every quarter, has proved the great obstacle or bulwark in the way of these speculators in corners and trusts, who, caring apparently for nothing but their own selfish gains, have no bowels of mercy for the suffering poor. And the blind and credulous followers of Mr. Chamberlain are actually proposing to sweep away this bulwark, so that the whole world, civilised and uncivilised alike, may become an easier prey to the tyranny of these unscrupulous capitalist speculators.

It is sad to see so many well-meaning and benevolent persons allowing themselves to be made the tools of a policy so fraught with mischief; for it is acknowledged that the effect of such combinations, which are sometimes quite inhuman in their cruelty, is to make rich men richer, and some few enormously rich, but to do this by making consumers pay unnaturally high prices, and making the poor man still poorer, and bringing untold privation and suffering on the poorest of all, especially on the women and children.

One word in conclusion. The first article in the November number of the Independent Review is a masterly exposition of the moral issues involved in this controversy. The writer of that article deserves our gratitude. His words are golden words. They should be studied by every minister of the Gospel before he gives any support to Mr. Chamberlain or any of his followers, and indeed by everyone who cares for the morals of our national life.

This Bishop undoubtedly has the courage of his opinions.

SINCE the University of Oxford was opened to Dissenters from the Church of England the provisions of the Enfranchising Act have been twice evaded. In one case, by a special Act, which was smuggled through Parliament at the end of a session, Hertford College, whose members must be Churchmen, was invested with full University privileges; in the other a more devious way was found to extend the same favour to Keble College. Even in the original Act, however, the denominational character of the School of Theology was recognised, and was provided for in two ways. Degrees in divinity, and the post of Examiner in the Arts School of Theology, were and are still reserved to priests in the Church of England.

No serious attempt has yet been made to throw open the Oxford B.D. and D.D. even to orthodox laymen, not to speak of Dissenters; but a petition has lately been presented to the Hebdomadal Council asking that body (which is the source of legislation) to introduce a statute removing the restriction of Honour Theological Examinerships to priests of the State Church. While we find among the lay members of Convocation such men as Mr. J. E. Carpenter and Mr. F. C. Conybeare the petition cannot be opposed on the ground of competence. Accordingly the counter petition, and the leading Church papers, treat the matter frankly as one of denominational privilege. The ultimate result of the reform would be to make the Oxford Theological School undenominational. The Guardian, not unnaturally, views the possibility with alarm, but admits that "it might quite conceivably become inevitable at Oxford [as well as in the Victoria University] if there were a strong demand for it on the part of those who differ from the Church of England." The Church Times, somewhat to our surprise, professes to "see no reason why Oxford should not make concurrent provision for those who prefer a theology"—so our contemporary puts it—"without a definite basis."

THE reform for which the petitioners are asking at Oxford is already established at Cambridge, where, nevertheless, the Theological Tripos is still as denominational as ever. But there is an important difference between the methods of appointment at the two Universities. At Cambridge the examiners for the Tripos are appointed by the whole faculty of Theology, an overwhelmingly clerical and conservative body. At Oxford the faculty delegates this duty to three members, with whom are consorted the Vice-Chancellor and Proctors, so that the Vice-Chancellor's casting vote will often make the lay voice preponderant in the choice of examiners. There would therefore be at Oxford an open door for heterodoxy, and, in the end, candidates would find themselves invited to display not what they believed, but what they knew. There is little hope or fear of such a result being soon reached, but who can doubt that it will be reached some time?

ANOTHER chapter in the history of Westminster Chapel, the largest building belonging to the London Congregationalists, has been opened by the induction of Dr. Pentecost, recently the minister of the Marylebone Presbyterian Church. Much has happened since the great days of Samuel Martin. The well-to-do residents have left the district, which is now one of the most squalid quarters of the metropolis. This is not obvious when we drive along Victoria-street, but a slight acquaintance with the back ways of the place, or a reference to Booth's volumes, is sufficient to prove it. The contrast here as elsewhere between the lordly front and the hideous hinterland is a very striking one. The old respectable congregation had almost vanished from Westminster Chapel when Mr. Westrope essayed the forlorn hope of making it the centre of a Christian Socialist gospel. The present policy aims, as Dr. Meharry expressed it, at making the chapel a great preaching station. Dr. Pentecost has been warned of the difficulty of his task by those who met to welcome him. And it is truly an heroic enterprise. The new minister, however, who describes himself as one of the conservatives in theology, regards the discouraging features as merely superficial. And he goes to his task full of confidence that the Johannine doctrine of the Bread of Life will prove a satisfying one. Those of us who are troubled at the awful difficulty of making Christianity the religion of the English people, cannot but wait the result with expectant sympathy.

ONE of the most interesting features in The Examiner is to be found in the column headed "The Bible Student." The articles this year are provided by Professor Bennett. The earlier ones are to be of a general nature. Here are some lines from a contrast between the Old and New Testaments, interesting and suggestive in themselves, and which serve to show with what freedom and vitality Dr. Bennett treats his subject. The general statement is that the range of human interest in the Old Testament, a literature which covers almost eleven centuries from B.C. 1200 to B.C. 170, is much wider than that of the New Testament:—

The leading personages of the Gospels and Acts are chiefly religious teachers and officials, and even the remaining characters are considered almost entirely in connection with the Gospel and its ministers. Thus we are provided with examples for ecclesiastics, preachers, Sunday-school teachers, religious writers, and Christian workers; but for examples of domestic, social, industrial, commercial, and political life, we turn to the Old Testament, to the family history of the patriarchs and kings; to the narratives of the herdsman, Jacob; of the hunter, Esau; of the warriors, Jephthah, Gideon, and Samson; of Joseph and Daniel, slaves and prime ministers; and of statesmen and kings like Saul, David, and Nehemiah.

THE announcement that Mr. Meyers was to preach in Christchurch, Westminster, a sermon on the "Ethics of Business," and that this was arranged for by the National Association of Grocers, is a fact of some significance. The subject is one to which preachers and commercial associations may well draw attention, for it is one that presses very heavily on sensitive consciences. Young men are hurt at the contrast between the morality they hear from the pulpit and the actual conduct which they are often expected to observe in the shop. They tell us, if we in any way possess their confidence, that they cannot always do what they know to be absolutely right. This discrepancy between the actual and the ideal is painful to the scrupulous mind; it is more hurtful when, as is too frequently the case, it ceases to be painful, because the contrast has become too habitual to call for notice, and when the man has lost his sensitiveness. Some, and not the worst of our youth, solve the difficulty by staying away from the church where they will hear what their conscience can reverence, because they cannot bear to be fronted with a perfection to which they are unable to attain. Others ask despondently whether it is possible to be a Christian in business. Perhaps no satisfactory answer will be given until men, who are at once expert in commerce and genuine Christians, shall have worked out the theory of business on religious lines. The standard of what is the "good" in this sphere is only very vaguely understood. The question that needs an answer is this: "What would be the aims and what the practice of a Christian tradesman? What are the conditions under which such a man must live?"

IN looking over denominational newspapers we constantly notice how like are the difficulties of churches whose doctrines are as unlike as within the limits of Christianity they can well be. A representative of the Methodist New Connexion deplores that "once strong and historic churches have to resort to bazaars" for ordinary church purposes, and adds words which would provoke a decisive hear, hear in some of our own meetings :

There must needs be a change of spirit, policy, and method, with a return to the more natural and wholesome modes of raising funds for the sustentation of the worship of God. The bands of noble women in our Churches ought to be better employed than by working at that which, if paid by results, would be sweaters' wages ; and in selling goods at the close of a bazaar for a fraction of the cost of material, to say nothing of the time and labour expended upon the making of them.

ONE of the lectures recently delivered under Wesleyan auspices at the Central Hall in Manchester, and published since in the form of a penny tract, was by the Ven. Archdeacon Wilson, on the Bible as the Word of God. It need hardly be said that the mechanical theory of inspiration, such as Evangelical writers have often explained and defended it, was not for a moment entertained. The expression, the Word of God, is explained as a metaphor :

When we call the Bible the Word of God to man we mean that God influences man through the Bible, as man influences man by the spoken word ; but the method of such influence, its medium or channel, is wholly different. The point of resemblance lies not in spoken words or written letters, but in the action of some external influence on us. The influence that affects us in this way through man's voice we call man's personality ; the influence which acts on us on all sides, in nature in conscience, in the Bible we call God's Personality, or simply God. We can therefore speak by a metaphor of "the voice of God in nature," "the voice of God in history," or in conscience, or in the Bible ; and we mean in all of these expressions no more and no less than that the devout and listening mind is, as a matter of fact, brought into communion with the Infinite.

The doctrine is clear enough and definite enough, but naturally, after this explanation, it requires some special pleading to justify the expression "the Word of God," used in reference to the Bible in particular, and withheld from other writings and other phenomena through which God speaks to men. The justification of the name the Word of God occupies a considerable space in the lecture.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.—The Committee of the National Conference met in Manchester on Thursday, Jan. 21. It commenced its proceedings with passing, on the motion of the President, a resolution of profound respect for the memory of Mr. Alderman Rawson, and of sympathy with his widow and family. In accordance with a suggestion made at the Liverpool Conference by the Rev. J. Wood, an Address to our Ministers and Congregations advocating a fuller observance of Public Worship has been prepared and will shortly be issued. Another topic advocated and resolved upon at Liverpool was the possibility of arranging some co-operation in administering the various funds devoted to the support of ministers and of students for the ministry. It is proposed to hold a meeting of representatives of as many of these funds as may be willing to attend Essex Hall on June 30 next, in order that the matter may be freely discussed. The advisory sub-committee reported that while recognising the valuable work done by existing boards of the kind in various parts of the country, in their opinion the time was not yet ripe for establishing one Advisory Board for the United Kingdom ; and this view was adopted by the general committee of the Conference.

THERE are many remaining copies of the report of the Conference held at Leicester in 1900, and it was decided to offer them to the libraries of churches and other institutions. They may be obtained on application at the Book Room, Essex Hall.

A MEDITATION.

As a blind man standeth at the parting of the ways and waiteth for a guiding hand ; yea ! even as he, my soul waiteth for the hand of my God.

He that hath never seen is still not wholly bereft. He listeneth to the fall of passing feet : he knoweth by the echoes when walls surround him.

The winds of heaven blow about him, and he knoweth when they are from east or west ; so he shapeth his course in the darkness as in the light.

Then cometh he to the parting of the ways that are not known to him. The roar of the city is around him, and echoes confuse his hearing.

He standeth still and waiteth. He knoweth that kind hearts will see and comprehend. Right soon a gentle hand is laid upon him ; an unknown voice bids him trust and follow on.

In faith he obeys, and stepping confidently in his darkness, he safely gains the straight path. Then is he glad, and in thankfulness he goes his way.

My God ! thou knowest how oft my path is unknown, my way is hid in the darkness !

For awhile, the echoes from the past may guide me ; the remembrance of them that saw may help me in my blindness.

The winds of heaven also breathe upon me, now chill, now sweet and soft as a mother's kiss. They tell me somewhat, and I shape my course by their messages.

But anon I am bewildered. The din of the world grows overpowering, the guiding echoes are confused and cease to aid. The air is laden with the dust of strife, and the eddies are never still. My darkness grows darker, and my courage fails me.

Then I stand and wait. I wait on thee, my God. In patience do I possess my soul. Right well do I know that the darkness and the light are both alike to thee, and that my way is not hid from thy watchful eye.

I stand and wait ! Wilt thou not guide my steps? Yea ! times and oft hast thou laid thine hand upon me, and brought me cheer. In faith have I followed where thou didst lead, and my path was made straight before me.

I will not fear the darkness. The noise of life shall not appal me. At the parting of the ways I will be quiet and will trust, for thou wilt never leave me nor forsake me.

In thee, O Lord, will I trust : let me never be confounded.

WHEN a man lives with God, his voice shall be as sweet as the murmur of the brook and the rustle of the corn.

Emerson.

THE PRIESTLEY CENTENARY

III.

NANTWICH, WARRINGTON, AND LEEDS.

"LIKE most other young men of a liberal education," writes Dr. Priestley, looking back upon his early years of labour and struggle when he had gained what seemed to him a position of the highest happiness and prosperity in 1787, "I had conceived a great aversion to the business of a schoolmaster, and had often said that I would have recourse to anything else for a maintenance in preference to it." But it is given to few, rich or poor, to choose more than the direction in which they will order their lives ; the precise path is determined by circumstances and not by choice, and truly happy are they who walk cheerily and trustfully onward in the way which duty and necessity prescribe, doing what must be done with all their might. Such a one was St. Paul, who could say, "I have learned in whatever state I am therein to be content" ; and content and diligent Priestley was in every position in which he found himself. So, when he had served his three years of apprenticeship at Needham in humiliation and poverty, "years far from unhappy," he welcomed the change to Nantwich, though the congregation was small, "not more than sixty, and a great proportion of them travelling Scotchmen," who would more often be away than at home on Sundays. He does not tell us how much they thought him worth or could afford to pay, but the stipend was probably no more than at Needham ; the great advantage of the change consisted in this that he found himself clear of the atmosphere of controversy and suspicion, and able to take up the business to which he had as a student conceived so great an aversion. At Needham parents would not trust their boys to his care for fear of their being contaminated by erroneous doctrine ; at Nantwich he soon succeeded in establishing a successful school, and devoted to the uncongenial work of teaching all his time and talents, as if it had been the calling which of all others he would have chosen.

"And in this employment," he writes, "contrary to my expectations, I found the greatest satisfaction."

Pray, note it, dear discontented souls, so many, who pine for something else to do than what you have to do : the secret of his happiness consisting in this, that he gave himself with all his heart to the work, "notwithstanding the confinement and labour attending it." And, indeed, the labour was such as it needed a robust brain and body to endure, though Priestley makes no complaint of its being excessive, and might have relieved himself of some part of it, had he been so inclined. He had some thirty boys and "half a dozen young ladies in a separate room." The hours were from seven in the morning to four in the afternoon, with an interval of one hour for dinner. His silence on the subject leaves room for a faint hope that all the pupils, young and old, were not subjected to the full eight hours a day to which the master bound himself. Saturday half-holiday was as yet, I suppose, unheard of in school or counting-house, or anywhere else; and for other holidays, he tells us that he never gave one "on any consideration, the red-letter days, as they are called, excepted." In this number we may hope all Saints' days were included, which would make the total about twenty-five in the course of the year.

"I think I may say with truth that in no school was more business done, or with more satisfaction either to the master or the scholars than in this of mine." One would much like to have a scholar's testimony, not to the business done, for about that there can be no doubt under so intelligent and strenuous a teacher, but to the satisfaction which such an unbroken routine of school duties inspired. But we may trust the Doctor, who was of all men least given to boasting, when he writes, "Many of my scholars are probably living, and I am confident that they will say that this is no vain boast." Of his method of teaching we have but one or two hints, which go a long way to explain the success of so apparently harsh a system. For the younger scholars he wrote an English Grammar, "leaving out all such technical terms as were borrowed from other languages," making it, in fact, practical and intelligible, and therefore, possibly, even interesting. Those in the highest class he taught to keep his philosophical instruments, air pumps, electrical machine, &c., in order; and made them to be the operators, and sometimes the lecturers, too, at scientific entertainments given to the parents and friends.

At four o'clock school was ended, but not so Priestley's work, for "immediately" he went off to teach until seven in the family of a local solicitor. It was scarcely necessary for him to remark that his engagements allowed him "but little time for composing anything."

Priestley had been recommended to Nantwich by the Rev. Thomas Haynes, of Sheffield, as "a man both of genius and learning," and that discernment shown by Mr. Haynes deserves to be remembered to his credit. Nor were others wanting who, in the youthful schoolmaster and minister with an impediment in his speech, saw fitness for a higher position; so when the Academy was opened at Warrington in 1757, he was strongly recommended as "tutor in the languages." But Dr. Aikin, he says, and the remark is characteristic of the writer, "whose qualifications were superior to mine, was justly preferred to me." Three or four years later his opportunity came, on the advancement of Aikin to the post of tutor in divinity. It was not just what he wanted—"I should have preferred the office of teaching the mathematics and natural philosophy for which I had then a great predilection," but, again, he had no choice; and, though the school promised to be more gainful to him, seeing that the employment at Warrington would be "more liberal and less painful," he accepted the offer made to him, and in September, 1761, began work in the new sphere.

Here he was indefatigable as ever. "Though I had no particular fondness for the studies relating to my profession, I applied to them with great assiduity." The evidence that he did so is to be found in the list of his lectures and published works. During the six eventful years which he spent here he made the acquaintance of Dr. Franklin, while on a visit to London, and was by him encouraged to undertake a work on the History of Electricity, and furnished with the books necessary for the purpose. Before a year had passed a copy was in print, and this with five hours' a day employed in lectures on History, Oratory, Criticism, Language, &c. He remarks on it that while some objected to later publications of his as "hasty performances," this was the most hasty of all, yet none were better received. But whether any of them took up more or less time, he was confident that more time spent on them would not have bettered them.

Here he married a lady, of whom he writes:—"She was a woman of an excellent understanding, much improved by reading, of great strength of mind, and of a temper in the highest degree affectionate and generous, feeling strongly for others and little for herself. Greatly excelling in household affairs, she entirely relieved me of all concern of that kind, which allowed me to give all my time to the prosecution of my studies." Of Mrs. Priestley we know for the rest little or nothing, but our obligations to her are great. Like many a good wife, working and loving in her own obscurer sphere, she contributed largely to her husband's capacity for service and made smooth for him the way to fame.

Difficulties arose at Warrington, "although the tutors lived in the most perfect harmony." There had been an unhappy difference between the late principal and the trustees, and so parties were formed, and subscriptions fell off. "I never expect to see the Dissenters agree in anything," wrote Priestley some years later, and added, "Nor do I see how this can reasonably be expected." People whose principle it is that each one should think for himself are sure to differ from time to time, even if generally agreed. So the position he held became uncomfortable and insecure, indeed "after a feverish existence" the institution totally expired a few years later. Moreover, his wife's health was very bad at Warrington, and so, on receiving an invitation from Leeds, where he was pretty well known, he accepted, and removed thither in September, 1767.

We are proud at Mill Hill of having once had so eminent a man as Dr. Priestley for our minister. I sometimes doubt whether we do appreciate the privilege as much as we ought to do. It is only within the last twelve months that Leeds has had any memorial of Priestley's residence here, and that has been erected by a generous Churchman. But, even if not proud of him, the congregation may well be so of the unsolicited testimony which he bears to its character, a testimony which would, I believe, be confirmed by every minister who for the last two hundred years has had the privilege of ministering to it.

"At Leeds I continued six years very happy with a liberal, friendly, and harmonious congregation, to whom my services were very acceptable: Here I had no unreasonable prejudices to contend with, so that I had full scope for every kind of exertion." And to every kind he gave himself. He studied the question of the Logos, and became "what is called a Socinian," taking his congregation with him. Wrote controversial and devotional pamphlets, founded the "Theological Repository," published a "Chart of History," a "Treatise on Perspective," an "Essay on the First Principles of Government," &c.

But what principally engaged his attention was electricity and "the doctrine of air," up to this time considered to be one of the elementary substances. His discovery of oxygen here made is the highest title Leeds has to fame, little as it appreciated the event at the time. The humble Dissenting minister, with whose experiments but one man in Leeds—a Methodist surgeon—was interested, was already, though he probably was not himself aware of it, a famous man in the world of science. The gold medal of the Royal Society was awarded to him in 1773, and, what is more remarkable, it was in Italy that Lord Shelburne first heard of "the high renown which the abilities and performances of Dr. Priestley had acquired for him abroad, while he was as yet but little known in his native land." The result of this conversation with foreign men of science I shall tell in my next article, with which I hope to conclude this brief and imperfect story of Priestley's life. CHARLES HARGROVE.

THE BRAHMO SOMAJ.

THE seventy-fourth anniversary of the Brahmo Somaj was celebrated in London on Saturday and Sunday last at the rooms of Mr. R. N. Ray, 34, Burlington-road, Bayswater. On Saturday evening a religious service was conducted by Mr. V. A. Sukhtankar, the Brahmo student at Manchester College, Oxford, an address being also given by Mr. B. C. Ghose, of Cambridge, on the Vedantic view of salvation.

On Sunday Divine service was held at noon, when Mr. Sukhtankar reverently recalled the memory of all the sages, saints, and prophets, the founders of religion and leaders of spiritual thought, both ancient and modern, of all nations, and also the leaders of the Brahmo Somaj. Then, after an invocation, followed praise and prayer and a sermon from the text: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind," and concluding prayer.

In the afternoon a conference was held, when the chair was taken by the Rev. Henry Gow, of Hampstead, and a resolution of thanks to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for its interest in the Brahmo Somaj, and its material help from year to year was unanimously passed. Mr. Ghose then gave an address, tracing the progress of the Brahmo Somaj up to the declaration by Keshub Chunder Sen in 1880 of the New Dispensation. Speeches followed by Mr. Ray, Mr. Sukhtankar, and Mr. Gow.

Some time was afterwards spent in the singing of hymns, and the celebration concluded with further Divine service, conducted by Mr. Ghose, who showed how the two ancient ways in India of gaining God, by knowledge and by devotion, were united in the Brahmo Somaj.

PROF. CARPENTER AT BRUSSELS.

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

To no living man are our churches more indebted than to Professor Carpenter. With rare unselfishness he has devoted time, thought, and energy to popularising the results of a scientific study of the New Testament. This mission of enlightenment has brought him to Brussels, where, on January 12 and 14, he delivered two lectures on "How to read the Gospels in the Light of Modern Criticism." The visit originated in a conversation at Amsterdam. Professor Carpenter, realising how lonely and difficult a work is that which M. Hocart has been bravely carrying on for many years, said to M. Hocart that he had often thought how much he would like to help him, and asked whether a couple of lectures on the Gospels would be of any use. The offer was immediately accepted, not only with gladness, but avidity. The lectures, which had been well announced and advertised, were held in the Hotel Ravenstein, which, formerly a nobleman's mansion, is now the property of the town, and the headquarters of several learned and philanthropic societies. The audiences were not so large as M. Hocart had hoped they would be, but to a stranger, and, I believe to Professor Carpenter himself, they were not disappointing. At the first lecture there were about 130 persons, and at the second, on an abominably wet night, about 80. What, however, could not fail to strike an independent observer was their apparent intellectual calibre. If features and expression speak at all, they indicated men and women of thoughtful mind, people of ability and force. And this impression was fixed and deepened by the evident interest with which the lectures were followed.

How many things there still remain for Professor Carpenter to do for the first time I do not know; the number is, at any rate, now reduced by one. He can no longer deliver his maiden lecture in French. And it is surely no mean tribute to him to be able to report that speaking for the first time in a foreign language he was thoroughly understood, and at the close very warmly applauded. Professor Carpenter is so accustomed to succeeding in what he undertakes that he would little understand the wonder and congratulation of a humble member of the audience whose own French is limited and shaky. The lectures, let it be said in a word, were an unequivocal success, and the gratitude which M. Hocart very gracefully expressed at the end of the second, did, I feel quite sure, give faithful utterance to the universal feeling.

On the platform with M. Hocart and Professor Carpenter were M. Anspach, Professor of Mechanics at the University, and M. Vercamer, an ex-inspector of schools. In the audience there were two men well known, and one whose name, although unfamiliar, is sufficiently interesting to mention. These were Count Goblet D'Alviella, a former Hibbert lecturer on "The Idea of God in History," and who is soon to deliver a course in Brussels on "The Origins of Christianity"; M. Franz Cument, Professor of Archæology (I believe) at Ghent University, whose work on "The Mysteries of Mithras," published in English as well as French, is, I am told, of great value, and the ex-Abbé Mercel Hébert, who has recently been dismissed from his position as Directeur of the Ecole Fénélon at Paris, and inhibited from exercising ecclesiastical functions. An article of his, "The Last Idol," which appeared in the Revue Blanche, was sent to the Archbishop of Paris, and brought about his expulsion from the priesthood. Perhaps one can scarcely be surprised that the conception that the personality of God is the last idol, and is to be replaced by the idea of universal immanent Spirit, failed to find favour with the Roman Authorities! M. Hébert is a friend of the Abbé Loisy, and is in touch with the remarkable movement which has its centre in that distinguished French priest and scholar. Loisy himself is at this moment in uncertain relations with the Vatican. He is pleading that the Church should admit the principle of entire freedom to the individual in all matters of historical and critical inquiry, and be satisfied with dogmatic orthodoxy. M. Hébert was thrown upon the world utterly without resources, and is making a brave fight. As a Socialist he holds that part of one's life should be given to productive work, and so reconciles himself to the dreary task of earning a livelihood by book-keeping. The time which he is able to command beyond that is devoted to these intellectual and spiritual matters in which his chief interest lies. He is at present delivering a course of lectures to a few sympathetic people on "The Relation between Reason and Faith."

Professor Carpenter's lectures have brought the liberal thinkers who are also spiritually minded men together, made them feel the bond of a common life, and have given encouragement and stimulation to M. Hocart and his congregation. Again, let it be said, he has done in his generous way a very real service, and left many grateful memories.

After M. Hocart's usual service on Sunday morning, January 17, the twenty-first annual meeting of the congregation was held. The financial statement was read, and showed a credit balance of four centimes (rather less than a halfpenny). Very cordial votes of thanks were passed to Professor Carpenter, and to those English friends who have contributed towards the support of the church during the year. It has now attained its majority, is healthier and more vigorous than ever, and with that there is a changed attitude towards it, first from the outside to regard it more seriously, and secondly from within to a thorough belief in its stability and permanence. What is wanted now is a church building.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE'S second course of five lectures for the present session at University College are to begin on Thursday, Feb. 25, continuing the subject of last term, "The Plays of Shakespeare." Macbeth is the play on Feb. 25, to be followed by The Merchant of Venice, Coriolanus, Winter's Tale, and The Tempest. Tickets for the course are 7s., or for teachers 5s. Application for tickets should be made on or after Feb. 1, to the hon. secretary, Stopford Brooke Lectures, University College, W.C.

ATTENDANCES AT OUR LONDON CHURCHES.

SIR,—I believe that the crucial question with us at present is the question of worship. So far as our churches in general can prove themselves true places of worship, that is, places where the sense of self may be lost in that of a greater presence—so far they will probably increase their public usefulness, while they will certainly strengthen us ourselves, both to do our highest work and to face our inevitable difficulties.

Yet, unfortunately, it is hardly possible to ignore the fact that the services of our churches to-day appear to outsiders, and often to insiders too, to be less devotional than those of many orthodox churches. Now I cannot think—what is often urged—that the rational type of mind is, by nature, less devout than others. But it surely is true that a rational religion which takes its stand apart from the great majority needs to manifest a much deeper devoutness in order to justify itself before the world, if not even to justify the loyalty of its own adherents. But in cultivating our devotional life to-day we are met by difficulties of the gravest nature, which we must make some attempt to understand before we can hope to overcome them. In the hope, then, of contributing some suggestions, however tentative, I venture to broach a subject which is as difficult and far-reaching as it is vital.

Why, then, do we appear to others, and to a large extent even to ourselves, to be lacking in devotional warmth and fervour? No doubt it is partly just this very question of numbers, for there is nothing more inspiring for good or evil than a crowd. But I find myself obliged to believe that fundamentally it is that our worship is based on a hoary and majestic system of doctrine which we ourselves have done much to disintegrate, but which we do not yet realise to be entirely and solidly superseded by modern rationalistic thought. We have proceeded step by step to reject certain of the orthodox Christian doctrines, and to retain others, not realising that they are all parts of a coherent and matured system, from which it is impossible to make selections for acceptance or denial. We are, in fact, come to this: that the doctrines on which the Christian Church is founded are none of them logically and literally true, whereas all are vitally significant. By way of example, let me first take such a doctrine as that concerning the stars, which were once believed to be there in order to influence and explain the destinies of men. Now this doctrine is significant with the noblest of truths, but in a form to us absolutely false. For while we believe that no child's fate ever was influenced one iota by the position of the stars at its birth, yet the stars have been amongst the mightiest revealers of the destiny of man in the scheme of the universe as conceived to-day. That is to say, the belief that the stars were filled with a message for man was profoundly true, but the interpretation of that message was, as we conceive it, entirely false.

What, then, was it (and this is the important question for us to ask) which led men back to a new form of belief in the stars as oracles of man's destiny, as able, that is, to teach him something about himself? Certainly not the pursuit of the study of astrology, nor, I suppose, the working out of any of its theories. It surely came through an entirely new approach which was for long pursued from a mere disinterested love of knowledge, and only at last revealed the fundamental truth. So I would suggest very humbly that the hope for religion to-day lies no longer in pursuing this great ancient and mediæval thought of God.

For, in the first place, it is so inextricably involved in the doctrines we have already rejected of the threefold aspect of the Absolute and the dual nature of the incarnate Word; and, in the second place, all man's opinions as to God's emotions, intentions, and characteristics must appear so childish and unverifiable in the presence of the methods of establishing truth with which we are to-day familiar.

That the doctrine indeed stands for some eternal truth is surely most certain, but what that truth is in relation, not to ancient but to modern, conceptions we cannot possibly know until we have made our approach from some new and modern point of view.

This new approach seems to be afforded us in the great conceptions with which last century endowed us. It may well be questioned whether we do or can believe to-day in a self-conscious, all-loving, and supremely righteous Being ruling the entire universe—with the same unquestioning conviction as men have believed in such a God from the prophets onwards. But the conception and ideal by which all branches of activity and all forms of belief are being profoundly and overwhelmingly influenced to-day, is the thought of that mysterious but all-conditioning presence we call Nature. This we cannot escape in any direction, and our conceptions of morality, of science, and even medicine, are being practically worked and moulded by it in a way which can only be done by a living belief.

There are vast continents and systems the knowledge and interpretation of which have still to be worked out before our thought can approach (if it ever can again) earlier systems in symmetry and perfection. But meanwhile the poets give us an earnest of the goal we would reach, and we learn to find with them a Presence in nature, which has its roots in no theory of the Divine attributes, of how God feels or why He acts in any teleological scheme of the universe, but which springs from our own native and inevitable motions of the spirit. Our relation therewith is as to a Divine incarnation, to a visible and tangible object, and yet our experience of it may be as Wordsworth found "a sense sublime of something far more deeply interfused," than the outward relation between natural objects and the human senses. For it is "a motion and a spirit which impels all thinking things, all objects of all thought, and rolls through all things,' and while its inward dwelling is in th mind of man, its outward dwelling "is the light of setting suns and the round ocean and the living air and the blue sky." Darwin and others have told us what this "living air" and the elements of earth and sea have brought forth in the dumb ages before us, and the whole vast order we may see still being rehearsed night by night as we look into the heavens.

Now how much of all this enters into our worship to-day? If we imagine someone 500 years hence reading our hymn-books and liturgies, could they suppose from these that we lived after the giant thought of the nineteenth century? For in truth it requires a mighty effort to shape new modes and forms of devotion, and even when our new emotions and ideals are very strong it is still so much easier to continue using the old forms expressing the old emotions than to boldly utter our own in all their newness and, probably, crudity. An even profounder difficulty lies in recovering the mystic attitude in the presence of a vast flood of new objects and forms of knowledge. It is not easy for a man who has just recovered the use of his eyes to believe in the vanity of the life of sense. And our modern knowledge is like the addition to our faculties of a new and nobler sense which temporarily leads even the wise man to believe that Truth—that is to say the absolute and final verity of life—is to be found by scientific research. What we have to learn to-day is how to use science and all our modern knowledge for the gaining and securing of deeper peace of soul which the saints knew of old, and in the strength of which they were enabled to endure persecutions, to labour untiringly for the salvation of their fellow-men. For indeed we need this peace of perfect communion with the Eternal as never man has needed it. In the midst of the triviality of so much of modern life and its ever-growing press and strain we need the infinite calm which Nature never loses and which alone can strengthen us to live like men.

If once we could recognise our high calling, that it is not to buttress up the remnants of those glorious ancient faiths but patiently and determinedly to seek out the spiritual meaning with which the world we see to-day is pregnant, we might still hope to hand down to posterity something worthy of the mighty spiritual ideal we ourselves have inherited from the past.

POPULAR APPEAL.

SIR,—At a time when there has arisen an unprecedented demand for cheap reprints of books dealing with religious questions, the "rationalist" sixpenny publications being met with reprints, at the same popular price, of works like Drummond's "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," and Illingworth's "Personality, Human and Divine," does it not seem as though to liberal Christians, too, there were offered an opportunity which, under the circumstances, looks almost like a duty? Surely there is one work of liberal religion published of recent years which, if it were widely circulated, would prove of the utmost value and helpfulness to many who at present see no alternative to a faith that has become impossible for them, except the cheap agnosticism of writers like "Nunquam." The work I am referring to is, of course, Mr. Armstrong's masterly apologetic, "God and the Soul," issued in paper covers at sixpence, and put on the railway and other bookstalls, this lucid and inspiring argument on behalf of belief would prove a blessing to many a troubled soul, and replace a faith found wanting with one whose foundations cannot be shaken.

I repeat that I think here is a great opportunity; is it too much to hope that it will be taken? J. WARSCHAUER.

CREDITON CHAPEL RESTORATION.

SIR,—May I say a few words in support of the scheme for the restoration of Crediton Chapel, an appeal for which is, I believe, to appear in your advertisement columns this week?

Last summer I was delegated by the Executive Committee of the B. & F.U.A. to visit this town and inspect the chapel, and I did so in the company of Mr. P. J. Worsley, treasurer of the Western Union, and of the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, our late good minister to the Western district, who was warmly enthusiastic over the condition and prospects of the newly revived congregation.

Our inspection of the ancient building at Bowden Hill showed that the work of restoration had already been begun in a manner at once simple, substantial, and tasteful. But much more, obviously, needed to be done, not only to fit the chapel, which is nearly two hundred years old, to modern uses, but actually to preserve it from becoming ruinous.

The statement issued with the appeal furnishes interesting details which I need not here repeat; but I should like to recommend the scheme most strongly as a piece of genuine good work, appealing to the sympathies alike of those who cherish the traditions of past generations, and of those who are zealous to help the life of our own time. There will also be not a few, I believe, who will feel an added satisfaction in contributing towards a work which was dear to the heart of our late minister in the west, and which must ever be bound up closely with his memory.

The sum still required is about £200; but the figures have been estimated so moderately that I should say another £50 expended would certainly not be money thrown away. The important thing, however, is to raise this amount at once, as the work is imperatively needed to prevent further dilapidation.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

SIR,—Though not a Trustee, I ventured to attend the annual meeting of Manchester College, on Jan. 21, and heard the Treasurer announce a deficit on the year's working of about £300; this has to be added to the previous year's balance of £326. The Treasurer expressed surprise that the members of our group of churches contributed so little towards the support of this college. The explanation is por-bably not very far to seek. Take my own case. The Unitarian Home Missionary College is my alma mater, and, therefore, has a first call on me, and I do not feel quite justified, in view of the many subscriptions I pay to other institutions, in contributing as much as two guineas per annum to Manchester College. I would willingly subscribe some sum less than that if it secured a recognition of my fitness to have a voice in its management; but at present the test of a man's fitness to have a vote is a monetary qualification. Below a certain social position a man is practically disqualified from taking any part whatever in the management of a college which so persistently prides itself, in season and out of season, upon its breadth, its catholicity, its freedom from all fetters and all prejudices. Can the present Trustees consistently persist in maintaining a mere monetary qualification? and, if so, is it not absurd for them to yearly lament the fact that so few people contribute to the College funds? There are not many self-respecting men and women to-day who will become subscribers to any institution in connection with which they are debarred from sharing in its privileges simply because they have not quite so large a money-bag as their neighbour, or because they do not concentrate their resources upon one institution, but share their annual benefaction amongst a number of—from their point of view—equally deserving institutions. There are others like myself who are waiting for this invidious distinction to be abolished before they send in their names as subscribers.

CHARLES ROPER.

[From the report for 1902 it appears that there were then 445 subscribers to the funds of the College, of whom 166 subscribed less than £2 2s.—ED. INQ.]

THE February number of the Monthly Notes for Sunday Classes (S.S.A., ½d.), edited by Miss Marian Pritchard, is now ready, and will be welcomed, we trust, by an increasing number of teachers in Sunday-schools throughout the country, and in many homes, for the children's sake. The Sunday lessons this month are by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, and deal with the Story of Jacob. The opening page makes the welcome announcement that there is to be this year another Summer Session for teachers at Manchester College, Oxford, beginning probably on Friday morning, July 1, and extending to the end of the following week.

IN the February number of Young Days "Aunt Amy" writes of Winifred House, and gives the New Year's list of contributions to the Young Days cot, amounting to £20 19s. 11d. So the needed £25 should soon be made up, and then she hopes that further gifts may come in for the general expenses of the Home. This number is bright and interesting as ever, but is that ugly row of cats at the bottom of p. 31 really funny? There is a good column of "Temperance Ideas."

A SECOND article on "M. Loisy and Rome," by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, we must hold over until next week.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE KNIFE.—II.

THE handle of Harold's knife is about three inches long. In telling you about it last week, it stretched into nearly two columns. Now it is going to stretch into two columns more, perhaps. It is like the story in the Arabian Nights, of the imp in the bottle, who, when he was let out, stretched up till he touched the clouds.

The last thing on Harold's knife is a man falling forward, grasping in his arms a bunch of spears, and another man rushing over him brandishing a club. I should like you to know this story too.

The Lake of Sempach is not surrounded by mountains like the Lake of Lucerne. There are no bustling and thriving towns round it, as round the Lake of Zürich. It lies long and narrow along the railway. The reeds and rushes wave along its near bank. On the further side are fields and farmhouses, and beyond these rise hills. There are no steamboats on it. Here and there a rowing boat is fastened to the shore. It is very still and quiet, and even lonely.

It was much gayer 580 years ago last July. The Austrian Duke Leopold had marched his army into Switzerland, giving out that it was to attack Zurich, and when the men of Sempach had gone to the help of Zurich, the Austrians made their way to this very Lake of Sempach. Here the army lay spread in these meadows; fine knights with their shining armour and banners, with their horses and squires and attendants; soldiers armed with long pikes and bows, and battleaxes, never doubting of their easy victory.

When news of this reached Zurich the Swiss hastily started to meet the Austrians. They were not an equipped and disciplined army like the others. There were only 1,500 of them, country-folk, armed with such weapons as they had, clubs, short spears, axes. And the Austrians, moving up from the lake toward the town of Sempach, came on the Swiss suddenly. Great was their delight at the prospect. They could not manœuvre their horses on such ground, and the knights dismounted. The peaks of the pointed shoes they wore caught in the long grass of the meadow, so they cut off these points or "beaks," and from this the meadow is called "beak-meadow" to this day.

Now, when the Austrian knights, sure of victory, rushed on the Swiss, their longer lances gave them the advantage, for the Swiss, with their short weapons, could not reach their foes. Already sixty of the Swiss had fallen, and not an Austrian was touched. "Then," said the old chronicler, "a good and pious man, grieved at the misfortune of his country, Arnold von Winkelried by name, stepped forward from the ranks. Shouting to his comrades, "I will cut a road for you! Take care of my wife and children!" he dashed forward, and grasping as many spears as he could gather in his arms, he bore them to the ground with the whole weight of his body. Through the gap thus made rushed his comrades, and now at close quarters the short weapons of the Swiss had the advantage. Duke Leopold was slain, and his knights, forced back in confusion, found their horses and attendants fled. Great was the carnage, and of the 6,000 Austrians, there lay dead on the field when night fell 700 nobles and 2,000 soldiers. This is the famous battle of Sempach. And Arnold von Winkelried stands out as the man whose prompt self-devotion turned defeat into victory.

Nearly 3,000 men were slain that day. Why do we think of him more than the others? Why do we praise him most?

First, I think, because he fell in defence of his own country. The Austrians who fell were, no doubt, as brave as he. They rushed on death just as fearlessly. But they were not fighting for their own country. They were fighting to get hold on someone else's country. And we can't help feeling the difference. I am sure they looked a thousand times more distinguished and romantic than this plain peasant in his peasant's clothes. But, because he was fighting to preserve his country's freedom, and they to destroy it, we honour and reverence him rather than them.

Then, secondly, Arnold von Winkelried gave his own life for his country. He didn't look round and wait to see if somebody else wouldn't come forward. He didn't shout for the others to sacrifice themselves. But the moment the opportunity came his whole soul rose to meet it. "Here am I. Take me!" His own life seemed nothing to him compared with his country's freedom, his country's safety.

I believe there are a great many men whom nobody thinks of as heroes, who don't think they are heroes themselves, who have risen into just such heroism when the occasion came. They didn't know it was in them, nobody knew it was in them. But it was there.

Some day, perhaps, you will be at Lucerne. You will take the steamboat Winkelried, and cross the lake to Alpnach. Then you will go to Alpnach town, and then, near the church, you will see the great monument to Arnold von Winkelried, of which that on Harold's knife is a tiny copy.

Perhaps it will set you to wishing that you could do something for your country. May I tell you something you can do? I once read a saying of a great Frenchman, that the best patriotism was to try to make one's country loved. You can do that. Try to make your country loved.

If you should be rude, or pushing, or noisy, or act as if the whole place belonged to you—(not that I suppose anyone who reads THE INQUIRER would act so)—then the others would say, "What disagreeable people the English are!" and you would have done something to make your country disliked.

But if you are polite and gentle, if you try to understand, and admire, and sympathise, if you act as if you were the guest and foreigner (as you know you will be), and were come to learn and enjoy, then the others will say, "What nice people, what delightful people the English are!" And in being lovable yourself you will have done something to make your country loved.

LONDON, JANUARY 30, 1904.

COLLEGE AND FREE CHURCHES.

THE Annual Meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College, of which a full report appears in our present issue, was more largely attended than has been customary of recent years, for rumour had got abroad that some burning questions might be raised, affecting the fundamental principle of the College. As a matter of fact, nothing very startling occurred, but the large attendances were particularly welcome in view of the memorial resolutions that were passed at the beginning of the meeting, and of the warm acknowledgment made to the Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON on his retirement from the Secretaryship, after a service of twenty-four years. It will be seen from the report that the questions which have been seriously exercising the minds of some of the Trustees and other members of our churches are to be dealt with, in the first instance at any rate, by the new Committee, on which it was provided by agreement that the critics of the recent administration of the College should be very capably represented.

One question was indeed raised, though hardly discussed, in connection with the Annual Address of the Committee, as to the relation between the College and the Free Churches, to which the great body of its supporters belong. The concluding paragraph of the Address was, according to well-established custom, an eloquent declaration of the fundamental principle of the College, and of the spirit in which it seeks to fulfil its high ideal. To certain sentences of this declaration exception was taken, on the ground that they set the maintenance of the principle of free teaching and free learning in theology above the great purpose of training men for the ministry of the Free Churches, as the more important of the two. That there was no intention of belittling the ideal of the Free Churches or the vital importance of training men for their service, Mr. DOWSON, who as Secretary, was responsible for the drafting of the report, made abundantly clear. The churches and the College are at one in their maintenance of spiritual freedom. They both set loyalty to truth at all cost, and in single-minded service of the living GOD, above all other interests, in the fulfilment of their essential purpose —the churches as societies of worshipping people, the College as the home of students, for the scientific study of theology and the training of ministers.

What the Address aimed at was with ardent faith to set clearly in view the greatness of the ideal of freedom in search for the truth of God, which could not be claimed as the exclusive possession of any one communion, but was destined to conquer the whole religious world. And as regards the Free Churches, to which the great body of the Trustees of the College belong, that ideal and principle of freedom is, in fact, the first requirement of their own distinctive life, and of the worthy training of their ministers.

So, in the draft Address, it was declared of the maintenance of that fundamental principle, "of all the charges committed to the keeping of the College, this is the most sacred," and at the conclusion, after a rejoicing avowal of the fact that the College, even in its day of small things, was helping to leaven with that great principle "a realm far wider than that of any single communion," it was added :—

> In so bringing just a little nearer the day when that spirit shall be universal, the College fulfils a function infinitely higher and nobler, and far more deserving of support, than the service of any one Church, even although it be the broadest of the broad and the freest of the free ; and even although it be that in which the vast majority of its own Trustees offer a worship according to the dictates of their conscience, and dearer to them than life itself.

That was a great avowal of self-abnegation in loyalty to the fundamental principle, setting its ideal above the service of any particular church, although that church also was devoted to the same high principle. It was taken, however, by some of the Trustees, with the other sentence quoted above, to put the purpose of the College in the training of ministers in an unjustly subordinate place, and as the sentences were judged to be not essential to the main declaration, their omission was agreed to, that the Address might be unanimously passed.

Thus the conclusion of the Address, as finally agreed to, read as follows :—

> In conclusion, the Committee leave the administration of the College to their successors, with a confidence in its fundamental principles that has grown with the growing years. The spirit of the age is on its side. They welcome the remarkable evidence of it in the great success with which the Hibbert Journal has been launched upon the world. While heartily congratulating the Hibbert Trustees on their new departure in its establishment, with its quarterly symposium of scholars from many churches, united in the fine "policy of the open door" to all seekers after religious truth, and while adding congratulations to the Trustees of the College that the editorial department is so closely connected with its teaching staff and its alumni, they congratulate them most on the growth, far and wide, of the scientific spirit in the study of theology, of which it is one of the most striking manifestations in this country in recent times. It gives new hope, and new confidence in the future, to all friends of the great principle of free teaching and free learning of theology, of which the College is the home. Taking up its position at Oxford, under the shadow of a great University of world-wide renown, the seat of high scholarship in many a field of study, the College holds there a humble place. It is little ; but its work is great. It has in its custody a principle far-reaching in its influence, and moving on to victory. "The little one shall become a thousand, and the small one a strong nation : the LORD will hasten it in its time." Whatever the future may have in store for it, may the College ever be true to the legend inscribed above its portal, "Truth, Liberty and Religion," entering no meaner service than that of the Church of the Living GOD, with windows open to every ray of light that shines upon it from every quarter of the heavens. Whether for teachers or for taught, may one of the first qualifications ever be loyalty in the unfettered search for truth ; and if it be so fulfilled within its walls as to result in the differing thoughts of differing minds, Fiat Justitia ruat Cœlum. The vital principle of the College is then no longer a mere "pious opinion," but a fact realised before the world and in the presence of the great University where it stands ; and the College does its part there, even in its day of small things, in leavening, with its spirit of unshackled liberty of thought, and unbiassed freedom of inquiry, and fearless search for the truth of God, a realm far wider than that of any single communion.

This passage we are glad to reproduce here, both for its own sake and because, while it was unanimously adopted by the Committee in its original form, and, as here printed, by the Annual Meeting, it has a peculiar interest as a final declaration of faith and aspiration by the Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON on laying down the office of Secretary of the College, which he has held for twenty-four years. And we must claim the privilege here of a word of grateful acknowledgment, in addition to those we report from the Annual Meeting, bearing testimony to the great services which Mr. DOWSON has rendered through all these years, both to the College and to the churches, to the ministry of which his life has been so faithfully devoted.

It was at the annual meeting in January, 1880, that Mr. DOWSON was appointed Secretary, in succession to the late CHARLES BEARD, serving for twelve years with Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE, and latterly with Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON. Thus he was secretary at the time of Dr. MARTINEAU's retirement from the Principalship, and at the celebration of the centenary of the College. He served through those momentous years when the College was removed from London to Oxford, sharing the arduous labours involved in the erection of the present noble buildings, the anxieties of the settlement at Oxford, and all the interest and happiness of subsequent developments. How much the College owes to his enthusiastic loyalty and ungrudging service can never be fully told. It is a happiness to know that while he now fairly claims release from the responsibilities and burdens of an office in which he has never spared his strength, he remains a trusted and devoted friend of the College, and on the Committee will still give his whole heart and his ripe experience to its service.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

ANNUAL MEETING OF TRUSTEES.

THE 118th annual meeting of the Trustees of the College was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday afternoon, January 21. The president, Mr. William Colfox, J.P., wrote, regretting that the state of his health did not allow of his travelling so far, to be present. The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL was voted into the chair, and was subsequently elected President.

There were also present Dr. Drummond, Principal of the College, the Revs. J. E. Carpenter, J. E. Odgers, and L. P. Jacks (of the Teaching Staff), the Rev. R. A. Armstrong (Visitor), Mr. Charles W. Jones (Treasurer), the Revs. Dendy Agate, A. Bennett, C. C. Coe, V. D. Davis, W. H. Drummond, George Evans, T. B. Evans, A. W. Fox, F. K. Freeston, E. I. Fripp, W. E. George, H. Gow, C. Hargrove, J. Harwood, R. T. Herford, V. Herford, P. M. Higginson, F. H. Jones, T. Lloyd Jones, C. T. Poynting, P. Prime, C. Roper, H. S. Solly, F. W. Stanley, C. J. Street, W. G. Tarrant, J. M. Lloyd Thomas; Messrs. James Beard, J. H. Brooks, J. Cogan Conway, John Dendy, H. P. Greg, John Harrison, T. Harwood, J. Lawson, G. H. Leigh, Percy Leigh, D. A. Little, W. Long, F. Monks, F. W. Monks, A. Nicholson, F. Nicholson, Ion Pritchard, Russell Scott, J. W. Scott, A. E. Steinthal, Grosvenor Talbot, Percy Taylor, S. B. Worthington, A. W. Worthington, T. Worthington, and P. S. Worthington; and the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson and Mr. A. H. Worthington, hon. Secretaries.

Memorial Resolutions.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE moved:

That the Trustees of Manchester College desire to express their deep sense of the loss sustained by the College in the death of the Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., one of its oldest and most revered students, a trustee since 1866, a late Tate lecturer, and for some years a member of the committee. That the Trustees share the grief of the whole body of churches in this country and in America, with whom he passed his ministry, taking an almost unique place in their religious life, and leaving behind the memory of an enthusiastic missionary of the religion of Jesus, pure and undefiled.

That the Trustees desire to convey to his family their deep sympathy in their present sorrow.

They could not, he said, speak with sorrow of such a life as Dr. Herford's, but should rather thank God, who had given them such a man. Now that his life was ended they recalled what was perhaps his most striking characteristic, his cheery optimism. It was good to be with him, and one went away the better for it. His words of good cheer and comfort were such as all the churches were thankful for.

Mr. JAMES BEARD, in seconding, said that although the memory of Brooke Herford was one of sweet savour all through the country, in Manchester, where much of his work was done, there hung about it a peculiar atmosphere of respect and affection. They felt deep regret that he had passed away, and great love and respect for his memory in a really fervent and lasting way. He recalled a visit to Dr. Herford a few months ago, when he was more than ever struck by what Mr. Hargrove had alluded to, his cheeriness and brightness. Though he could hardly make himself understood, there was the old bright smile and keen interest in all their affairs. He left him with a deep feeling of thankfulness for such a life devoted to their service.

The resolution was passed, the whole meeting standing in reverent silence.

Mr. WILLIAM LONG then moved:—

That the Trustees of Manchester College learn with profound grief of the death of Mr. Harry Rawson, a Trustee since 1870, one of the oldest members of the Committee, and for some years its chairman. That they recognise the great value of the services which he rendered to the College, during his tenure of that office; signalised by his impartial fairness, his wise counsel, his unfailing courtesy, and his graceful representations of the Committee on public occasions. That they pay their tribute to the memory of one who was a devoted servant of God and man, through a long life devoted to labours for the public good, and in advancement of the cause of education, while the Free Church of God had in him one of its most faithful members, and its ministry one of its truest friends.

That the Trustees desire to convey to Mrs. Rawson and the family, their deep sympathy in their present sorrow.

He spoke of the ending of Mr. Rawson's life as altogether happy. He died as it were in harness, the very day before sitting through a tedious meeting of the Council, taking his fair share of work. He went home, still busy with public work, and in the night was called to his rest. Recalling the leading traits in his character, what they first thought of was his true humility, and along with that the dignity with which he did all the work to which he put his hand. He was anxious to promote the good of every cause he took up, and what they should do without him it was hard to realise.

Dr. DRUMMOND seconded the resolution, and said that he had learnt to know Mr. Rawson during his ten years in Manchester, and then had known him more intimately as chairman of the College Committee. By his high sense of duty, his public spirit and sound judgment, he rose to the highest respect of his fellow-citizens, and was never sparing of his services, wherever he could be useful. Such a quiet falling asleep as had come to him, to the last engaged in serving his fellow-men, was what they might all wish for. He joined with special feeling in the concluding expression of sympathy, for his friendship with Mrs. Rawson went back further still, and was among the recollections of his early childhood.

This resolution was passed, as the other, in reverent silence.

The Minutes.

The CHAIRMAN, in calling for the minutes of the last meeting of Trustees and subsequent committee meetings, made a statement as to representations which had been made to the Committee by certain of the Trustees. Exception was taken to the policy of the Committee in some points, and a pledge had been given that the matters of controversy should be fully considered in Committee, and that the objecting trustees should be represented on the new Committee. In asking that the minutes should be passed, he said that the matters reserved for discussion must be held to be thereby in no sense prejudged.

The minutes of the Trustees' meeting in June were then read, and the catchwords of the subsequent meetings of the Committee, the full minutes referring to the position of Mr. Cuthbert Holden as an external student, and correspondence relating thereto, being read, at the request of the Rev. C. J. Street.

On the motion of the Chairman, seconded by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, the minutes were passed.

The Retired Visitors.

The Rev. C. T. POYNTING moved, with warm expressions of gratitude, a vote of thanks to the Revs. S. A. Steinthal and C. Hargrove, who had retired from the office of visitors, after a long term of service. What they felt, he said, was fully expressed in the Committee's Address. Mr. Steinthal, who was one of the oldest students of the College, had added fresh lustre to the visitorship. Mr. Hargrove, though not an old student, had been thoroughly incorporated in the College and understood its best traditions. He brought to its service a large experience from other fields, which had been of inculculable benefit to them. Mr. Steinthal they were about to bid to "go up higher." Mr. Hargrove was undertaking an important mission to Australia, and would take with him from the Mother Country a message of hearty goodwill to their co-religionists there and of God speed in their work.

The Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, in seconding the motion, said that he wished especially to express the gratitude of the younger ministers and students to Mr. Steinthal for his constant helpful sympathy with them in their work.

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON supported the motion, and spoke of the intimacy of knowledge of the students and the inner life of the College, which the visitors had obtained in the exercise of their office. It was a new method which they had introduced, to the great benefit of the College.

The resolution having been passed, was acknowledged by Mr. HARGROVE, with an avowal of complete faith in the great principle of the College, and of the high importance of the study of theology a science.

Twenty-Four Years Secretary.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES moved the following resolution on the retirement of the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson from the office of secretary:—

That the Trustees of Manchester College have heard with the deepest regret that the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., has expressed his wish not to be nominated again as Secretary to the College. Mr. Dowson has filled that office for twenty-four years with a zeal and devotion which have secured for him the grateful respect and affection of all the friends of the College. During his long tenure of office, the College has experienced the great change of the removal from London to Oxford, and the erection of large and permanent buildings there—a change which was not effected without serious difficulties; but these and other very critical questions have been solved victoriously, the great principles of the College being maintained unharmed and intact. The Trustees feel that this is largely due to the manner in which Mr. Dowson has combined wise judgment and conscientious firmness with unfailing courtesy, even-handed fairness, genial tact, and generous candour. They hope that Mr. Dowson, though he leaves the Secretaryship, will for many years continue to devote his rare abilities and his rich experience, won by such long and never tiring labour, to the service of the College, and beg to express to him their heartful gratitude, esteem and love. As a permanent though slight record of their regard the Trustees request Mr. Dowson to accept this resolution suitably engrossed and signed, in their behalf, by the officers of the College.

He said that the debt of gratitude they owed to Mr. Dowson could not be expressed. He had devoted the best years of his life to that work, and had helped and guided them through difficulties, as few men could have done.

The Rev. J. EDWIN ODGERS, seconding, said that both on the Committee and on the working staff he had been in constant relations with Mr. Dowson, and he could only marvel at the goodness and the grace which had given them so long the benefit of his services. Mr. Dowson had constantly to do work on behalf of the Committee, when he had to say things embodying rather adverse judgments. It taxed a just man and a good heart to do that. If they knew the trials of patience and the laborious days which the Secretaryship of the College involved, they would feel, he was sure, that every word of that resolution was amply justified. They must feel great regret at Mr. Dowson's retirement. He would be to them a book of precedents, a presiding genius over their work, a prompter of good deeds in the management of the College.

Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON said that he could not suffer that tie to be broken without a word from him. To serve as junior with Mr. Dowson in such a post as that of Secretary of the College, when they thought of who their predecessors had been, he felt to be a great honour. He knew no man who had served any cause with more unselfish devotion, and more benefit to the principles for which they stood, than Mr. Dowson had served that College as one of its secretaries.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, in acknowledging the resolution, said that their kindness had touched him to the quick. It was with a sad heart he relinquished the post he had held for twenty-four years and closed a chapter which had been one of the happiest of his life; but at sixty-six he felt it was time to make room for fresh energies and a younger spirit. His love for his Alma Mater was beyond speaking. He came as a young man from the agricultural county of Norfolk, where he had been chiefly concerned with barley, wheat, and malt, and came into an atmosphere he had breathed ever since, drawing new life constantly from its grand sources. At one time he was in a very uncertain frame of mind. He had come under the noble influence of Maurice, and attended his Greek Testament class. He was uncertain into what ministry he should enter, and told the committee of the College. From them he received the assurance that he might go on in hope and trust, leaving the future to unfold itself. Then, for the first time he realised the principle of the College, its absolute liberty for teachers and scholars. That had been one of the passions of his life ever since, and if he had been able to serve the College, he thanked God with all his soul. They had spoken too kindly of his work. He had taken it up with the utmost diffidence. It was wonderful to him to be asked to succeed one of the greatest men in their churches, Charles Beard, whom when he succeeded him in two positions he revered and loved and honoured; who had his reverent affection to the end.

Mr. Dowson then recalled the influence over him at college of John James Tayler and James Martineau, and the golden days when their Principal and Estlin Carpenter, Richard Armstrong, Edwin Odgers, Philip Wicksteed, and others were his fellow-students. In the Secretaryship he had as colleague for many years one of the men whom to know was to love and reverence. Robert Darbishire had sometimes said at the College Committee that he lacked the power of utterance, but no one whom he had heard had moved him more deeply than he had done. His was the spirit of prophet and martyr. Nowhere in their churches had they a nobler ideal of loyalty unto death to what is true and right. It was an education in religion and piety to be Secretary with him. And now he had the utmost confidence in leaving the work in the hands of Mr. Arthur Worthington, than whom Mr. Gow need not desire a better colleague. He did not know any committee in which the relations had been so truly those of brotherly friendship as in the College Committee. Fights there had been and would be in the future; but they were united in a common love and devotion to the service of the College. As it was over the great issue of the removal to Oxford, when faithfulness to the College survived all their differences, so let it be in their present differences. That same spirit must be maintained. Let them give credit to each other for equal fidelity to the College, and stand shoulder to shoulder in the future as in the past. While he lived, he should hope to take some part in the service of that institution. He thanked them from the bottom of his heart.

Accounts and Committee's Address.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, as treasurer, presented the accounts, which, with the address of the Committee, had been printed and circulated beforehand, and were taken as read. He pointed out that it was a strange thing that with property of the value of £90,000, their whole body could not supply them with a subscription list of £1,000 a year. The present deficit, added to that of previous years, amounted to £680. When it got to £1,000 they would have to pay it off.

The address of the Committee opened with a tribute of grateful appreciation to the teaching staff, and of gratitude to Mr. William Colfox for his services as President during the past four years. It then recorded the retirement of Mr. Upton, and his appointment as Emeritus Professor, and Mr. Jacks's acceptance of the Chair of Philosophy. The record of losses by death, including the names of Dr. Brooke Herford, the Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved, Colonel Henry Turner, Mr. Herbert Thomas, Mr. A. Follett Osler, and others, was followed by a statement of the financial position of the College, showing a deficit of £686 13s. 7d, and a record of the work of the students. The present session opened with nine regular theological students, including Dr. J. György, the Hungarian student, and two special students, Mr. V. A. Sukhtankar, from India, and Mr. T. Yoshimoto, from Japan. There are also ten external students, nine of whom are Oxford undergraduates. The address noted with great satisfaction the arrangement by which a succession of students are spending from Saturday to Monday in work at the Mansford-street Mission in Bethnal Green, and also the great success of the College lectures during the last Oxford summer extension meeting, when Dr. Drummond, and the Revs. J. E. Carpenter, P. H. Wicksteed, E. I. Fripp, and W. H. Drummond lectured to audiences ranging from 110 to 200, and the Sunday services had an average attendance of 140, while Mr. Carpenter's Sunday evening lectures had an attendance of 230. The concluding passage of the address is quoted in full in our leading article.

The adoption of the address and accounts having been moved from the chair, and seconded by Mr. A. W. WORTHINGTON, Mr. F. MONKS asked a question as to the meaning of the concluding passage of the address.

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON explained that this passage, which was more of the nature of a closing declaration of principle than the dry statement of a business report, was no new departure. It was a practice he had inherited from his predecessor, Charles Beard. While the address was unanimously adopted by the Committee, he acknowledged that he as Secretary was the author of it; that in laying down his office he wished to make a final confession of his faith, in what he felt to be the main principle of the College. He believed thoroughly in the freedom of their churches, and spoke of them as the freest of the free, yet they had to remember that there was a larger world than that of the churches. He regarded the College as the sacred shrine, the Holy of Holies in their midst, of that principle of freedom, for the scientific study of religion; and to be devoted even as one of the weakest to the service of that principle, he felt to be the grandest task to which they could put their hands. He instanced his own church, of which not a single subscriber of more than £5 to the present building in 1848, but had an ancestor among those who built the original chapel in 1708. Those founders were Calvinists, and they were Unitarians. Their one connecting tie was that freedom in the search for the truth of God, of which Manchester College was the holy shrine.

The Rev. C. J. STREET said that he should be the last in the world to wish to hinder Mr. Dowson from speaking his mind to the full, but if they adopted that report it became their own declaration to the world, and while he sympathised with a great part of the concluding passage, there were sentences in it which he felt to be open to objection. The College had been from the first distinctly a Protestant Dissenting institution, and its great object was the teaching of men who should be prepared for a free ministry. Therefore, it seemed to him inaccurate to say of the maintenance of the principle of freedom in teaching and learning, "of all the charges committed to the keeping of the College, this is the most sacred." The most sacred charge was the training of ministers for the churches, and he maintained that their churches were every bit as free as the College, and their work as important. The principle that governed the one governed the other. The last sentence of the report, for a similar reason, seemed to him inaccurate, and therefore he felt obliged to move that the whole passage from the words "it gives new hope" be deleted.

The Rev. A. W. Fox seconded, insisting that the great purpose of the College was the provision of ministers for Protestant Dissenting churches.

The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas asked a question to bring out the fact that from the first there had been lay students in the College, and Mr. James Beard emphasised the purpose of providing ministers for Protestant churches.

A question from the Rev. Vernon Herford elicited the fact that the Committee and Trustees are absolutely free in the management of the College, and that there is no trust deed defining its purpose.

The Rev. R. A. Armstrong said they should have the greatest reluctance to sweep away the whole of the concluding passage of the address, for in most of it they all agreed. He suggested the omission of the sentence quoted above, and the last sentence, as removing the objection, and not really injuring the declaration.

The Rev. W. H. Drummond hoped they were not surrendering a principle for the sake of all appearing to think alike.

The Chairman said there was no surrender of principle in giving up those sentences, and he took it upon himself to say that the Committee agreed to their omission.

Mr. F. Monks said that in their objection there was no desire to restrict the liberty of the College.

The mover and seconder of the amendment having accepted the suggestion, the address, with those sentences omitted, was unanimously passed.

Election of Officers and Committee.

On the motion of Mr. Thomas Worthington, seconded by Mr. F. Monks, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. W. Colfox for his valued services to the College as President for four years.

On the motion of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, seconded by the Rev. C. T. Poynting, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal was elected President.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal said that he felt very deeply the honour they had done him. Looking down the list of those who had held that office, men who had taken high positions in public and political life, as well as in the struggle for religious freedom, with only one other name of a minister, that of James Martineau, he did not feel worthy to be placed at their side. His debt to the College was more than he could ever name. It was fifty-five years since he became a student, and he was in his thirty-eighth year of service on the Committee. For all those years he had been receiving benefit from the College, and he could not refuse any piece of work he was asked to do for it.

As vice-presidents, Mr. David Ainsworth, Mr. James Arlosh, and Mr. William Colfox were elected.

On the motion of Mr. John Dendy, seconded by Mr. T. Harwood, the Committee were elected as follows:—

Rev. S. A. Steinthal, Rev. H. E. Dowson, Rev. C. T. Poynting, Rev. P. M. Higginson. Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood, Mr. R. Harrop, Mr. S. B. Worthington, Mr. Russell Scott, Mr. A. H. Worthington, Rev. V. D. Davis, Mr. Charles W. Jones, Mr. H. P. Grey, Rev. Charles Hargrove, Mr. William Long, Mr. David Ainsworth, Rev. Henry Gow, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, Rev. F. K. Freeston, Mr. William Colfox, Rev. R. T. Herford, Mr. J. W. Scott, Mr. A. Ernest Steinthal, Rev. C. J. Street, and Mr. F. W. Monks.

The names are arranged in the order of seniority of election on the Committee. A motion by Mr. J. Lawson, seconded by Mr. D. A. Little, was then agreed to instructing the committee to consider a scheme by which a certain proportion of their number should retire annually, to secure the regular inclusion of new members.

On the motion of the President, seconded by Mr. W. Long, Mr. Charles W. Jones was re-elected treasurer.

On the motion of the Rev. H. E. Dowson, seconded by Mr. F. W. Monks, Mr. A. H. Worthington and the Rev. H. Gow were elected secretaries.

Mr. Dowson, in making the motion, said he felt that Mr. Gow was the very most eligible man in the country to take up that work. The traditions of the College were born in him, he had ability, courtesy, and administrative capacity. He wished him God speed, and as much happiness in the work as he himself had had.

Mr. F. Nicholson and J. Dendy were elected auditors, and the deputy treasurers were also elected.

A vote of thanks to the chair, moved by Dr. Drummond, and seconded by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, brought the meeting to a close.

JOWETT LECTURES, 1904.

A course of fifteen lectures entitled, "An Introduction to the Study of Philosophy," will be given by Dr. J. Ellis McTaggart, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock-place, W.C., on Mondays at 8.30, beginning February 1. These lectures, which have been delivered before large popular audiences at Cambridge, are chiefly intended for those students who, though not engaged in the systematic study of philosophy, may desire to learn something of the objects, methods, and present problems of metaphysics. No previous knowledge of the subject will be assumed. The treatment adopted will not be historical, but will deal mainly with the present position of metaphysical inquiries.

London Unitarian Choral Society.—The officers and committee of this newly formed society are as follows:—Mr. John Harrison, president; the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, M.A., hon. secretary; Mr. J. F. Forbes, treasurer; and Misses Tayler, V. Preston, Mr. F. W. Turner, Mr. W. F. Wurtzburg, Mr. Eric F. Boult, Mr. Arnold Jones, and the Rev. L. J. Jones.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

IRELAND.

Invited to send to The Inquirer a Provincial Letter upon our Irish congregational affairs, I had almost answered that "from the day when the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." In spite of the rapid and continued growth of this city of Belfast, for example, it is more than forty years since the last-born of our churches, Mountpottinger, came into being; and before that, if you except our Domestic Mission to the Poor, you have to go back another generation, to 1840, for the foundation of another still living church in Ireland, the York-street Church, Belfast (Ballymena, 1845, is dead). It can hardly be said, therefore, that our cause prospers here, if the test is to be that churches shall multiply.

Meanwhile, such real but uncountable success as fidelity and zeal may win for our churches must surely reward our ministers' work. One with another our pulpits are well manned; and if the lament is sometimes raised that we have too few Irishmen in our pulpits and too few Irishmen studying for our ministry—and I at least frankly confess that it is so—our congregations are more inclined to take a man for what he is worth than to boggle at him for his home or race; and our Englishmen, who number more than half our whole ministry over here, are working along as happily and usefully as the men of native birth. It is not our Irish congregations that deliberately set at a disadvantage any Englishman who comes to Ireland to take up the work of a minister of religion; it is certain English societies in England, and certain English educational foundations, that bar out from their consideration and fellowship any man, English though he be, who dates from this side of the Channel.

We have two vacant pulpits, Crumlin and Mountpottinger Crumlin is away westward from Belfast, about fourteen miles by road and about double the distance by rail. It is a bright and clean-looking little town, set amid well-wooded and well-farmed country, and in view of the shining waters of the queen of British lakes, Lough Neagh. If the Crumlin people come in from their farmsteads Sunday by Sunday as well as they did on the occasion, some time ago, when I had the privilege of worshipping with them, their fine old church must look well and be a great centre of light and healing. Whoever takes up the work from which Mr. Hall, after thirteen years of zealous service, has been called away, he will find plenty to do and a ready welcome if he has a mind to do it.

There is a splendid opportunity for a strenuous and faithful worker at Mountpottinger. From the centre of Belfast you look away south-eastward across the river, and beyond the station and the great shipyard there is a densely peopled district, Ballymacarret, where some forty thousand people, many of them solid men from the Queen's Island, have their homes. The Mountpottinger Church is in the very heart of this region, at the junction of the main roads that lead through it, as well placed to be a centre of active and vigorous life as any church I know. By all the tokens it ought to be one of our strongest working-class congregations.

Dare I, without wishing to wound any one, or to interfere in matters that do not concern me, say how deeply and sincerely I wish that our York-street Church were equally well placed. York-street is too near the business centre of the city for one thing, and, further, the quality of the neighbourhood has of late years very seriously declined. Look round the city, and you find a number of churchy-looking buildings now used as warerooms and what not. Their congregations moved out, years ago, into the suburbs, and so took a new lease of life. There may be good reason—and I think there is—for keeping the first church in its present central position; but the second congregation has done well to establish itself in All Souls, a mile away; and I cannot help thinking that a vigorous effort to transplant the York-street congregation to one of our populous suburbs would have the warm approval and the ready co-operation of our people at large, and might save the church for a successful future.

We are feeling a glow of satisfaction at the new start we have given to our Domestic Mission to the Poor. There was a period during which the work languished; all sorts of difficulties gathered about it, and some of its best friends even had thought of closing its history. But 1903 was its jubilee year, and we resolved to revive the work instead of ending it. We put out our appeal, and it was answered by contributions amounting to £1,000; we re-planned the mission building; made it bright, cheerful, inviting; and our re-opening service and meeting was a hopeful looking-forward to another half century of usefulness. Stanhope-street is exactly the neighbourhood where such domestic missionary work should find plenty of scope.

Of one question which closely concerns us it is difficult to say anything which is not either merest platitude or else irritatingly contentious, the question of our proposed Catholic University. After the issue of the Royal Commission's report, we had a long time of newspaper controversy, a discussion which probably did not lead any single individual to change his opinion upon the matter, or bring light to anyone who sat in darkness. Then the question was allowed to rest for a while, with only a flicker of interest now and then, as when Captain Shawe-Taylor's committee-men, nominated without their own consent, began to excuse themselves from the duty that had been thrust upon them. And now again the winds of controversy are blowing freely from all quarters about Lord Dunraven's proposals, the agonised appeal of our Queen's College here for a greatly increased Government grant, the counter-blast from Dr. Delaney, of the Roman Catholic University College in Dublin; Mr. O'Donnell's renewed denunciation of the Jesuits; the first signs of lower and weaker demands on the part of the hierarchy; and guesses, wild or shrewd, as to Mr. Wyndham's intentions and the chances of a Government Bill in the new session. Nobody knows and nobody can tell. There is nothing before us that has in it any promise of at once contenting the priests and not exasperating the Orange feeling of the North. And Orangeism is a tremendous power here. Even among our own people, who are usually on the side of consideration and all possible allowances, the general opinion as to the Royal Commission's report was that the best thing in it was its conclusion that, although much needed to be done, nothing could be done, and nothing ought to be attempted. "No," said a friend to me, a man of culture, ability, and social standing. "No! We got 'em down, and we'll keep 'em down." So there we end. There's Trinity: Catholic students may go there, if they will, and nobody will seek to tamper with their faith. And there are the Queen's Colleges; they are open to all comers; their students and their professors (at least it was so till very recently, and if it is no longer so, it is not because the Colleges have barred anybody out) are of all creeds, Catholic as well as Protestant. And surely this should satisfy everybody, it is said. "It ought to." "But it does not." And there the matter stands.

Meanwhile, there is no place where there exists a more urgent need to lift the education of youth to higher levels of thought and interest and ambition. There is too much struggling for "prizes," and too little value set on knowledge; too little delight and pride in learning, too many side-glances at the people who are looking on with appointments in their gift; too little corporate spirit among College men, and too much counting on the lift your own church connection may be able to give you. One longs to raise our young folk out of reach of such "cares of the world," and set them free to put their whole heart into their work, to fall in love with it, to feel the comradeship of study as well as its rivalries, and rise to the fences and take them gallantly, confident that there's good ground on the other side.

DOUGLAS WALMSLEY.

THE UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.—A meeting of the Irish alumni of the Unitarian Home Missionary College was held in the Central Hall, Belfast, on the 6th of January. The meeting was convened by the senior alumnus in Ireland, the Rev. W. S. Smith, and there were present the Revs. D. Matts, R. M. King, A. O. Ashworth, A. Turner, R. Lyttle, J. H. Bibby, J. A. Kelly, F. Thomas, W. G. Marsden, J. Miskimmin, W. Fielding, W. S. Smith, and A. Davison. The Rev. W. S. Smith was called to the chair, and it was unanimously resolved:

That in view of the forthcoming Jubilee of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, we, the Alumni of the College at present resident in Ireland, convinced that the College has established itself a permanent factor in the circle of the churches, that its already realised record is one in which every supporter may justly take pride, that the need of provision for an even more extended usefulness in the future is manifesting itself, we are agreed that the most fitting manner in which to celebrate the Jubilee is to lift the College entirely out of its present environment, to equip it with a complete building of its own in the vicinity of Owens College, Manchester, containing residence for Principal and rooms for students, and to name it "The Unitarian College, Manchester."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdare.—The winter activities at the Old Meeting-house are being prosecuted with commendable vigour. The annual tea-party, followed by a good concert, was a great success; and recently the Band of Hope, after three months hard training gave a representation in full character of the popular operetta, "Cinderella and the Prince," at the new Public Hall, which was crowded in every corner. It proved such a success that it had to be repeated, by special request, on Thursday, the 21st, and this time again to a crowded and delighted audience.

Accrington.—On Jan. 21 Mr. John Harwood gave a dramatic recital in the school before a good audience. The varied programme evoked Mr. Harwood's great powers of voice and expression. Examples of Lancashire and American humour, as well as classic selections from Shakspere and Dickens, were given. On Saturday last the Annual Congregational Meeting was held, Mr. E. J. Bradshaw presiding, Mr. Grime, the secretary, gave an account of the past year's work, and reported a slight increase in membership.

Ainsworth. — A tablet erected to the memory of the Revs. Joseph Bealey, James Whitehead, and James T. Whitehead, former ministers at Ainsworth, was unveiled on Sunday afternoon, January 17, by Mr. Jesse Hilton Hayes. The service was conducted by the Rev. M. R. Scott, minister at the chapel. The tablet, which is in scroll form, bears the following inscription:—"In loving memory of the Revs. Joseph Bealey, who died August 9, 1813, aged 56 years, pastor of this chapel for twenty-seven years, and openly announced his belief in Unitariansim on Sunday, April 4, 1813; also the Rev. James Whitehead, who died February 16, 1859, aged 70 years, pastor of this chapel for over 41 years, both being interred in the adjoining chapel yard; also the Rev. James Thornley Whitehead, his son, and grandson of the above Joseph Bealey, who died October 22, 1898, aged 63 years, pastor of this chapel for 11 years, from 1859 to 1870, and was afterwards pastor at Hackney Chapel, where he was interred. This tablet was erected by the congregation of this chapel, January 17, 1904." Mr. J. H. Hayes, before unveiling the tablet, said it was erected to the memory of grandfather, father, and son, who ministered to the needs, and strengthened and quickened the lives and progress of the congregation of that chapel between 1780 and 1870. The Rev. Joseph Bealey was the first minister to preach the Unitarian faith in that chapel. The Rev. M. R. Scott preached a sermon on "The inheritance of the open door." After pointing out that a great deal of what we called our national history was but the story of the shutting of doors and the opening of doors which blind ignorance, prejudice, and intolerance had shut, he proceeded to speak of the hardships borne by the early Unitarian ministers, and of the Rev. Joseph Bealey, who declared his belief in Unitarianism in that chapel on April 4, 1813. Four months after that day the preacher lay a dying man, but from his bed he spoke again words which should be cherished by all of them as a great inheritance—words spoken at a time when the faith he professed was looked upon with horror and derision. From his bed the preacher preached a sermon such as he never preached from the pulpit—"I have proved what Unitarian principles will do, and I find that they are all powerful to support and to console a man under affliction and in the presence of death." After referring to the other names on the tablet, the preacher dwelt upon the responsibility of such an ancestry. In these latter days, in religion, in education, in national life, they heard little but the shutting of doors. As they thought that afternoon of those whose children they were, let them consecrate themselves anew that their children might receive from their fathers, as they had received from theirs, the inheritance of an open door.

Boston.—Last Sunday the pulpit of Spain-lane Chapel was occupied by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F. G.S., who gave an excellent address on "Winter Thoughts." On Monday evening, he also delivered a lecture "In and about the Carpathians," illustrated by lantern slides, to a large audience. Mr. Shrubsole's lecture embodied the results of his tour in Hungary last summer and was highly interesting and instructive.

Birmingham (Old Meeting).—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on January 19, when an illuminated address was presented to the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A. The address expressed the high appreciation of the congregation of the services rendered to the church by Mr. Manning who has conducted the services since September 1903, during the temporary absence from England of the Rev. Joseph Wood. The congregation thanked him for his acceptable services in the pulpit as well as for his efficient and sympathetic assistance in the various institutions connected with the church, and also thanked Mrs. Manning for the cordial and able manner in which she had supported her husband in his good work.

Croydon (Welcome Meeting).—On Sunday, January 24, the Rev. W. J. Jupp entered on his ministry at the Free Christian Church, and on Tuesday a congregational meeting was held to welcome him and Mrs. Jupp. The first part of the meeting was held in the church, and was very largely attended. The chair was taken by Mr. J. Mathews, supported by the members of the church committee. The chairman explained that the meeting was to be of an entirely informal character, really a family gathering of the congregation, to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Jupp into their midst. He recounted the steps which had been taken to fill the pulpit, and expressed his conviction that they had made a very wise choice. Mr. James Williams spoke of the hard trial it had been to Mr. Jupp to come away from Liverpool, where not only his own congregation, but the body of ministers, and the children had urgently begged him not to leave them. To make up for what he had lost they must see to it that they gave to Mr. Jupp the full measure of their sympathy, confidence and affection. Mr. Francis W. Moore, as one of the original members of the church, joined in the welcome, and said they had a strong tradition there, which began with Mr. Suffield, their first minister, a tradition not only of freedom but of comradeship in the congregation. They rejoiced in a strong social element, to which the very structure of their building ministered. Through all their troubles that feeling of fellowship had prevailed, and the tradition had been maintained by each of their ministers in the past. They were happy in having Mr. Herbert Rix as friend and neighbour, and were greatly indebted to him for his services in the pulpit. Mr. Braham Pitt and Mr. J. H. Pontifex, a member of an orthodox church, also joined in the welcome, and Mr. Herbert Rix then spoke. He had taken the services since Mr. Jupp's acceptance (as often before), and said that as minister and layman he might exhort both Mr. Jupp and the congregation; but remembering their great kindness he did not feel that he could do that, and would therefore offer some exhortation not to them but to the pew in general. And first, the direct duty of the pew towards the minister was to be mindful of him. A faithful minister who touched the conscience and raised them nearer to the spiritual sphere was a channel of God. It was the duty of the congregation to help to keep that channel open, and that could only be done by constant sympathy and affection. Secondly, they must maintain the devotional spirit. Power must come from the pew as well as the pulpit. Each helped the other. They had there all the apparatus of devotion, a building for worship, a good organ, a most excellent organist with the true devotional spirit, and they must do their part. So the third duty he mentioned was that they should come, and not let a thin congregation impoverish the worship, and finally, they must not expect their ministerealways to be up to phe same level. The Rev. V. D. Davis added a pew words of sympathy and welcome, and speaking on behalf of the London ministers said with what delight they welcomed Mr. Jupp into their fellowship. As one who knew the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth he spoke of the grievous loss Mr. Jupp's departure was to his congregation there, but also of what he had done for them, which could not be taken away. He endorsed all that Mr. Rix had so beautifully said as to the way in which the congregation must sustain their minister in his work. The Rev. W. J. Jupp, in responding to the welcome, expressed his gratitude for all that had been so kindly said, and for the depth and sincerity of the welcome they had given to him and his wife. It seemed to him that they had done a very gracious thing in asking them to come back to Croydon, where their oldest and dearest friends were, and to the county of Surrey, which they loved, and which was, for them, so rich in sources of health and happiness. He could not pretend to the gifts of those who had preceded him in that pulpit, but he came to speak to them in all simplicity of life, its beauty and mystery, its pathos, its hopes and fears and affections, the passion and the peace and love which pertain to human life here on earth under the heavens; and he might claim to bring to them some experience of life. Forty-four years ago he first came to Croydon, fatherless, almost friendless and penniless, and not far from that spot was the place of business where he worked. Then came the opportunity of training for the ministry, and after two years at Exeter he was for twenty years minister in Croydon. And now that he was back again, it seemed like coming home. He was glad to hear of the tradition of that church, both of its freedom, and of the true fellowship they found in freedom. As to the Sunday services he wished to say that he believed more and more in simplicity, and he was more grateful than he could say for their music, and what their organist, with such true feeling, contributed to the services. He did not want to alter the order of service more than necessary, but he valued greatly the opening sentences to strike the keynote of the service, and a little part of every service addressed especially to the young people. He begged that they would allow him to concentrate his best strength and the golden hours of every day on the Sunday work, and that they would be kind not to himself, but to what he loved most, to that ideal of life which in various ways and forms he should try to present to them. He did not ask them to agree with all he said, but that they would give kindly consideration to his ideals. He felt that they were offering him an opportunity of gathering up the fruits of the past experience of his life and giving it some expression, and he should try to make words be as things that reveal, and should speak out of his deepest faith and hope and aspiration, that he might be of some small service to them in their moral and spiritual life. And he concluded: "May the grace of the spirit of Christ be upon us. May that light of which Dante sang, the light intellectual, full of love, shine and glow in the deeps of our souls, and may the strength of the Eternal be our hope and our stay. May the blessedness of those who, whatever their frailties and imperfections, do hunger and thirst after righteousness be our exceeding great joy, till at last we come into that vision of which Plato wrote, that vision of the infinite beauty of the Good, which shall make us one with all that our purest heart can desire, one with all that our holiest mind can know and love and hope." At the conclusion of the speaking the company adjourned to the Church Hall, where refreshments were served, and the rest of the evening was very pleasantly spent in social intercourse.

Guildford.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held after the evening service on January 24. To the deep regret of all present, Mr. Edwin Ellis, J.P., announced his intention to retire from the secretaryship, a position which he has so ably held for nearly thirty years, in addition to nearly ten years previous service in the same capacity on behalf of the Godalming congregation. After some discussion, Mr. Ellis's resignation was very reluctantly accepted, and Mr. J. Howell was elected his successor in office. Notwithstanding his failing health, Mr. Ellis's interest in the church, as one of its chief supporters, will, we are glad to say, remain unabated.

Huddersfield. — On Wednesday, January 20, Mr. John Harwood gave a recital of Dickens' "Cricket on the Hearth," at the Fitzwilliam-street school, which was very warmly appreciated.

Hull: Park-street Church.—On Jan. 9 the "Workers' League," assisted by ladies of the congregation, provided tea, and an entertainment afterwards, for the "older and needy folk," of whom between eighty and ninety were present. The entertainment was in every way most successful, and there is something especially pleasing in this endeavour, renewed year by year, on the part of a society composed of distinctly the younger members of the church, to brighten the lives of the less fortunate. On the 12th the annual business meeting of the Band of Hope was held. A satisfactory report was presented. An increase of forty-one in the membership was shown, while the average attendance at the monthly meetings had been 133. With great regret the society had to record the recent loss by death of Mr. Barnabas Tongue, who had rendered valuable assistance to this department of the church's activity, as to many others in the course of a lifelong devotion to the cause of Unitarianism in Hull. The retiring officers were re-elected. It is of interest to note that chairmen and speakers have been drawn on several occasions from other churches, and have given much valued help. Considerable pleasure was derived from a visit to Hull of our late minister, Rev. E. W. Lummis, who conducted the services on the 10th, lectured before the Hull Literary Club on the following evening, and gave an address on "Fame" to the Church Literary and Social Union on the 13th. On Friday the junior scholars had their annual tea and entertainment, and on the following evening the older scholars were similarly entertained. The attendance each evening was about 80. The willing co-operation of our minister and Mrs. Vaughan and of past and present teachers made these evenings very enjoyable. In connection with the lecture scheme inaugurated by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Rev. Charles Hargrove, on Thursday, the 14th, delivered the first of a series of six weekly lectures on "The Gospel according to St. John," in the Co-operative Society's Hall. There was a good attendance.

Lancaster (Lamport Memorial). — A special service was held in St. Nicholas-street chapel on Sunday morning, January 17, when the stained glass window, placed in the chapel by the congregation and other friends, in memory of the late Miss Lamport, was unveiled by her niece, Dr. Ethel Lamport, of London. The window presents two subjects, in the upper half, that of the Parable of the Talents, with the text: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," and below, that of Dorcas distributing alms, and it bears the following inscription: "To the glory of God, and in loving memory of Frances Noble Lamport. Born October 23, 1821; died July 9, 1902." It is just a hundred years since her father, the Rev. William Lamport became minister of the Lancaster chapel. The service of dedication was conducted by the Rev. J. C. Pollard, and included a beautiful rendering of "O Rest in the Lord," and after the unveiling of the window the singing of the hymn, "Sleep on, beloved, sleep, and take thy rest." Mr. Pollard's sermon, from the texts, Matthew xxv. 23, and Acts ix. 36, referred with deep feeling to the beautiful spirit of Miss Lamport's life, her great unselfishness and constant quiet beneficence. The love and veneration in which she was held extended far beyond the borders of the congregation, which owed to her so deep a debt of gratitude, and this had been shown by the eagerness with which other friends joined in raising that memorial.

Leeds: Hunslet.—The annual Sunday-school party for parents and teachers was held on January 23, when, after tea, the prizes to the scholars were distributed by Mrs. Arnold Lupton, Mr. Thornton being in the chair. Addresses were given by the chairman, the Revs. J. M. Whiteman, W.R. Shanks, and J. Fox, and Mr. Arnold Lupton.

Liverpool.—The annual meeting of the Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Society was held on Thursday, January 21, in the Park Café, Mill-street. Refreshments were served from 7 to 8 p.m., and at 8 the chair was taken by the president, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. In his opening remarks he referred with pleasure to the accomplishment of the scheme of a Temperance Public House, and he dwelt on the danger to the Temperance cause of the proposed Government legislation. The Secretary then read the report for the year 1903, which mentioned the opening of the Park Café in October and its very satisfactory prospects, and gave a list of meetings held during the year, five meetings of the Society at different churches or missions, and one drawing-room meeting. The council regretted the retirement of Dr. Klein from the position of president, but was fortunate in having secured the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. The retiring officers were then re-elected: president, Rev. R. A. Armstrong; treasurer, Mrs. Ellams; hon. secretary, Miss E. K. McConnell, and eight members were elected to serve on the council, together with the representatives of affiliated societies. Mr. B. P. Burroughs, secretary of the Liverpool Temperance Public House Co., Ltd., then gave some interesting details of the working of the Park Café. Working men seemed really to appreciate the good cheap food there provided, returning from some distance to breakfast at the café. A billiard table will soon be placed in the upper room, and Mr. Burroughs made a plea for gifts of draught boards and pictures. A resolution protesting against any interference by Government with the discretionary power of magistrates over the re-issue of licenses was passed unanimously, on the motion of the Rev. H. D. Roberts, seconded by Mr. W. M. Topping. A vote of thanks to the president closed the proceedings.

London: Mansford Street. — On Monday evening, January 25, a special meeting was held in the large school-room by the Mansford-street Guild, for the purpose of giving a happy evening to some of the blind people living in the East-end of London. Tea and an entertainment were provided, about 100 of the afflicted sharing them with as many guides. After tea came a little neighbourly gossip and a re-arrangement of the seats, followed by a brief welcome from the Warden, the Rev. J. Ellis, and a few happily chosen words of gratitude and good fellowship from Mr. Mead, their teacher and missionary. The first part of the entertainment consisted of songs, recitations, and readings. The second half including the children's play, "The Babes in the Wood," acted by scholars of the Sunday school, and proving even more popular than the amusement given by the elders. Mr. Plumbridge, a visitor of the blind, thanked the Mansford-street friends, and particularly the children, for all they had done, the Rev. J. Ellis replying.

London: Stamford-street.—The Monday popular concerts (8 p.m., admission free) entered on the second half of a very successful session with three capital entertainments provided by Mr. Leslie Harwood and friends (January 11), Mr. George Ling, the concert secretary (January 18), and the Essex Church Musical Guild (January 25). Next Monday (February 1) Mr. J. H. Leigh, M.A., is to give a reading of Shakespeare's tragedy, "Macbeth," and all who have ever heard Mr. Leigh will wish to be there.

Manchester District Association.—The January visit was paid to Longsight on the 16th inst., when service was conducted by Rev. Dendy Agate, and the sermon preached by Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, from Psalm xxvii. 4. A congregation of about one hundred persons assembled, notwithstanding the very unfavourable state of the weather. As usual, tea was served immediately after service, and the gathering was composed of others in addition to those who had been at worship, and their numbers were still further increased before the meeting began. Gaskell Hall was pleasantly decorated, and on the wall behind the platform ran the motto, "The Mill cannot Grind with the Water that is Past," which pleased most of the visitors, if not all. The chair was taken by Mr. George H. Leigh, a vice-president of the Association, and he was supported by the Revs. H. J. Rossington and W. E. George, and that veteran worker, Mr. John Heys. The speeches were vigorous, full of hope and purpose, and calculated to do real good. Mr. Leigh emphasised the importance of strengthening the local society; Mr. Rossington, as emphatically, showed the danger of concentrating attention on local affairs and losing opportunities for counsel and sympathy. There was, in his opinion, little likelihood of any church neglecting itself for the sake of an Association, although it was becoming increasingly clear that "our" Association meant a good deal more than "business" and "finance." Mr. Heys declared his conviction that there was greater need than ever for the work our churches were peculiarly fitted to perform. Mr. George spoke of "Our Opportunities." Musical items were rendered by the choir, and their contributions made some present think of what might be done if our congregations were better known to each other. But we hope to have a "massed choir" again at the annual service in March.

Manchester: Urmston (Resignation).—Rev. H. Kelsey White has intimated his intention to retire from the pastorate of the Queen's-road Free Church at the end of March.

Mottram.—At the annual meeting of registered members recently held, the report and balance sheet indicated much progress during 1903. The membership had increased from 80 to 138, though the registration fee was doubled. Attendances at services had increased, averaging over 140 adults throughout the year. £20 more than before had been contributed by the congregation in support of the minister. Nearly £30 had been spent in renovations, repairs, and alterations. Over £7 had been contributed to the M.D.S.S.A. bazaar. £10 had been spent in the adoption of the New Essex Hall Hymn Book, and after all current expenses had been paid there was a balance in hand of £3 6s. 5d. Quarterly membership meetings have been established for church business and for fellowship in a rationalised Communion service. The Sunday-school work has been more systemised under the management of monthly meeting of teachers. A winter discussion society has been established and carried on with much success, with attendances sometimes as low as fifty, and at others as high as 150. The Band of Hope Meetings have improved, as the result of some reorganisation. Among new activities there have been Saturday rambles in summer, and physical drill classes in winter. There have been Saturday social evenings, and the Dramatic Society has given some excellent dramatic performances. The Sewing Society has been doing good work in preparation for a Sale of Work to be held at the end of this winter. The minister has delivered lectures on Unitarianism in two adjoining townships, public discussion invited, and a gratifying amount of interest was awakened, with the help of propagandist leaflets, supplied by the B. & F.U.A. A congregational magazine has also been established for use of the members and for distribution amongst outsiders. Increased grants have been promised by the East Cheshire Christian Union and the B. & F.U.A., and a larger contribution from the congregation to augment the minister's stipend for 1904.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday-School Union.—The quarterly meeting was held at Ashton-under-Lyne on Saturday, January 16, about eighty persons being present. Immediately after tea the committee met for the transaction of business, and the chair at the after proceedings was taken by the president, Mr. William Lawton, of Mossley. Rev. W. C. Hall introduced the subject for the evening discussion, "The work of our schools for the Bazaar." The bazaar referred to is the East Cheshire Christian Union Bazaar, to be held in the autumn. He mentioned several ways in which help could be given, and the discussion, generally favourable to his views, was taken part in by the president, Revs. W. Harrison, H. E. Dowson, and B. C. Constable, Miss Doman, and Messrs. R. Caton, F. Ashton, A. Slater (hon. sec.), and E. B. Broadrick. Several songs were given at intervals by the Ashton friends, and hearty votes of thanks, duly responded to, closed the meeting.

Nottingham.—A meeting of the High Pavement Historical Society was held in the School Rooms on Tuesday evening, January 19, when a lantern lecture was given by the Rev. Frank K. Freeston (of Essex Church), entitled "Our Churches in London, their History, and Ministry," the President, Mr. J. C. Warren, occupying the chair. Mr. Freeston traced the history of some of the older churches in London, touching upon many interesting episodes connected therewith, and giving short biographical sketches of a few of the leading ministers who had worked so conspicuously in the early days of Unitarianism in the Metropolis. The lecture was illustrated by a series of very fine lantern slides, and was greatly appreciated. At the close a very hearty vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Freeston on the motion of Miss Guilford (the President of the Society), seconded by the Rev. Frederic Allen (of London).

Pontypridd (Appointment).—Mr. Simon Jones, of the Home Missionary College, Manchester, has received and accepted a hearty invitation from the Pontypridd congregation to become their minister, and will probably enter upon his ministry in July.

Poole.—The past month has been marked by some successful social meetings and two lectures in connection with the Guild of the Good Shepherd, which has now been at work for a little more than a year and has proved a strength to Church and school. The first lecture on January 12 was by the Rev. Jas. Burton in "Some characters in the struggle for civil liberty in the 17th century." The second, on January 17, by Dr. W. G. Munn on "Thought Forms." The annual meeting of the congregation was held on January 20 with the largest attendance for several years, and in a spirit of confidence and hope for the future.

Pudsey.—The report of the induction service and welcome to the Rev. Edgar Lockett on Jan. 18 has reached us too late for this week's issue.

Shrewsbury.—On Wednesday, January 20, the annual tea and entertainment connected with High-street Church Sunday-school took place, when the prizes were given by the Rev. J. C. Street. The chief function was the presentation of a leather travelling dressing case to Mrs. Myers on her resignation as Sunday-school superintendent, after holding the position for a period of thirty years. Mrs. Myers first read her last report as superintendent on the work of the school, which was a very satisfactory one. The Rev. J. C. Street having distributed the prizes, said that evening was a very special one for the Sunday-school. It was the oldest in the borough, and had had a very interesting and useful history. Good work had been done there for 100 years, for more than thirty of which Mrs. Myers had been the active and untiring superintendant of the school. It was an almost unexampled period of service as a superintendent. Mrs. Myers went there as the wife of the distinguished minister who for many years served the church, and from the commencement she was at his right hand, especially in the work of the school; also in going amongst the people in their homes and making herself the friend of many. After the change came and Mrs. Myers was left alone, she felt it to be her duty to still carry on the work as superintendent, and for the past seven years she had continued to be just as faithful and devoted to the task as when her husband was by her side. But the time had come when Mrs. Myers felt she must lay down the active part of her work, and so had resigned her position. They all recognised the strength of her plea for doing so, but all of them, from the youngest to the oldest, desired to express to her their deep indebtedness for all that she had done. They had all united in securing the token before them of their admiration, respect, and love for Mrs. Myers, whose acceptance of it he would call upon Mr. Mansell, their secretary and treasurer, and the most active member of their church, to ask. Mr. Mansell then made the presentation, which Mrs. Myers gratefully acknowledged.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The year 1903 concluded with a social evening, followed by a watch-night service, which was fairly well attended. Several New Year's parties have since been held, and on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 17, a special service was held in the church, at which Mrs. J. Baker (member of the late School Board, and now of the Education Committee) gave a most interesting and helpful address on "The Freedom of Truth"; after which she presented the prizes and certificates to the scholars for their regular and punctual attendance, and good conduct during the past year. The service was conducted by the minister, the Rev. Henry Cross; and there was a large congregation of children, members, and friends.

Stourbridge.—The annual meeting of the Presbyterian Chapel Provident Society, established 1774, in connection with the Chapel, was held in the Wollaston-road Schools on Monday. Mr. Frank Taylor presided. Mr. J. T. Short (hon. secretary) presented a very satisfactory report and statement of accounts. Rev. A. Hermann Thomas and Mr. Frank Teeson were unanimously elected members of the Society. Messrs. W. R. Blurton and George Evers were appointed auditors. Mr. Thomas returned thanks for his election as a member of the society, and said he had read the history of the society with interest and pleasure. He was sorry to notice that there was so little official connection with the chapel, and suggested a provident Sunday being established in connection with the society, when he might preach a sermon on thrift and the advantages of joining such institutions as theirs.

Tavistock.—The Rev. John Barron is giving a course of fortnightly lectures in the Abbey Chapel on "The Brotherhood of Religions." The first lecture, on Wednesday, Jan. 20, was on "Hinduism, the Religion of Duty and its Symbol: the Triple Thread of the Brahman." The second lecture, next Wednesday, is to be on "Buddhism, the Religion of Wisdom and its Symbol: the Lotus." In the first lecture Mr. Barron spoke of the new light thrown upon truth by the comparative study of religions. The British Empire, he said, now embraced every religion which was worthy of being called great. It was universally recognised that no bond was so strong as that which was truly religious (not sectarian), and no animosities were so bitter and so deep as those which rose from religious strife and rivalry. The Indian Mutiny was an object lesson of the consequences of disregarding religious scruples What was to be the attitude of Christianity towards the other religions of the Empire in the future? Was it to be aggressive, looking upon the older religions as faiths to be annihilated and supplanted, or was it to be one of co-operation in what is best, giving the great emphasis of world-wide unanimity to that best, strengthening and purifying each and all? That was why the present course was headed "The Brotherhood of Religions." Scarcely a more difficult task could be taken than that of giving the briefest outline which would do justice to such an ancient and complex religion as that of Hinduism. In the study of religions, it was a striking fact that they were given out at critical times in the world's history, at the dawn of a new order, or a new civilisation. The history of Hinduism was identical with that of the Hindu people, and was given first in the infancy of the race to the Aryans who settled in Aryavarta in Northern India when the race was governed by a leader called the Manu, and teachers who worked under him—the Rishis. There was no distinction of "sacred" and "secular" in the life of the Hindu. Freedom of intellect was encouraged, but orthodoxy of life insisted upon. There was a vast range of religious opinions, but scrupulous, and in these days exaggerated ideas as to the duties of life. Hence it was often considered a burdensome religion. Hinduism never sought to make converts. A man had to be born into it. The four great castes, the priest, the soldier, the merchant, and the agriculturist, indicated the duty of anyone born into them. Every Hindu wore a threefold thread, fastened round him in babyhood, made of cotton if he were a Brahman or priest; of flax, the material of bow strings, if a soldier; of wool if a trader and cattle raiser. The thread had a variety of threefold meanings, but control of speech, thought, and action was the principal.

Walmsley (Presentation).—On Sunday afternoon a presentation was made to the Rev. E. Allen, who is retiring after a ministry of over twenty-five years, of a handsome time-piece and a cheque for a hundred guineas. The presentation was made on behalf of the congregation and friends by Mr. Mayor, who spoke of Mr. Allen's good work and of the good feeling which had prevailed between him and the congregation throughout his ministry. At the same time Mr. T. Ainsworth, superintendent, on behalf of the teachers and scholars of the Sunday-school presented a silver tea urn suitably engraved, to Miss Allen in recognition of her services as a teacher. Mr. Allin gratefully acknowledged the gifts.

PRAYER is the real spiritual dynamic; it really does accomplish its end by bringing to our side those mighty spiritual agencies which are able to effect the purposes of God. H. R. Haweis.

BOWDEN HILL CHAPEL

(1729),

CREDITON.

APPEAL FOR £360.

THIS CONGREGATION of Working People appeal to their more favoured brethren of our Churches for help in aid of the Restoration and the Re-roofing of their Chapel. For many years little was done to the Chapel and the Trust-property, with the result that until two years ago both were in a deplorable condition.

Last year a comfortable Schoolroom and a Lecture-hall were provided, by enclosing the space under the galleries with a partition of wood and glass.

But the larger work of Restoration and Re-roofing can no longer be delayed, for the leaky state of the roof is seriously injuring the Chapel walls, and rendering the entire fabric insecure. The floors have decayed, the windows shrunk, and the arrangement of the old oak pews is unsuitable to-day.

The Congregation is thoroughly united, and the members are working earnestly to make good their scheme.

The morning congregation is composed mainly of scholars and teachers. In the evening the attendance varies from forty to eighty adults, and on special occasions exceeds a hundred. The Sunday School is well cared for

This appeal on behalf of one of our old Chapels, served by a long succession of honoured ministers, is heartily commended by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and by the Western Union.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received and acknowledged by the Chapel Treasurer, Mr. W. H. GILLARD, Church-street, Crediton; Miss STEWART, The Studio, High-street, Crediton.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 94

OUR CALENDAR 95

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE centenary of Priestley's death is celebrated to-day (Saturday) in Leeds, as we announced last week, and in Warrington by the unveiling of a memorial tablet on Priestley's former residence in Academy-street. In Birmingham the centenary is being celebrated by the Midland Christian Union by a vigorous effort, referred to in this week's "Provincial Letter," to raise at least £5,000 to strengthen the work of the liberal churches of the district. A first circular announces donations already promised amounting to £1,868, and a bazaar is to be held in the Birmingham Town Hall on Nov. 30, and the three following days, in which it is hoped that all the churches will take part.

THE fourth session of the present Parliament was opened on Tuesday in circumstances of confusion and uncertainty for which one would have to turn back a great number of years to find a parallel. The unfortunate absence of the Prime Minister through illness gave emphasis to the fact that practically every man of weight on the Tory side in both Houses now sits on any other Bench but the Treasury Bench. The fact is full of danger not only to the Tory Party but to the nation at large. The path of Government bristles with difficulties which it needs wisdom and experience to overcome, and both experience and wisdom are conspicuously lacking among those who cling to the task of guiding our national affairs.

THE Opposition amendment to the Address with regard to Fiscal policy to be debated next week should extract from Ministers some definite statement as to their position in the matter, such as is conspicuously lacking up to the time of writing. The speeches of the recess have revealed almost as wide a difference of opinion among them as exists in the rank and file of the party outside. "Our effective deliberation on the financial service of the year is impaired by conflicting declarations from your Majesty's Ministers," says the amendment to the Address, and it certainly cannot be accused of over-stating the facts. Is the Government in favour of Protection, or is it not? What is the meaning of Mr. Balfour's word "premature" as applied to import duties on food stuffs? These are questions to which free traders on both sides of the House have returned to St. Stephen's determined to secure an answer.

ANOTHER matter which demands prompt consideration in the Imperial Parliament is the conspiracy between the Rand mine owners and their creatures in the Transvaal Government for the introduction of forced Chinese labour in the mines, against the manifest desire of the permanent white population of South Africa. Lord Lansdowne repeats Mr. Lyttelton's plea that it is the desire of the Government "to treat the Transvaal as though it were self-governing," and seeks on this plea to justify the unquestioning acceptance of the proposal of the Transvaal Government, although that Government is not in any sense representative. Of what advantage is it to the inhabitants of the Transvaal to be "treated as though self-governing" when they are not. Two guarantees for their welfare were held out to the Transvaalers on the conclusion of peace. One was the prospect of self government, and the other the close and fatherly solicitude of the Imperial Government. To some extent the two were incompatible. Now, on this critical question neither the one guarantee nor the other is forthcoming. Self-government is refused, as premature, and Imperial supervision is withheld because the Government "desire to treat the Transvaal as though it were self-governing." It is difficult to speak in temperate language of such miserable quibbling.

NEITHER Protection nor Chinese labour is mentioned in the King's Speech, but some reference is made to that other most urgent question, the crisis in the Far East. By the time THE INQUIRER is in the hands of our readers the issue of peace or war may have been finally decided. At the time of writing Japan still awaits the decision of Russia as to whether her demand shall be granted for a direct guaranteee by treaty of the integrity of China—i.e., the restoration of Manchuria to Chinese control—or whether the guarantee shall be given in the form of a Circular Note to the Powers. The King's Speech says, "Any assistance which my Government can usefully render towards the promotion of a pacific solution will be gladly afforded." But Lord Lansdowne adds: "We have not been invited to extend our good offices, and it is, I believe, an open secret that one at all events of the disputants has intimated plainly that it does not seek mediation." That disputant is Japan. But our treaty of alliance with Japan confers on us the right to be consulted at every stage of any dispute over the integrity of China or Korea, and our Government are solemnly bound, in view of the contingent liabilities in the matter which they have cast upon us, to do all in their power to prevent war from occurring merely through the refusal of Japan to allow Russia to "save her face" by making her surrender to the Powers in general, rather than to Japan in particular.

THE records of the conquests of the principle of arbitration occupy quite an imposing amount of space in the Speech, and it is matter for sincere congratulation that that principle should have finally triumphed over so severe a test as Lord Lansdowne tells us was offered by the Alaskan boundary dispute. But the display would be more impressive were it not followed by the records of our wanton military expeditions into Somaliland and Thibet—expeditions for which it would be difficult to find any ultimate justification beyond the mere lust of conquest over a weaker neighbour. One would, too, that the progress of affairs in Macedonia offered a better illustration of the beneficent working of that Concert of Europe to which its supporters are accustomed to point as a further illustration of the principles of international amity.

THE Speech takes pride in the fact that last February's reform scheme "has been improved and strengthened in several important particulars," and that, so revised, it "has been concurred in by the other Powers and accepted, after a regrettable delay, by the Porte." But accepting reforms and enforcing them are two very different things with "his Majesty the Sultan," as even Ministers seem to recognise, for under this head they can only tell us that "it is to be earnestly hoped that advantage will be taken" of the cessation in "the disturbances" which winter brings "to carry out those practical measures of amelioration which are so sorely needed in these unhappy regions." When will the Government learn, and act upon the knowledge, that the Sultan requires something more than their "earnest hopes" as an incentive to the decent treatment of his subjects?

To the programme of domestic reforms foreshadowed in the King's Speech there will be later opportunities of referring. First on the list is a Bill to check the immigration of aliens. Our Government's views on this subject are different where England is concerned from what they are in the case of the Transvaal, or, indeed, of Somaliland and Thibet. The measure which will arouse the keenest controversy, however, is that for "amending the law with respect to licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors in England." This, of course, will embody Mr. Balfour's promised plan for making a present to licence holders, or their masters, of that vested interest in the renewal of their licences which they have always claimed, but have never hitherto possessed. The wanton placing of so gratuitous a stumbling block in the way of that diminution of temptations to excessive drinking so earnestly desired by all who have at heart the true welfare and progress of our people must be resisted to the last.

LAST year's Report of the "Lancashire and Cheshire Society for the Permanent Care of the Feeble-Minded" has some capital illustrations, the frontispiece showing the two Sandlebridge Special Schools in their delightfully open situation, and two others, the dining room and recreation room of the girls' school (with the partition withdrawn), and the dormitory in the boys' school. The report shows good progress in the work, and the inevitable growing need of financial support. There is urgent need for an industrial home for weak-minded youths, too old for admission to the schools, and of another for women. In the children's homes there are now sixteen boys in residence, with room (owing to the new Act) for four more, and twenty girls.

The girls, like the boys (says the report) begin to be useful in their home duties. It will be a great help when they can do their own sewing, but, naturally, the finer the manual work they are required to do, the more difficult they find it to master. The girls enjoy an hour's work in the garden very much when it can be arranged for them, and we hope that they may do more outside work in the future.

IT is pleasant to hear that last year Mr. Sandlebridge's garden not only supplied the vegetables for the two houses, but, with the poultry, produced a money return of £60; and still more to be assured that under the gardener's careful training it serves admirably for the development of the children's powers. The Government inspector, after his last visit to the schools, wrote in the log book: "The children are kindly and successfully taught, and the discipline is very good." Dr. Eichholz, H.M.I. of special schools, also wrote: "The children look exceedingly well cared for, and are greatly improved in intelligence and dexterity since my last visit." The report further says:—

No one who has not watched the slow progress of the children can appreciate their difference from ordinary boys and girls, and how disheartening it is to labour day after day without seeming to make any impression. In most cases, however, an impression is made, and shows after a time. It is in manual work that most is achieved, and, to those who have known the children from the beginning of their school career, and who knew how very helpless their fingers were at first, it seems wonderful that they should have learned rug-making, so as to turn out pretty and saleable articles, and have got on so well with their basket-making. Many of them can sew a little and put on buttons, can knit dishcloths and vests, and will soon, we hope, be able to knit stockings. Some of them are learning to use pen and pencil a little; almost all can sing, and do sing very nicely. School hours are all pleasure to the children, and the school work is fitted into the house and garden work so as to make one continuous training. Some of the big boys are now half-timers, and work in the garden, in fine weather, after dinner. The teaching will be easier for the teachers when the new schoolroom, which is to be placed outside the two houses, is built. It is to be an iron building, and will not be very costly. We have to thank Miss Dickens, the Superintendent of Special Schools for Manchester, for visiting the school from time to time to examine the children, and to help the teachers with advice, and also with appreciation and sympathy. Reading, writing, and arithmetic are, obviously, the least useful things we can teach children of this type.

The Society, with the Dean of Manchester as president, has a thoroughly representative committee. The hon. secretaries, from whom further information can be obtained, are Miss Mary Dendy, 13, Clarence-road, Withington, and Dr. J. J. Cox, 38, Deansgate, Manchester.

IT has long been the complaint of men like Ruskin and William Morris that the vast and complex machinery which has been invented and used in the "industrial era" has taken from men's hands the skilled and artistic work and left them mere machine-minders, while the more degrading and unpleasant work has been not abolished but increased by machinery. The stokeholes of steamers, coal mines greatly increased in number, and poisonous trades, are a few examples of the increase of unpleasant and harmful employments. Although the complaint still holds good, one is glad to notice even slight mitigations, hoping for more. There has been a decided improvement in one of the poisonous trades, that of match-making. A preparation of phosphorus almost harmless to the worker is, we are told, universally used in the manufacture of matches in France, and is now generally used in England, and phosphorus poisoning in the factories has decreased to a remarkable extent.

WHITE lead poisoning in the Potteries has also been reduced, according to a report on the operation of the new rules; and those who are in earnest in the desire to secure healthy conditions for the workers can now purchase crockery and pottery with leadless glaze. Dealers who do not keep this kind of ware in stock will no doubt do so if they find that customers persistently inquire for it and will not take a substitute. It is easy to know it by the inscription in small letters on the bottom of each article, "leadless glaze." If the public care to bring about reforms in the pottery and other trades they may often do so by their influence as purchasers. Now that leadless glaze is obtainable, and at a moderate price, the ordinary purchaser can do something to direct "the power of the purse" to the support of the more healthy industries.

RECENT discussions at the meetings of the Manchester Geological and Mining Society show that machinery is likely to be largely used in coal mines for the cutting of coal. Electric coal cutters and coal cutters worked by air power have their advocates. The Hulton Colliery Company has six electric coal cutters regularly at work. Mr. Alfred J. Tonge discussed the matter fully, saying that his company would consider a return to hand labour a step back into older and darker times. His arguments were intended to show that by the use of machinery there would be a larger and better output of coal, and greater economy of working. The effect upon the worker was not much under consideration. Yet it would seem probable that dangerous employment underground would be decreased considerably. One item of saving to the employer shows this: Mr. Tonge points out that "the premium per ton for risk of life is reduced by one-third."

THE Wesleyans deserve a word of gratitude from all lovers of truth for the vigour and courage with which they are entering into the controversial battle which the Rationalist Press publications, the Clarion articles, and various similar attacks have made inevitable. A series of lectures under the general heading: "Is Christianity True?" (a title not quite free from ambiguity) is being delivered weekly and afterwards published in Methodist papers, and in tracts which cost only one penny each. The lectures are by able preachers of several denominations; several of them are remarkable for breadth and liberality of view as well as for a just appreciation of the need of the time.

WE ought not ourselves to stand by while this battle goes on. Individually, no doubt, our ministers are doing their share. But as a body, as a group of churches with a common and worthy faith, we ought to have our part in this work. And especially one question deserves to be dealt with at our hands. We who have so long advocated the very doctrines of God, of Christ, of the Bible, of the nature of man, which now, with but little modification, find acceptance among leading representatives of various orthodox Churches, should be able to point out with some particularity what follows, as a practical consequence, from the theses we have maintained of the Fatherhood of God, of the humanity of Christ, of the continued presence of the inspiring spirit among men. In short, beside the series "Is Christianity True?" there should be another, to demonstrate before the people what follows from that clear truth.

IV.

PERSECUTION, EXILE, AND DEATH.

HAPPILY situated as Dr. Priestley was at Mill Hill Chapel, highly esteeming as he assures us he did the work of the ministry above every other employment, it is yet evident that he was conscious of the drawbacks which the very narrow means at his disposal (his salary was a hundred guineas a year and a house) imposed upon his prosecution of scientific work; nor was it possible to make any provision for the future of his family. So, when the proposal came to him to accompany Captain Cook in his second voyage to the South Seas, "in the character of astronomer," Priestley immediately assented, "in view of the handsome provision secured to me and my family," and the congregation arranged for an assistant to supply until his return. The arrangement, however, fell through on account of the unsoundness of his religious principles, which were objected to by some clergymen on the Board. But shortly after Lord Shelburne approached him through Dr. Price, desiring to secure his services as a literary companion, and making very liberal offers in respect of remuneration. His lordship afterwards paid him a visit in Leeds, and after some hours' conversation agreed to allow him £250 a year, and a house adjoining his own in town as well as another near his seat in the country. This offer was accepted after much hesitation, leave being given that he should continue his work as a minister by preaching whenever the opportunity presented itself. The reason which finally determined him he states in similar terms in a private letter to Mr. Lindsey, and in one taking leave of his congregation: "It will be in my power to be more useful both to my family and the world."

This arrangement lasted for over seven years, a length of time which is much to the credit of the patron, for it could not but have been trying to have the company and responsibility of a philosopher so outspoken and fearless of unpopularity as was Dr. Priestley. "I used to make no scruple of maintaining," he writes in reviewing these days when he was at home in society, "that there is not only most virtue and most happiness, but even most true politeness in the middle classes." We can imagine that the theme would not be always welcome; and when unpopular publications calculated to bring odium on his patron, who was, no doubt, advised by his friends that he should keep his client under restraint, came to add to the growing irksomeness of the situation, the pledge that his lordship should not suffer any injury by them did not count for much.

So the connection came to an amicable end in 1780, and when, some years later, Lord Shelburne made overtures with a view to resuming it, Priestley, being then comfortably settled at Birmingham, would not consent.

And here he looked forward to passing the remainder of his life. Writing his "Memoirs" in 1787, he says: "I consider my settlement at Birmingham the happiest event of my life, being highly favourable to every object I had in view, philosophical and theological. The congregation is the most liberal, I believe, of any in England. My prospects are better than they have ever been before, my own health and that of my wife better established, and my hopes as to the future settlement of my children satisfactory."

As to the dislike which he had drawn upon himself by his writings, a dislike which was common to the orthodox and the cautious and the unbelievers, all of whom he had offended, "I am thankful," he says, "that it gives less disturbance to me than it does to themselves; and is much more than compensated by the cordial esteem and approbation of a few, and that the number of such persons increases."

But an event was at hand which, as it was to affect the condition of probably every family in France from the highest to the humblest, and to make its influence felt throughout the world, was also to upset all Priestley's purposes for the future, and forcibly disturb the serenity of his life.

With the French Revolution the "few" whose esteem Priestley valued were from the beginning in sympathy. He was himself enthusiastic for it beyond his wont. "There is indeed," he wrote in the autumn of 1789, "a glorious prospect for mankind before us. Other countries, I hope, will follow in due time, and when civil tyranny is all at an end, that of the Church will soon be disposed of." And to Dr. Price: "I most sincerely congratulate you on the glorious effulgence of liberty in France, and on the share in it ascribed to you." Later on he wrote to Mr. Lindsey: "Our anxiety during the King of France's escape, and our joy on his capture, cannot be described. The high party here are mortified in the extreme. They would have had France involved in a most ruinous civil war, for the imaginary rights of one man."

For his own position he seems to have had no anxiety whatever, though he was fully cons ious that "let a man conduct himself in the best manner possible, there is no field in which he is exposed to more serious hatred than that of politics. I have sinned beyond forgiveness in many respects," he went on, "but, happily, I am not apt to be disturbed at censure from any quarter, when I know it to be ill-founded." Indeed, he had done his best while at Birmingham, as he had elsewhere, to live at peace with all men, and it was not until the clergy of the town forced him to defend himself by their unfair attacks that he wrote "An Appeal to the Common Sense and Common Honesty of every Inhabitant of Birmingham" against them. But having been driven against his will into controversy with them, he was resolved "to keep the ball up, and not do it by halves"; as he says later on, "With respect to the Church, I have a long time ago drawn the sword, and thrown away the scabbard," and, he adds, very mistakenly as the event showed, "I am very easy about the consequences."

The consequences of which he had so little apprehension were the ruin of all his fair prospects. There is no need to tell again the story of the hatred excited against him on the part of a mob who were all for a Church which neglected them, and a constitution in which they had no share. A controversy which few of them could so much as read aroused an amount of feeling which would have done credit to a better cause. On the walls and houses of Birmingham was scrawled in large letters, "Damn Priestley, Damn the Presbyterians, &c.," and on one occasion boys left their play to follow him, shouting, "Damn Priestley, damn him for ever, for ever, for ever." The quiet celebration of the second anniversary of the taking of the Bastille by a dinner, at which Priestley was not present, was the match which fired the materials which had been long preparing. The toasts drunk on the occasion were of the most harmless character; the first in order being "The King and Constitution," but it was reported in The Times, and, doubtless, so believed in Birmingham, to have been "Destruction to the Present Government and the King's Head upon a Charger." Then the fury of the mob was kindled. Priestley sat at home playing a game of backgammon before going to bed, when the message came to him that mischief was on foot. He and his wife were driven off to a friend's house, and from that Thursday night to Monday morning following, when he arrived worn out by fatigue and anxiety in London, he was continually on the move. This lover and servant of mankind was driven to and fro by the threats of his fellow men as if he had been the worst of criminals. His chapel was wrecked, his house broken into, and all the accumulations of years, books, manuscripts, scientific apparatus, utterly destroyed. Nor could he even in London regain the peace and security which he had forfeited by his courageous vindication of the right of free speech and his advocacy of reform in Church and State. Even his scientific associates were shy of men who, like him, carried with them the infection of unpopularity. Neighbours were afraid of so dangerous a tenant hard by them, servants feared to live in his house, his sons found it difficult to get employment when their connection with him became known. After a short time, spent as happily as the circumstances would permit (and no circumstances seem ever to have had more than a passing effect upon Priestley's happiness), with the congregation at Hackney, who invited him, though not unanimously, to succeed his friend Dr. Price as their minister, he left England for the land which offered to friends of liberty a home though in exile.

He landed with Mrs. Priestley at New York on June 4, 1794, at about five o'clock in the afternoon, and was received, says a contemporary letter, "with a fervour of affection which no king ever yet received, much less deserved." The Governor, the Bishop, the heads of the college, most of the principal merchants and deputations from the corporate body all waited upon him the next morning to pay their respects, and assure him of their friendliness. "Dr. P. is wonderfully pleased with everything," wrote his wife, "and, indeed, I think he has great reason from the attention paid him. I never felt myself more at home in my life than since my arrival here."

English Unitarians must be ever grateful to America for the welcome it gave to one of their noblest champions, when driven by the bigotry of his countrymen from his native land.

Tempting invitations came to him, but he held to the purpose which he had formed before leaving England of taking up his abode in a new settlement, which his sons, with other English emigrants, were endeavouring to found near Northumberland in Pennsylvania. It was hoped that it would be a rallying point for the numbers then flocking to America, as refugees from the Tory tyranny in England, and that they would find themselves more at home in the society of their former fellow countrymen. The scheme came to nought, but Priestley stayed on in the neighbourhood, as it suited him and his wife, and his sons were near by.

Here he spent an honoured and active life, at work for the two causes to which he had been so long devoted—religion and science—to the very last. "That is right; I have now done," he said, when his son read over to him some additions and alterations he desired to have made in certain pamphlets he was preparing for the press. Presently, he desired to be lifted so that his head might be upright, and died without a sign.

Did there ever live a happier man? one asks, looking back on those seventy years of labour, privation, unpopularity, reproach, misrepresentation. "It is a sad prospect that is now before us," he wrote, when things were at the worst, himself homeless, and, but for the kindness of friends, destitute, "but we must not despair, or discover any timidity. I rather fear"—and here that brave, glad heart of the man, who trusted God wholly and absolutely, reveals itself—"I rather fear going into the opposite extreme, which, however, I think is the better of the two."

Oh, for such a spirit with us now, men and women who have lived to record the disillusions and disappointments of another century.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

THE Rev. H. Shaen Solly, who has been minister at East-street Chapel, Bridport, since 1888, is about to take six months' holiday. He and his wife will spend the spring and summer in Italy, and meanwhile the pulpit at Bridport will be occupied by the Rev. Felix Taylor, formerly of Tenterden, who returned in November last from a twelvemonths' residence in South Africa. Mr. Taylor, who is in excellent health, will take up his duties at Bridport on the first Sunday in March.

I HAVE no fear of Atheism in this House (he said); Truth is the expression of the Divine mind, and however little our feeble vision may be able to discern the means by which God may provide for its preservation, we may leave the matter in His hands, and we may be sure that a firm and courageous application of every principle of equity and of justice is the best method we can adopt for the preservation and influence of Truth. Gladstone.

JUSTICES AND LICENSING.

MR. AND MRS. SYDNEY WEBB, in their little book on "The History of Liquor Licensing,"* tell us that in the course of an elaborate investigation into English local government (begun by them four years ago, the results of which are still to be published), they had noted a "lull in crime and rioting, licentious living, disorderly conduct, and brutal amusements between 1790 and 1810." For some time they could find no adequate explanation of this, but at length discovered that a strict regulation and restriction of the sale of alcoholic drinks had been carried out by the Justices from 1786-87, lasting in many parts of the country for a whole generation. The movement seems to have begun in Yorkshire, where the Rev. Henry Zouch, rector of Swillington and Tankersley, was for many years the most active and influential of the West Riding justices. He wrote a pamphlet, Hints Respecting the Public Police (1786), and he brought such pressure to bear on his fellow-magistrates that Quarter Sessions in April, 1786, started many reforms, and vigilance committees, meeting weekly, were immediately formed in many West Riding towns. W. Wilberforce, at that time a Yorkshire M.P., did his best to convert this local movement into a national one, and through his efforts the Privy Council issued a royal proclamation, and the Secretary of State wrote to all the lord-lieutenants to incite the justices to activity.

Mr. and Mrs. Webb have unearthed from the files of old provincial newspapers at the British Museum and other sources, the dramatic details of this hitherto unknown episode in licensing, which has a special interest and importance at the present moment. The book begins with a short history of licensing previous to that period thus :—

By the Act 11 Henry VII. c. 2 (1495), strengthened by 19 Henry VII. c. 12 (1504), as part of the policy of discouraging indoor games, which diverted the people from archery, any two justices were authorised summarily to suppress useless ale-houses in their neighbourhoods, and it was primarily to strengthen this power that the first licensing Act of 1552 was passed. With the same object these ale-house licences were required by the justices to be renewed annually, so that a mere refusal to renew amounted to, and apparently suspended, the statutory power of suppression. The full power of the justices to refuse the renewal of a licence, entirely at their own discretion, and without assigning cause, was questioned from time to time, but has always been upheld by the superior Courts.

The power of imposing conditions was implied in the powers given of selection and withdrawal, and the justices at any time or place could make renewal conditional on closing at nine in the evening; on having no music, dancing, &c.; or on any requirement they might think fit to impose. From 1587 to 1631 the Privy Council kept the magistrates up to the mark, and the law was carried out thus :—

The Mayor and Aldermen of Ripon (Yorks) report to the Privy Council in 1623 that, in pursuance of the directions received, they have made inquiry as to the number of ale-houses in the town, and "finding the number to be great we have reduced them to half the number."

This salutary supervision of the Privy Council was suddenly broken by the outbreak of the Civil War, and from the end of the seventeenth century, a period of laxness in administration set in. Parliament, in need of money, passed liquor laws more calculated to improve the Exchequer than the manners and morals of the people, and all in vain did the House of Lords and the bishops plead on behalf of the people's health and morality. The pandemonium of drunkenness that followed has been described by Smollett and other eye-witnesses. Mr. and Mrs. Webb say :—

These incessant and revolutionary interferences by Parliament with the regulation of the liquor traffic between 1690 and 1743 absolve, we think, the Justices of the Peace from any considerable responsibility for the outburst of bestial drunkenness and brutal disorder that characterised the first decades of the eighteenth century. But it is clear that neither in London nor in the country did they show any zeal or efficiency in exercising the powers which they possessed.

Gradually, reforms became necessary, and in 1753 a law was passed requiring every applicant for a licence, except in corporate towns, to support his application by a certificate of personal character. From this date they had in their uncontrolled discretion to grant or refuse a licence, and otherwise to restrict the traffic.

The consumption of spirits, which had been 7,049,822 gallons in 1551, fell to 1,849,370 in 1758, and remained about that till 1780–85, when it dropped a little under a heavy war tax, and then suddenly bounded up in 1785 on reduction of the duty, till it was almost double its accustomed amount. Such was the condition of affairs when the West Riding justices took action in 1786, and the royal proclamation of 1787 (sent by the Home Secretary to every bench of magistrates), set going a great national movement of reform. Mr. and Mrs. Webb say :—

Throughout the next two or three years we find recorded in every provincial newspaper from one end of the kingdom to the other the repeated discussions and elaborate resolutions of the county justices as to the evils which neglect had produced, and the way to remedy them. Each county recognised that too many ale-houses had been licensed. . . . But in many counties the justices went much further, and prescribed for themselves in Brewster Sessions rules of action, and for the publicans conditions of licensing, which not only revived the "Articles" enforced by the justices under James I. but even anticipated nearly all the suggestions of modern temperance reformers.

In Newcastle the ale-house keepers were given a printed copy of the rules for their guidance, together with a printed copy of His Majesty's proclamation. Both were ordered to be hung up in his house, and the licences were declared to be void "upon breach of any one of the printed rules so delivered," when the recognisances were also to be estreated.

The Gloucester justices required the applicant's certificate to be in all cases signed by the clergyman and principal inhabitants of the parish, directing that it was to be signed "at a vestry to be called for that purpose with proper notice." That the consent of the principal inhabitants in vestry assembled became during the next two decades a necessary condition of the granting of new licences in many counties is proved by the vestry records.

In the parish of Pitchcombe, the principal inhabitants presented a petition to the justices, stating that their poor rates had risen from two shillings in the pound to eight shillings since two ale-houses had been opened, as the people spent their money in them, and left their families to be supported by the parish. "Upon this representation the justices repressed both ale-houses." In the parish of Horsley, they reduced ten licences to three straight away.

The rapidly growing town of Sheffield, with a rough and turbulent population of cutlers, file-makers, and miners, had suffered specially by the multiplication of "dram shops," which, like those of London, sold large quantities of cheap gin and other spirits. The magistrates acting for that division of West Riding began by closing them on Sundays, and three months later took the strong step of suppressing them all at one fell swoop (June, 1787).

At Plymouth Dock (now Devonport), then the largest town in the West of England, the justices reduced the licences from over 200 to 100.

How energetically and how long the various county benches carried out this policy of restriction and regulation started in 1786-87 we cannot exactly discover. . . . From 1816 to 1830 the complaints against them are principally that they refuse new licences or arbitrarily withdraw old ones. . . .

The effect of the movement can, however, most clearly be seen in the number of houses where spirits were sold, of which accurate statistics exist. In spite of the rapid growth of population and its aggregation in new centres, the total number of publicans' spirit licences in England and Wales fell steadily till 1799.

For further particulars, and for the interesting chapter on Free Trade in liquor-selling which followed, readers are referred to the book itself, trusting enough has been given to make them at once procure it and study for themselves this suggestive period. The following extract is from the concluding page :—

It never occurred to the justices of the eighteenth century to bargain with a brewer for the surrender of two or three existing licences in return for one new one, because, as we have seen, it never entered their heads, or those of the lawyers of the time, that there could be any question of compensation. And it is only within the last few years that the licensing benches of the present generation have plucked up courage to exercise the discretion which their predecessors under George the Third used so freely, in suppressing licensed houses which were unnecessary for the supply of the legitimate wants of the neighbourhood.

"CHRIST," some one says, "was human as we are."
"Well, then, for Christ," thou answerest, "who can care?"
So answerest thou; but why not rather say,
"Was Christ a man like us? Ah, let us try
If we then, too, can be such men as he!"

RATIONALISM AND DEVOTION.

SIR,—The letter which my friend Mr. J. H. Wicksteed superscribes, "Attendances at our London Churches," is really concerned with a much wider and deeper subject. He asks once more the question which was propounded (apparently to little purpose) in your columns three years ago—is there some fatal incompatibility between reason and devotion? Is it impossible for a church to be at once rational and worshipful? Mr. Wicksteed replies to this question with a hopeful negative, but admits that we can hardly claim to have brought into harmony, in our own common worship, the two impulses of soul which make for sober truth and fervent devotion. His letter proceeds to indicate a cause and to suggest a remedy for our state. I agree with his diagnosis, but cannot, without further question, accept his prescription.

What do we mean by devotion? I think we mean a great and secure joy, such as springs from an unperplexed assurance of the use and worth of our modes of worship. It is not unknown to us, but we feel that we are missing the fulness which is somehow possible, and missing even the degree of it which blesses other churches. Why?

Because we are not at ease in the form and language of our worship. We cannot get it out. We feel like those who grope after a word which will not come because it is not yet in the language. We play with old phrases, old shapes of thought, in such a way as to bring out of them something new; but they were formed to express the old, and are, for us, irresponsive and defective. Like the solo player on the bass fiddle, we depend on harmonics for our effect. For direct and unconstrained utterance we need another instrument, not yet invented, or at least not yet perfect. All this is true, though I do not feel that it is the whole truth. There are other aspects, much less discouraging, of the same facts. But the constraint is real and often depressing.

To mend our case Mr. Wicksteed proposes that we should abandon Theology for Physics—cease to pursue the "great ancient and mediæval thought of God," and dwell instead on "the thought of that mysterious but all-conditioning presence we call Nature." Like Isaiah, he is very bold, and I rejoice in his boldness; but the more I linger over his earnest exposition, the less needful, even from his own point of view, does the change which he urges appear to be. For the Nature to which we are to turn is not a mere multitude of things, but a universe, implying therefore some principle of unity; not the nature of the chemist, but of the poet; not nature impersonal, but "a Presence in nature . . . which springs from our own native and inevitable motions of the spirit." And how does Mr. Wicksteed commend this conception to our soul? "Our relation therewith," he writes, "is as to a Divine incarnation." It is to be cherished because it is God-like. And is it then to supplant the very idea which sanctions it? Surely Mr. Wicksteed is vindicating the thought of God at the moment when he assumes to reject it. He reads the Divine Idea into Nature in order to make God superfluous. "When me they fly, I am the wings."

In one place your correspondent distinguishes man from Nature. We have not, we must gain, "the infinite calm which Nature never loses." Yet again, faithful to his Wordsworth, he recognises an abode in the mind of man for that Presence which deifies Nature. It is a Presence, then, which not only makes "the glory of the sum of things," but also dwells in our sense of that glory, and links Nature to man. Has this Presence no need, in human speech, of a name? And why may we not, like our fathers, name the name of God?

I hold with Mr. Wicksteed that all the doctrines of the Christian Church (and all that have ever won and held men in equal measure) are vitally significant. Most significant of all, then, the one fundamental doctrine that underlies and informs all phases of Christianity, the doctrine of the existence of God. We are not bound to imagine Him in our likeness, or to accept ancient guesses at His nature. "He" and "Him" may be to us but modes of speech, carrying no human outline in which to imprison Him. But if we exclude from Nature everything that we mean by the name of God, what peace, alas! shall we find in Nature then?

Faith will always transcend, always overload the terms and forms in which it seeks to express itself. Our present uneasiness is the measure of the transcendency of our faith. But let us not cease to strive, and we shall work out, at length, a mode of worship less unworthy, and gain the joy we need—and perhaps the crowd. E. W. LUMMIS.

A MODERN HERMIT.

SIR,—Till a week ago there dwelt at the top of the hill named after one Thomas (not the Apostle, but the turbulent Prelate Beckett), just beyond the northern boundary of Kent's old capital, in a cottage which once was part of a disestablished toll-house, an ancient man, quite alone since his wife died nearly eleven years ago, with neither child nor nephew, dog nor cat whose life was spent with study and writing, varied by a daily forenoon walk of an hour toward the sea, and an afternoon walk into the city to find mental food at one of the two libraries there. This man's name was John Vickers, some of whose books are known at least by name to most of your readers. "The New Koran" and "The Book of Banda" are didactic books, after the "More's Utopia" type. "The Real Jesus" is one of so many attempts to pourtray the well-known, yet so really little known, life of the Holy Founder. "The History of Herod" is what he calls it, "Another look at a man emerging from twenty centuries of Calumny" (by the by, when he wrote the book in 1885, Herod had not been dead nineteen centuries), besides many fugitive articles.

He was born at a farm at Waltham in March, 1826, and when old and strong enough he helped his father to drag a livelihood out of a stony soil; his evenings were spent in self-improvement, and as about the time when he knew enough National schools were beginning to dot the country, he readily got a post at Haverford West, near the Welsh Landsend. There he married, and spent the middle of his life, till, rather over twenty years ago, he retired on his moderate savings, and came with his wife into this neighbourhood.

Meanwhile he had become a really good scholar, reading Latin easily, and having studied history and its many allied subjects—political economy, sociology, and, above all, theology. The result of which study was that he had ejected from his system the whole of the traditional Aberglaube (superstition) of his youth, and was happy in calling himself a Theist. In other respects his views had undergone but little change, he remained Conservative in politics, and was dead against Socialism, whether Christian or otherwise.

Very few knew him for anything but a poor man in a small house; indeed, I had known him a few years when I saw one of his works in another county, and heard that he lived within a mile of my own house. He seemed sorry that I had discovered his secret, though afterwards we had many a long talk on the matter.

He had called me in to see him, being unwell, on the 9th, and next day I visited him on my way to chapel, and found him better, but on Monday, the 11th, after knocking at his door, and having no reply, I looked in at the window, and saw him sitting in his chair quite dead. Medical opinion and that of the police was that he died the previous afternoon—he had been seen out of doors at 4 p.m., immediately after his return home.

It was a beautiful death, and one which probably saved him much suffering, as his heart was weak, and he had other ailments. CYRIL A. GREAVES.

HERTFORD COLLEGE, OXFORD.

SIR,—In last week's issue of THE INQUIRER you made mention of "Hertford College, whose members must be Churchmen."

To those unacquainted with the actual facts such a statement might be quite misleading, inasmuch as, in reality, there is no necessity whatever for the members of Hertford College to be Churchmen at all, and exhibitions from the College funds have been, to my knowledge, given to dissenters. Only the fellowships and most important scholarships are confined to Churchmen. S. A. MELLOR.

Feb. 1, 1904.

[Our statement that the members of Hertford College must be Churchmen was literally accurate. Commoners, even if exhibitions have been granted them by the College, are not members, though sometimes colloquially so called. The Hertford scholarships are of exceptional value, and the exclusion of Dissenters from their enjoyment is a real hardship.—ED. INQ.]

DR. WARSCHAUER AND "NUNQUAM."

SIR,—Permit me to enter a brief protest against the tone of Dr. Warschauer's letter in your last issue. To speak of "the cheap Agnosticism of writers like Nunquam" savours rather of the superior person. May I ask why Dr. Warschauer finds it necessary to devote four Sundays to dealing with Nunquam's cheap Agnosticism? Surely intellectual Unitarianism stand in no danger. If "Nunquam" has attacked Christianity in the Clarion, he is now allowing three columns of that paper weekly to be devoted (under a Christian editor) to its defence. I am anxiously waiting to see Dr. Warschauer, or some other capable Unitarian, show the readers of the Clarion wherein "Nunquam" is wrong. Many who, like myself, attend Unitarian places of worship are readers of that paper. F. E. WILLIS.

Torquay, Jan. 30, 1904.

THE proposed employment of Chinese labour in the Transvaal will be the principal subject dealt with at the annual meeting of the Aborigines Protection Society, to be held at Caxton Hall, Westminster, on Tuesday, Feb. 9, at 7.45 p.m., with Sir Brampton Gurdon, M.P., in the chair. The resolution on this question will be moved by Mr. Leonard H. Courtney, and supported by Mr. Bryn Roberts, M.P., and Mr. Richard Bell, M.P. Among others who have promised to speak are Sir Charles W. Dilke, M.P., Mr. Herbert Samuel, M.P., and Mr. Alfred Emmott, M.P., who will chiefly concern themselves with the Congo question.

THE American Ambassador, Mr. Choaté, speaking on Friday last week at a distribution of certificates in the Queen's Hall, added one more touch to the welding into a common sentiment of his country and ours. The occasion, by the by, was the last of its kind to take place under the management of the Technical Education Board, the duties of which are to be merged in the general education work to be undertaken by the new educational authority for London. Mr. Choate, viewing the seven hundred successful candidates before him, suggested what a good thing it would be if the whole of them could be taken off to the United States in return for a similar number brought thence, and each batch finish their school-days in a new country. He said they would certainly soon feel at home, in spite of external novelties, and they would realise the unity of life in the two great English-speaking nations. Speaking of the work of the Technical Education Board in providing a "ladder" from the lowly world of the elementary school to the "heaven" of the university, he declared that in his opinion the money so spent was a most profitable national investment; in fact, no public money was so well expended as the outlay on education. The Ambassador's address was specially directed to the scholars, who ranged from nine or ten to twice the age, and it was a proof of rare oratorical charm that he not only held their attention but repeatedly evoked enthusiastic cheers.

OBITUARY.

MR. W. C. JOLLY, J.P.

OUR churches have again suffered loss in the death of one of their deeply attached members, Mr. William Crucknell Jolly, of Bath, but more recently of Hampstead, which took place on Jan. 22, at Eastbourne.

Mr. Jolly was born on Sept. 17, 1826. His father, Mr. Thomas Jolly, founder of the well-known firm of Jolly & Son, Milsom-street, rose to be very prominent in the public life of the city, one of its aldermen and magistrates, and mayor in 1860 and again in 1868.

In early life Mr. Wm. Jolly joined his father in his business, and helped to advance the firm to the high position it has attained. But important as were his commercial enterprise and success, it was not in them that he gained chief repute. From his youth he shared the interests and convictions of his father, and although he cared less for the conflicts of public life, and was at heart devoted to the quieter pursuits of a cultivated manhood, he was not found wanting, when his help was needed, in public affairs.

In 1874 he entered the City Council, where he did good work in conjunction with his father and his Trim-street friends, Aldermen Charles Moore, Sir Jerom Murch, and John Ricketts.

Mr. William Jolly was always respected in the functions he undertook, but as years passed his influence increased greatly. Not only did he act as chairman of the Cold Water Committee and give continual and successful attention to the important question of providing water for the city, as trustee of civic charities, as governor of King Edward's School, and latterly as magistrate, but his personality was felt in most beneficial schemes that were inaugurated.

A local writer, in a tribute to his memory, remarks:—"He undoubtedly recognised that his business had the first claim upon his time, and in building it up as he did he accomplished no small achievement. . . . When a liberal spirit in the relation of employers to employed was not so general as it is to-day, Mr. Wm. Jolly was invariably spoken of in circles where no flattery was indulged in as a model employer. . . . He exercised all the influence he possessed as a large ratepayer in inducing the best men that could be found to become candidates, and held the most enlightened views as to the duties and responsibilities of the Council."

In wider politics he took a profound interest. He was a lifelong Liberal of the broadest and most reflective type. When he entered the arena, the loss of old and tried friends began to cast a grave responsibility upon those who remained, and the division in the ranks of the party, following midway in his career, threw a heavy burden upon his shoulders, which he bore with a full sense of its obligation, with courage and uprightness, winning the regard of all, as his adversaries are laudably willing to testify. One who differed from him politically writes: "He displayed an energy and an optimism when the political horizon was, from his point of view, clouded, which were at once an inspiration to his political friends, and the admiration of many of his opponents."

In succession he filled various offices, until ultimately he became the leader of his party, many members of which would have rejoiced to see him stand as candidate for the representation of the city in Parliament.

During many years no movement for the welfare of any class of the people was commenced without his earnest sympathy, whether for the diffusion of education, the cultivation of art, or the spread of philanthropy.

Mr. Jolly was a man of principle, who judged and weighed what was submitted to him, and who, when convinced, would stand his ground fearlessly. Naturally, therefore, he continued a firm supporter of his religion. Week by week he was found in his place of worship, proving a help to those who gathered with him by his steadfastness. During one of the most active periods of his public career, when failing health compelled Mr. Wm. Butcher to relinquish the treasurership of the Western Union, he generously undertook the office, and did good service to the congregations in the district.

Mr. Jolly was one of the band of men who have carried their religious principles into public life, and have won for our churches, if not honour for theological correctness, at any rate a repute more dearly prized—that of regard for mankind. Generous and thoughtful, where the first claim lay, to his own workpeople, he evinced the same qualities in his relation to the world at large. It is wonderful to realise how much a community owes to one mind. For years the stamp of his old friend, Sir Jerom Murch, was found on all that was best in the enterprise of his city. And then later, from his room in Milsom-street, Mr. Jolly exercised an influence which, though often unseen, was far-reaching. As such men pass away we ask, in sorrow, who shall fill their place?

Alert, kindly, generous in judgment, willing to take infinite pains, watchful for ideas in any quarter likely to help the locality or the nation, rejoicing in every victory of right, he lived a strenuous life, and when in his declining years blindness threatened he met the trial with unabated courage.

His loss will be felt by a very wide circle, and all who knew him will have deep sympathy with Mrs. Jolly and his family in their sore bereavement.

The interment took place on Wednesday, January 27, at the cemetery belonging to Trim-street Chapel, in Lyncombe Vale. Previously a service was held in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. J. McDowell and the Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., which was attended by the Mayor and Corporation and a large body of representative citizens. Mr. Gow delivered an address full of sympathy and warm appreciation of Mr. Jolly's work and his noble and lovable character.

On Sunday a memorial service was conducted by the Rev. J. McDowell in Trim-street Chapel. F. W. S.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE CHIMNEY.

THE other morning, when I got up and looked out of the window, I saw a lovely, pale, clear sky, with the great planet Jupiter shining in it, bright as on a winter night. The white frost lay on the roofs and the grass, where two blackbirds hopped about dolefully. But the beautiful thing was this lucid, cloudless sky. And up into this clear sky was rising straight, like a column, a wreath of smoke from a neighbour's chimney. As it rose it grew thinner and fainter till it melted in the clearness above.

In a few minutes another column of smoke began to rise, and then another, and another. Everybody was lighting fires. In an hour all the purity and brightness of the morning was gone. The sun rose, but he looked dim through the thick air, which grew thicker and darker as the day went on, and the chimneys sent out more smoke.

You know what such days are like when the fog, loaded with smoke, hangs over us, and settles denser and darker. It fills the houses. In large towns it sometimes stops the traffic. You can hardly find your way if you venture out. The street lamps themselves are swallowed up by the gloom.

This heavy pall of darkness—what is it? what makes it? Why, it is our own smoke; the smoke from these thousands of chimneys, that in certain states of the air doesn't pass off; but stays, and settles, and blinds, and chokes us. The tiny specks of soot, of something not quite burned up by the fire, are carried up into the air, and by and by they fall down again, on the grass, the leaves, the flowers; on curtains, and papers, and furniture. In a great town, every year tons and tons of soot are sent up into the air, and it all falls again, somewhere.

Is there any way to get rid of this blackness and foulness? Yes, certainly. If only each household would burn its own smoke! then our air would be clean, what we touch would be clean. This black soot itself would, in burning, be turned into more heat and light. And some day I believe this will be done.

But there are some smokes worse than coal smoke. Life itself is a kind of fire. Living is just this falling into the furnace of our nature, of the impressions we get from everything about us, and the burning these, that is, the changing them into the feelings and the doings of every day. These impressions are the fuel of our minds.

Now this fire of living makes its smoke. We don't burn up thoroughly everything that falls into our minds. Some we burn, the rest goes up the chimney. The better use we make of this fuel that feeds our life, the less smoke we make; and the poorer use we make of it, the more smoke we make, till sometimes we become nothing but smoky chimneys ourselves, sending up streams of black and bitter vapour into the air, for others to breathe.

There is, for instance, the smoke of complaint. I suppose all of us, even the youngest, have found out that we don't get everything we want here. Our wants are often unreasonable, but even if they were reasonable, we can't always have them. Some of us accept this. But some of us dwell and dwell on what we haven't got, or can't get, till we feel the most ill-used and unhappy of boys or girls, grow jealous of everyone who, as it seems to us, is more successful, grow peevish and fretful, fill the air with our complainings. And we pour this black discontent all round us. No one can shake off the gloom shed on all sides by our fault-finding, complaining disposition.

There is the smoke of ill-temper. Perhaps you know what it is to get up feeling cross. You take offence at the least thing—at what in another mood you wouldn't notice. Everything is wrong. Nobody is good-natured. You quarrel with someone before breakfast is over. You say what hurts, or exasperates, till by and by everyone of the family is sucked into this black cloud of irritation and jangle.

No doubt in time this cloud is blown away; but just think what it is to thus nurse one's grudges, one's vexations, to be sending them out to settle and injure, one knows not where, but most likely those near and dear to us! Surely this is a smoke none of us would like to send out.

There is the smoke of Worry—and the smoke of Fuss—and the smoke of Vanity—all disagreeable smokes enough—and think how much of these smokes is rising into the air of life daily from the thoughts and feelings and doings of men. We are each, perhaps, sending up our little column of bad temper, cross words, selfish desires, jealousy, fretfulness, suspicion, to darken the world. Sending up, I said. But we may be sure of one thing. This smoke all falls again, and settles somewhere.

There is only one way of curing this. We must each learn to burn our own smoke.

To think before the cross or the unkind word escapes us, and stop it before it starts on its course, to watch our own hearts, and if we find ill-will, or anger, or jealousy there, to stamp it out, before it spreads and darkens our minds; that is burning our own smoke. We all have some smoke to consume; some of us, it is true, more than others, and these have to try harder, that is all. For when all is said, each of us must burn his own. The lesson of self-control, how to make our own temper, and our own words, and our own acts, sun-clear, light-bringing, cheerful, brave, so that they send out brightness instead of gloom, make living easier for others, instead of harder, we must each learn and practise for ourselves. And in practising it we are lessening, though it be by a little, the great cloud of misunderstanding, ill-will, complaint, that overhangs the world. C. A. F.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 6, 1904.

JOSEPH PRIESTLEY.

Born March 13, 1733. Died Feb. 6, 1804.

THE memory of Dr. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY is rightly held in honour by his fellow-countrymen, as that of a distinguished man of science and a fearless and devoted servant of the truth. By English Unitarians, for many years after his death, he was regarded with special reverence and gratitude, as the indomitable champion of their faith, the most illustrious leader of their protest against the "corruptions of Christianity," the more deeply revered because of what he suffered, in a spirit so beautiful, for the cause of truth and of humanity.

And while now "the Unitarianism of PRIESTLEY and BELSHAM" is a matter of somewhat remote historical interest, the tradition of fidelity to principle is a living thing, and it is well for us to recall the story of PRIESTLEY'S life. We are greatly indebted to the Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, the present occupant of PRIESTLEY'S pulpit at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, for the series of articles, concluded in our present issue, tracing the progress of his manifold activities and picturing the spirit of his life. This week's celebrations of the centenary of PRIESTLEY'S death will doubtless serve still further to impress upon us the significance of his work, and to revive the grateful memories which were so much to our fathers in the faith.

It must, indeed, be frankly confessed that the religious philosophy of Dr. PRIESTLEY does not belong to present-day Unitarianism; for the inspiration of our religious life we look to other teachers. After the famous Liverpool Unitarian Controversy of 1839, CHANNING wrote to MARTINEAU with warm thanks for one of his lectures, and with special delight at his protest against the doctrine of philosophical necessity. "I have felt," he said, "that that doctrine, with its natural connections, was a millstone round the neck of Unitarianism in England. . . . I have always lamented that Dr. PRIESTLEY'S authority has fastened this doctrine on his followers." And how great was the change of standpoint is still more emphatically marked by a letter written in 1855 by the Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER to his friend JOHN HAMILTON THOM:—

"With the profoundest respect for the character, the upright intentions, and devout belief of PRIESTLEY himself, I must say deliberately that I know no form of religious philosophy with which I have less sympathy, towards which I feel a more utter distaste and alienation than his, and I think its intimate association, with the earliest enunciation of Unitarianism in this country has been very disastrous to the religious influence of that system, and had not Dr. CHANNING and the American school come to the rescue, must have ultimately led to its extinction as a form of religion altogether."

It was not only "CHANNING and the American school" that came to the rescue, but TAYLER himself, and MARTINEAU and THOM, at one time the heretics of English Unitarianism, now revered as the quickeners of its deeper religious life, the prophets of a new spiritual faith.

While, however, they followed CHANNING in a radical departure from PRIESTLEY'S methods of thought, they were among the warmest admirers of his transparent virtues and the most grateful commemorators of his faithful testimony.

Thus Mr. TAYLER, in his "Retrospect of Religious Life in England," having spoken of the influence of the philosophy of LOCKE and HARTLEY on the religious thought of the eighteenth century, and its result in PRIESTLEY'S teaching, adds this tribute to his character:—

"In common with many who hold the distinguishing tenet of Dr. PRIESTLEY'S theology, the simple unity of the great Being who is revealed to us in the Gospel as our Father, I am unable to accept as alone conclusive, the grounds on which he placed the divine authority of Christianity; nor can I persuade myself, that he either fully embraced its whole design, or rightly apprehended its relation to the human mind and to the expectations excited in us by the constitution and visible tendencies of the Universe. Yet it must not be imagined, that this expression of dissent from some of his views implies any insensibility to the magnitude of his services in the cause of religious truth, or to the great and heroic qualities of his character. It is a strange fallacy to assume that we must agree in all things with those whom we most profoundly revere as men. In steadfastness of Christian principle, in ardour for truth, in purity of life and simplicity of purpose, and in genuine magnanimity and disinterestedness of spirit, Dr. PRIESTLEY stands pre eminent, and almost without a rival, among the philosophers and men of science whose names shed such a lustre on the close of the eighteenth century. His opinions on some points may be considered as a natural result and expression of the times in which he lived—supplying a link in that chain of connected thought which binds together with a mysterious affinity the successive generations of civilised men. This place was assigned him by Providence. It is his highest praise to have filled it nobly—to have lived for what he believed to be truth, and to have sacrificed wealth and ease and worldly reputation in its defence and pursuit."

And Dr. MARTINEAU in the early Monthly Repository article, reprinted in the first volume of his Collected Essays, thus characterises the teacher from whom he had learnt so much, and whom he did not cease to honour after he had departed absolutely from his school:—

"Were we to designate Dr. PRIESTLEY in one word, that word would be "truth;" it would correctly describe the employment of his intellect, the essential feeling of his heart, the first axiom of his morality, and even the impression of his outward deportment. He had none of that reckless sportiveness which makes playthings of opinions, and, for an hour's amusement, looks in at them, and turns them about, like the beads of a kaleidoscope, watching what fantastical shapes they may be made to assume. He had no sympathy with the sceptical philosophy which sees nothing but error in all human speculation, nothing but "sick men's dreams" in the mutations of opinion. That there is such a thing as truth, that it is not placed beyond the reach of the human understanding, and that, when found, it is necessarily a pure good, were the first principles of his faith; principles which he did not promulgate in their general form, and then reject in their applications, but carried out, boldly and without reserve, into every topic which invited his research.

"The spirit of freedom and of faith which conducted him through his private inquiries he carried out into the publication of their results. Ingenuous to himself, he was equally ingenuous to the world. He saw through the contemptible fallacies by which worldliness and imbecility would defend the suppression of opinions; ease, popularity, sectarian prosperity he held to be baubles compared with the duty of individual thought and speech, and sins if purchased at its expense."

Such was the man whose centenary we now commemorate. PRIESTLEY died in 1804; in 1805 JAMES MARTINEAU was born. Thus next year we shall celebrate another centenary, which, like that of Channing twenty-four years ago, will touch our deepest sympathies and bring us afresh to the springs of our most cherished inspirations. Meanwhile we gratefully recall the memory of JOSEPH PRIESTLEY, and may well gain from him new reverence for truth, and fresh stimulus for fearless courage, patient diligence of service, and earnest convictions of faith.

But violets perfume land and sky,
Although they promise less.

M. LOISY AND ROME.

II.

THE ABBÉ LOISY ON THE DEITY OF CHRIST.

IT was the object of L'Évangile et l'Église to analyse and define the relation which unites the truth of the gospel with that of Catholic Christianity. This relation is expressed in history; a series of steps lead from one to the other; a process of development connects the seed with the tree in which the birds can shelter. M. Loisy did not set out to demonstrate the relative values of either the first or the last term of the process. He constantly declared that he was writing not as theologian but as historian. He was no more concerned to justify the Nicene Creed than to impugn it. But in spite of his warnings and disclaimers, he was really charged with attacking the fundamental doctrine of the Deity of Christ. To the Archbishop of Alby, who is said to be the most intelligent prelate in France, and has not disdained to learn of the late Auguste Sabatier, M. Loisy addresses the fourth letter of Autour d'un petit Livre. It is at once an exposition and a defence. The Archbishop has advised him to explain himself; and to this friendly counsel the ex-Professor responds.

Starting from the well-known passage in Philippians ii. 6, 7, M. Loisy asserts that the apostle Paul conceived, as it were, two Christs; one of faith, "in the form of God," in the radiance of celestial life, the other of history, who appeared on earth as a man, and was made Lord and Christ by being raised from the dead, and exalted at God's right hand. This distinction lay at the base of L'Évangile et l'Église. In that book the author sought to show Jesus as Peter had seen him, and Paul imagined him. When he walked the earth, he wore no robe of deity; the historian, planted on the Gospels, could not anticipate the glory of the future. What the disciples saw was that Jesus went about doing good; what they heard was a call to repentance, a promise that the kingdom of God was at hand, a declaration from Jesus that he was himself the Messiah. Their faith followed him beyond death, and found him again in glory.

These are the facts on which the Gospel is based. Is, then, the Christ of history no longer the same as the Christ of faith? If the one is to be set below the other, it is not the historian's fault, and he ought not to be blamed. Facts are facts, and, if so, the first conclusion to be drawn is that they are not otherwise. Jesus himself on earth lived in the consciousness of his humanity. His teaching, his conduct, the attitude of his disciples, and that of his enemies, everything shows that the Messiah was a man among men, like to them in all save sin, and the secret and indefinable mystery of his relation to God. The question which divided Israel was not "Is Jesus of Nazareth God?" but "Is he the Messiah?" The deity of Christ is a doctrine which was not formulated in the Gospel; it has grown in the Christian consciousness. The first witnesses are the Apostle Paul, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Fourth Evangelist. But the doctrine was not clear at the outset, or it would not have had so much trouble to establish itself. We must not be surprised if the consubstantiality of the Father and the Son, defined by the Council of Nicæa, is not to be discerned in the preaching of the kingdom of heaven.

The new faith, however, as it advanced, was exposed to shocks and trials which only called forth its inner strength. The death of Messiah, the entry of the Gospel into the Greek world, the attempt to define his function for Gentile as well as Jew, the endeavour to assign his place in the economy of the universe, and fix his relation to the everlasting God, all involved fresh movements of thought, which led step by step to the decisions of Nicæa, Ephesus, and Chalcedon. These decisions were based in part on the traditional data, and in part on the forms supplied by ancient philosophy. Why is it that the problem which the councils settled has reappeared in our day? It is because the progress of knowledge has changed our conceptions of the world, of history, of man. The statements which were once adequate are felt to be now unsatisfactory, for they were framed in a different age, and based upon different pre-suppositions.

At the outset the revelation of God in Jesus took the form of a Messianic doctrine, because there was no other which would be intelligible at the time. If Jesus had not spoken of the kingdom, if he had talked of union with God in the mystical language of the Fourth Gospel, if he had not declared himself the Messiah, but had offered himself to his Galilean hearers as the incarnate Word, light and life of the world, no one would have understood him, and his disciples would have been the first to abandon him. In the Messiahship M. Loisy finds the ground of all the Christological development. For what did it imply? There was first of all a kind of divine election to this function. Messiah's career on earth involved first the unique predestination of a human being to a unique function. This predestination expressed itself in a relation between God and the man Jesus, mysterious and profound, beyond the power of history to explain. It implied a communication of divine life which issued in a unique perfection of faith, hope, and love. To this the Synoptic narratives bear witness by the symbol of the descent of the Spirit; and this union with the Spirit is the truth which the Fourth Gospel describes as the incarnation of the eternal Word. The substance of the Johannine idea is to be found in his predecessors, and their thought reflects the pyschological consciousness of Jesus. No critic, of course, could allow that Jesus taught in formal terms, and at the same time, the Christologies of Paul and John, or the doctrines of Nicæa, Ephesus, and Chalcedon. But between the consciousness of Jesus and these metaphysical definitions, there is the same sort of difference which exists between the real and the abstract. The definitions were the best that could be given under the circumstances of their age. But to ask whether Jesus during his earthly life was conscious of being the eternal Word, consubstantial with the Father, is useless. It was impossible for his thought as a man to follow the categories supplied by the Fourth Gospel to Christian speculation in the fourth century. The historian will admit that Jesus gave no such teaching about his person. The believer, however, will add that the ecclesiastical definition is none the less appropriate to the object defined. The consciousness which Jesus had of his union with God is above all definition. It is sufficient to assert that so far as we can apprehend it, the expression which he gave of it himself is substantially equivalent to the ecclesiastical definition.

For M. Loisy, accordingly, all hangs on the implications of the Messiahship. He does not consider the view of those critics who deny that Jesus ever accepted the title, nor does he deal with the position that it was an element of Jewish expectation which he employed, because he could not help it, but which did not correspond to anything real in the larger sequences of human history. M. Loisy seems to hold at the same time that it was temporary and inadequate, and that it was a fore-ordained instrument for expressing an inner and divine mystery. Of that mystery, apart from the Messiahship, he shows us no trace, and the germ required for the subsequent development is not visible to those who see no choice of heaven in the character for which Jesus suffered. Nor can they admit his second position, that the development really added nothing to the original, but only sought to define and explain it. That view would be more defensible, were the statements of the Fourth Gospel admitted as historical. With its rejection, the link of connection between Jesus of Nazareth and the Word that is consubstantial with the Father disappears. The doctrine of the hypostatic union cannot be applied to the Synoptic biographies.

No one, in fact, sees this or affirms it more clearly than M. Loisy himself. The trenchant criticism on the theory of Christ's infallible knowledge (p. 139) will not commend his book to theologians of the older type. They will resent his suggestion that if Christ, as man, possessed divine knowledge, he deliberately abandoned his disciples and posterity to ignorance and error on a number of things which he could have revealed without the smallest inconvenience. And they will refuse to ask whether such knowledge could be realised in a human brain, or is compatible with the circumstances of our present existence, and the implications of our moral life. Into modern conceptions of Kenosis M. Loisy does not enter. But he lays it down that just as the teachings of Jesus were conditioned by contemporary conceptions of the world and God, so the structures of dogma, also, are relative to their age, and depend on the metaphysical systems in which they are formed. When these change, when the whole scene of the intellectual life has been transformed, the modes of conceiving the facts of the spiritual life demand similar re-interpretation. The theological conception of Christ, with two distinct minds and wills, two consciousnesses, one laid over the other, yet with mutual interpenetration, the human consciousness subordinated to the divine, and the man Christ conscious of being at the same time God—such a construction can no longer be harmonised with history. When Jesus asked, "Why callest thou me good?" and added, "Only God is good"; when he prayed, "Father, not my will but Thine be done," the natural meaning of his words cannot be brought into any connection with the theory. The Fourth Gospel ascribes to him no such language.

And yet M. Loisy clings to the affirmation, that for experience Christ is God. But he hints in no obscure terms that we must restate our conception of God. The doctrine of personality has undergone modifications which render it no longer suitable for our theological vocabulary. The term may be retained as a symbol of the divine perfection, and the essential distinction between God and the world of our knowledge. But this is quite different from what we mean by calling a human being personal. The presentation of modern psychology is altogether unlike the metaphysical and abstract notion of theology. The truth is that this notion was founded on the idea of the divine transcendance. On the one hand was God, absolute and unchanging; on the other, this finite scene where everything is in flux. Between these two an intermediate agency was indispensable; only through the instrumentality of the Word could God act upon the world and man. Such mediation is no longer needed by modern philosophy, which tends more and more to the idea of the divine immanence. In its light the past conceptions of creation, revelation, the moral nature of man, and the process of redemption, are undergoing profound and subtle transformations. To their influence religious tradition is of necessity submitted; and the old definitions of the person of Christ must give way to new. Ecclesiastical theology has been met by a vulgar rationalism, which, to a purely transcendent God opposed a purely human Christ. It was a fatal contrast. Cannot the Church extricate itself from the difficulties pressing on so many devout souls by laying aside its traditional formulæ, and stating the mystery in the terms of modern thought?

It is a brave proposal, for it involves the admission that the decrees of the Church are not final, and can be revised from age to age. But before he can get his Church to consider it, M. Loisy will have to face a further question. This mystery of the immanence of God in Christ, is it not the mystery of humanity itself? In what sense can Jesus be separated from the rest of his race? Must not the incarnation be treated as a universal, not an individual fact? And, on this basis, what will become of the cultus with its priesthood and sacraments? Will M. Loisy re-write the canon of the Mass? The application of criticism to the facts of Gospel history cannot stop there. "The first condition of scientific labour," he justly says, "is freedom." Tradition and the Church on the one hand, liberty and truth on the other! There are ugly rumours of submission flying about. Let us pray that M. Loisy may have wisdom to choose aright.

Of the interesting symposium in the January number of the Hibbert Journal on "The Alleged Indifference of Laymen to Religion," we spoke in a leading article on Jan. 9. In the remaining contents of this number there is nothing quite so popular in its appeal as that, but while erudition finds abundant scope there are also several articles which may well hold the serious attention of the general reader.

Mr. H. C. Corrance writes on "Progressive Catholicism and High Church Absolutism," showing the stronger and more logical position of the Roman Church, as he interprets it, and contrasting the position of the Abbé Loisy and Professor Harnack. "It was Lammenais," he says, "who first taught that the real authoritative basis of Catholicism was the broad one of Humanity. It remained for Loisy to develop this thesis and to throw it out in bold relief by exposing the contingent and transitory nature of the theological and philosophical scaffolding, which had long been supposed to be the chief supports of that system." Harnack and Loisy, representing Liberal Protestantism and Progressive Catholicism, are agreed in holding the Catholic dogmatic system to be the result of historical process; but while the Protestant looks upon the Catholic system as accretion separable from the kernel which constitutes the real Gospel, the Catholic, Mr. Corrance urges, has a broader and truer view:—

> Loisy, on the other hand, sees rather that in it (the Catholic system) ideas common to humanity have been permanently fused with the spirit of Christianity, albeit through the medium of a relative and passing philosophy. He sees, further that, while it has stamped them with its own character, they have added to it the authority which comes from their extension and antiquity. Christianity has thus in Catholicism summed up in itself the religions of the world, imbuing them with its own peculiar spirit, and may thus rightly be termed the religion of Humanity, possessing the authoritative force of a world-wide revelation. It is the summary of the religious consciousness of mankind.

That is a fine ideal of what Catholicism ought to be. The trouble is when we look at the actual teaching and religious life which is included in the "Catholic Church," and set it side by side with the teaching and the religious life in other churches. What the ideal of the Progressive Catholic points to is something immeasurably greater and more inclusive, more truly human and profoundly spiritual than anything achieved or promised by his particular Church, and something altogether incompatible with its exclusive claims. In holding an ideal of true Catholicism, he may be nearer to the ultra heretic than he imagines, and we, too, may look forward together and work for the same great end.

Three articles in this number on different aspects of the philosophy of religion we have found specially attractive, Dr. W. P. Montague's article on "The Evidence of Design in the Elements and Structure of the Cosmos," with that by the Rev. J. H. Beibitz, of Lichfield, furnishing what we take to be a wholesome corrective to Mr. Edward Carpenter on "The Gods as Embodiments of the Race-Memory."

Dr. Montague, who is a Lecturer in Philosophy in Columbia University, New York, writes very suggestively of our relation to the immanent God and the purpose of our life in the universe. His conclusion we will quote:—

> In so far as through our substantial relation to God we are related to our fellows as things, we are members of the natural order, while in so far as through these natural relations to our fellows we become again related to God as conscious of Him, we are members of the order of meanings; and hence are also again related to our fellows, not as things, but as persons. To bring about, by our free will, a harmony of these orders, to incarnate, in the particular life that God gives us through nature, the ideals which He gives us through consciousness, is our reason for being.

M. Beibitz, Vice-Principal of Lichfield Theological College, follows with a brief statement as to the real grounds of belief in God, showing how the old idea that it is the exceptional, and what were regarded as the miraculous occurrences in the world which witness to the Divine presence and activity, must be abandoned for a recognition of the constant presence and purpose of God in the whole order of nature. This truth of the Divine immanence in natural causation, as in human history, he finds expressed in the doctrine of the Logos, "the one synthesis of all the conflicting views of an age of intellectual unrest, the one reconciliation of all oppositions inherent in human thought, the one foundation of a true Christian philosophy."

Mr. Carpenter's article is of great interest, and if it were concerned simply with tracing the origin of the forms of thought under which man has pictured his conception of the Divine, we should not have made the above suggestion of the need of a corrective. But so far as we can gather from this article Mr. Carpenter looks upon "humanity" as standing alone, dependent on no higher power, evolving out of its own powers and faculties fictitious deities, whose only reality is as an embodiment of race-memory. To us this appears a preposterous conception, since all the higher aspirations of the race must rest not in reminiscence of itself, but in the reality of the One Supreme Power of the Universe, apart from whom there could be no race at all.

There are four other substantive articles in this number—Dr. Farnell's study of "Sacrificial Communion in Greek Religion," a second article by Professor Bacon of Yale on "The Johannine Problem," the conclusion of the Rev. James Moffatt's "Zoroastrianism and Primitive Christianity," and an article by Miss Alice Gardner on "Some Theological Aspects of the Iconoclastic Controversy."

Among the discussions which add so much to the interest of the Hibbert Journal, we find a comment by Professor Cheyne on Mr. Travers Herford's review of the Old Testament sections of the Encyclopædia Biblica, and others on Mr. Beeby's attitude towards the doctrine of the Miraculous Birth and the Liberal Catholic movement in England. The reviews are valuable and varied as in previous numbers.

"THE REFUTATION OF IDEALISM."

THERE have been several indications of late that the theory of the universe called Absolute Idealism, or Hegelianism, is losing its hold on thoughtful minds. Even in Oxford it does not now call forth a tithe of the interest and enthusiasm which it kindled a quarter of a century ago. When it was first introduced into this country it appeared to meet both a philosophical and a religious need. On the one hand, it furnished a conception of nature which satisfied scientists because it allowed of no disturbing divine interposition in the course of natural evolution; and, on the other hand, it charmed the theologians because it seemed to give a rationale of the incarnation of God in man, and to bring the divine and the human into intimate and, indeed, inseparable union. But its real nature is now better understood. It is now seen that instead of man's communion with, and co-working with, the indwelling Father, it really teaches that the human soul is a limited and transient mode of God's eternal life, and is, therefore, intrinsically incapable of standing in personal relations with a God who is essentially identical with itself. It is also seen that Hegelian "freedom" is only determinism or fatalism in disguise; that according to it all particular sins and crimes are simply inevitable features in that process of "divine necessity" which evolves all physical and psychical existences. Hence it is not surprising that the religious enthusiasm which the imperfectly understood Hegelianism once evoked has now quite cooled down; for the religious world has discovered that it is wholly incompatible with the actual experiences of self-condemnation, repentance, and reconciliation with God.

But though Absolute Idealism has almost entirely lost its hold on the pulpits, it has still a powerful representation in the universities, and few influential academic teachers have ventured to call in question its fundamental principles. Hence it is a matter of some significance that there appears in the October number of Mind an article from the pen of a prominent member of the University of Cambridge, Mr. G. E. Moore, of Trinity College, which bears the somewhat defiant title, "The Refutation of Idealism." As the idealist version of the cosmos has such intimate relations with the philosophy of religion, it seems worth while to attempt a brief description of the line of thought pursued in this controversial paper. Such a description must necessarily be inadequate and perhaps not wholly correct, but it will serve its purpose if it stimulates interest and curiosity, and impels some philosophical readers to make first-hand acquaintance with Mr. Moore's elaborate and original attack upon a theory which is the now recognised creed of at least three-fourths of the professors of philosophy in our English and Scotch universities.

At the outset of his paper Mr. Moore is very careful to make it clear that his arguments, even if sound, have not the least tendency to undermine a spiritual reading of the origin and development of the universe. He aims at no more than to show that the main consideration upon which both Berkeleian and Hegelian idealists rely as furnishing a conclusive proof of their theory is utterly devoid of real force, and that, therefore, unless there is some other ground for idealism than that to which its advocates point, this theory must be rejected as an unsupported speculation. Almost all realists, from Dr. Johnson to Dr. Martineau, have been contented with the refutation of idealism which is, in their view, supplied by the experience of the resistance which the external world is constantly making to man's volitional efforts. They, in common with mankind in general, have urged that this experience carries with it the intuitive assurance that some power other than the agent himself limits, and at times counteracts, the muscular movements which the will of the agent is felt to initiate. But this experience, which makes most people realists, is regarded by the academic idealists as wholly inconclusive on the point, and Mr. Moore, accordingly, appeals to these academic idealists by a new line of argument, the conclusiveness of which he thinks, they will be compelled to acknowledge.

The Berkeleian idealist contends that the esse of a thing is its percipi, but the Hegelian idealist asserts that perception alone is inadequate to explain what we mean by a thing's reality, and that the reality should be referred to the fact that the thing is an object of thought and not merely of perception. Both, however, agree in maintaining that the thing is real because, and only because, it is present as an inseparable feature in personal experience. "Now," says Mr. Moore, "my paper undertakes to show that what makes a thing real cannot possibly be its presence as an inseparable aspect of a sentient experience."

He establishes this by showing that "a sensation" and "the object of a sensation" are two separable things, and that, therefore, the latter may exist apart from the former. The Hegelian admits that the sensation and its object are distinguishable in thought, but declares that nevertheless they are inseparable, and that, accordingly, the sensation may be said to contain the object. But Mr. Moore makes clear by the analysis of a sensation that the relation between the sensation and its object is quite other than that which the Hegelian supposes it to be:—

> The true analysis of a sensation or idea is as follows: The element which is common to them all, and which I have called 'consciousness,' really is consciousness. A sensation is, in reality, a case of 'knowing' or 'being aware of' or 'experiencing' something. When we know that the sensation of blue exists, the fact that we know is that there exists an awareness of blue. And this awareness is not merely, as we have hitherto seen it must be, itself something distinct and unique, utterly different from blue; it has also a perfectly distinct and unique relation to blue, a relation which is not that of thing or substance to content, nor of one part of content to another part of content. The relation is just that which we mean in every case by "knowing." To have in your mind "knowledge" of blue, is not to have in your mind a "thing" or "image" of which blue is the content.

If "blue" were a part of the contents of the sensation of blue, then the sensation itself would be coloured. The eminent idealist, Mr. F. H. Bradley, declares that such is the case, and goes so far as to say that "the idea of the extended has extension, the idea of the heavy has weight, the idea of the odorous has smell." But surely the common consciousness of mankind repudiates the attribution of these properties to sensation, and endorses Dr. Reid's assertion that "when I press my hand with force against the table I feel the table to be hard, but the hardnesss is in the table, and there is nothing resembling it in the mind." The sensations, therefore, though they are one of the means by which we come to know the objects of nature. are not themselves that which they enable us to know. In enabling us to know the object, the sensation transports us out of the region of our subjectivity.

There is, therefore (says Mr. Moore) no question of how we are "to get outside the circle of our own ideas and sensations." Merely to have a sensation is already to be outside that circle. It is to know something which is as truly and really not a part of my experience, as anything which I can ever know."

Mr. Moore appears to us to have clearly shown that our sensational experience practically always carries with it the assurance of objective reality; but, so far as we can see at present, it does not seem to us certain that we should have the assurance of this objectivity had we not, in addition to our passive sensations, the further experience of felt resistance to our volitional activity. But, be this as it may, there can be no doubt, we think, that the idealist position gives the holder of it no legitimate way of escape from the closed circle of his own individuality. In Mr. Moore's words:—

> If everything, of which the idealist thinks he is aware, is in reality merely a content of his own experience, he has certainly no reason for holding that anything does exist except himself; it will, of course, be possible that other persons do exist; solipsism will not be necessarily true, but he cannot possibly infer from anything he holds that it is not true.

Those who feel interested in this article, of which we have given a very imperfect account, should not fail to read along with it a closely reasoned and most able paper entitled "A Re-statement of Some Features in Kantian Transcendentalism," which was read by Dr. G. Dawes Hicks before the Aristotelian Society in the early part of 1903, and is printed in vol. iii. of the Society's Proceedings. In this striking paper Dr. Hicks appears to go somewhat beyond Mr. Moore's position, for he contends that "mental states are ways in and through which we become aware, and are not themselves objects of which we are aware."

CHARLES B. UPTON.

THE February Seed-Sower is a Priestley Centenary number, printing with illustrations passages from Priestley's Autobiography relating to Nantwich, Warrington, and Leeds, while an article on Priestley in Birmingham is contributed by Mr. Herbert New, while a passage from a memorial discourse by the Rev. Joseph May tells of Priestley at Philadelphia, and his connection with the foundation of the first Unitarian church there. There are other Priestley items in the number, including some notes by Mr. New on Portraits of Dr. Priestley, two of which are reproduced.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

[ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Unitarian Home Missionary College is on the eve of its Jubilee. This interesting event will be celebrated, when it arrives, by the holding of services and meetings and the promotion of a Jubilee Memorial scheme.

The annual meeting of the subscribers to the College was held on Wednesday afternoon, January 27, in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, under the chairmanship of Colonel Pilcher, the President (Mr. John Ward, of Leeds) being unable to be present through illness.

The Committee's annual report, which was read, spoke of "the increasing efficiency and success" of the work which is being carried on. Marked evidence of this is furnished in the gratifying reports made to the Committee by the Visitors to the College. During the session 1902-3 there were seven students on the roll, a decrease of four on the previous year. This year, however, there are eight; three having completed their course last July, and four having been admitted in October. Among the friends of the College who died last year were Lieut.-Colonel Turner, Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., and Alderman Harry Rawson, who was for so many years closely connected with the institution. Resolutions were passed by the Committee, in which they gave expression to their high regard and indebtedness to these gentlemen, and also to their sympathy with their surviving relatives. Though the finances of the year show a small balance, there is unfortunately an accumulation of deficits during the past thirty years, amounting to £2,909.

Colonel PILCHER, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, described the record of the year's work as satisfactory. The College, he said, had rendered enormous services to the denomination, and as the necessity for its existence was now as great or greater than ever before, they might look forward to increasing prosperity and usefulness in the future. He hoped they might see a revival of interest in the College, which would lead to an increase in the number of students and an increase in the income.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. H. P. GREG and carried.

The officers, with Mr. James R. Beard as president, were elected; and two old students, namely, the Revs. J. C. Street and Henry McKean, were included amongst the vice-presidents. A committee was appointed to arrange the details of the Jubilee celebrations. Votes of thanks were accorded to the visitors, examiners, honorary medical officer and oculist, and Mr. G. S. Woolley for services rendered.

PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a public meeting was held.

Mr. JAMES R. BEARD presided, and in his address was reminiscent. He recognised the honour conferred upon him by his election to the presidency for the third time. His qualifications were, a sincere love for the College, and some little knowledge of its affairs. That College was almost as much a child of his father's as he himself was. He remembered the early students coming to his father's house for lectures as well as for social intercourse. In those days the College meetings and soirées were so numerously attended that the old town hall used to be crowded, and late comers could scarcely find a seat. Mr. Beard said he was at present editing some literary remains concerning the early life of the College, which he hoped would be published before the end of the year. He briefly sketched the main develpoments of the institution from May 31, 1854, when at a meeting in Cross-street Chapel-room it was decided to establish the Unitarian Home Missionary Board. In 1889 the name "Board" was changed to "College," and he would not be sorry if a further change of name took place. All ministers should be home missionaries. The present title was distinctive neither of the students' preparation nor of their after career; but that part of it which was distinctive was "Unitarian." The constituency upon which it drew for its various resources was Unitarian, and its aim was to train men for the Unitarian ministry in churches that were broadest of the broad and freest of the free, standing in the open, and always hoping for a more perfect day. It was right that there should be one College whose raison d'être was the training of men for the Unitarian ministry; and he hoped the subscribers would take up that position. He only spoke for himself, and he knew that there were those who differed from him, thinking it was the duty of Unitarians to train men for any and every church. If he thought God had trusted him with some part of divine truth, it was his duty to do all he could to increase the talent entrusted to his care, though he be branded "sectarian" for so doing. So he should rejoice if that College should decide to acknowledge its responsibility and affirm its loyalty to the churches that gave it birth, by adopting the simplified name of "The Unitarian College."

Principal GORDON was the next speaker. He said this was a year of notable celebrations. Socinus died 400 years ago. His ideas had been steadily making their way in all denominations. He set out to minimise the conditions of Christian fellowship, and sought to express it in the fewest possible terms. He advocated the valuation of the Scriptures on their own merits and according to critical methods. Two hundred years ago Locke died, and to him we were vastly indebted. In addition to his philosophy which made people think and look at facts, he opened up to men a common-sense view of the Bible, and put forth the question, How much is to be imposed upon a man before he is to be accounted a Christian? One hundred years later Priestley died, after embracing in his own experience all those changes from the darkness of the old Calvinism into the light of the Unitarian day. Mr. Gordon disclaimed any desire to sound in this year of Jubilee a funeral march, for it seemed to him more like a birthday. On May 31, 1854, the object of the "Board" was defined: "To assist in the education of young men for the work of preaching and diffusing the gospel among the people, especially the poor, the untaught, and the neglected." A letter was read at that meeting from the late Rev. John James Tayler, in which he said that "the need of the Unitarians of that day was a kind of Methodism, equally fervid but more rational." To-day ministers had to deal with a population which passed through schools better than those existing in 1854, and who were constantly improving themselves. The progress of events would compel them to do even more than they had done for the adequate equipment of young men who were to preach the gospel amongst the people. He thought the real issue of the Jubilee rested with the old students. They must realise that it was their matter; others would not be interested unless they were. The Unitarian body had enthusiasm, but it wanted to be brought out. Personally he promised to devote what strength God might give him in his remaining days towards securing the prosperity of that College.

The Rev. CHARLES ROPER, who next spoke, said that a great yearning for public service came into the souls of some young men, they knew not how or whence. They read history and found that all great world-movements were essentially religious. In their own towns and cities they saw that in the overwhelming majority of cases the men who were looked upon as reformers were actuated by religious motives. They felt an influence proceeding from those examples which fired them with incentive. In their respective ways they came into contact with nature, and saw there traces of the indwelling God. Nothing existed aimlessly. Every leaf or blade of grass served a divine purpose. Were not they also ordained for some great work? Their business was to discover in their own hearts God's purpose with regard to them. And so the "call" to the ministry came to them; and at a time, most probably, when they had got through the drudgery of apprenticeship, or probationary period of clerkship; just when their worldly prospects were opening out, and their friends drew their attention to the material advantages which were likely soon to accrue to them. But the "call" could not be disobeyed; and they at last came to the College door asking for admittance. Some came after grim wrestling with orthodox problems; even having been cast off by their relatives on account of their heresy. All had most probably had their intellectual difficulties, and had risen to the realisation that a minister's duty includes much more than the teaching of theological beliefs. They were received at the College sympathetically by committee and tutors; and while storing their minds as students with the wisdom of the schools, they, at the same time, in the district Sunday-schools and churches, were initiated and trained in the art of influencing human souls morally and spiritually. In that College there was free teaching and free learning as preparation for the ministry of a free pulpit. In conclusion, Mr. Roper suggested that if amongst other ways the Jubilee of the College could be celebrated by the founding of a fellowship which would enable one student each year, after completing his course of study, to work one whole year in connection with one of their active churches, under the supervision of an experienced minister, it would prove an extremely valuable addition to the College endowments.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH also addressed the meeting. Referring to the falling off in the number of students, he said the most important question for them to consider was, what machinery had they for discovering the spiritual geniuses born in their household of faith? They had no arbitrary rule or principle of selection; how could they recognise a moving of the spirit? In other churches the matter seemed easy, for there parents ordained the child for the ministry. They, however, ought to afford opportunity to their young men to discover themselves. There was in their churches the growth of an unreal and blighting sacerdotalism; a spurious product of indolence and indifference. Ministers were told to mind their own business, and that theirs was exclusively the religious work of the Church. They were told that they were not members of the Church, must not be members of committee and must not take any part in politics; they were either not good enough for these things, or were poor, weak folk, and must be restrained. All that stultified their faith and their foundation principle, namely, the equality of all men in the sight of God, and their equal responsibility as His children. The worst thing of all was that "keeping the ministers to their work" meant the secularisation of the laity. The artificial separation of minister and laity might become so real that all religious matters were left to the minister. Church committee meetings consequently were not much different to political councils; the only thing discussed was money, and how to make ends meet. This might be necessary; but something additional was required, if it was to be possible for inspiration to come into the lives of their young men. The separation between laity and minister must be broken down, and they must recognise themselves as equal members of one religious fellowship. The only way of ensuring the future adequate supply of ministers was in the quickening of the religious life in the congregation, and by breaking down the artificial distinctions between pulpit and pew. The intellectual and spiritual standard of Sunday-school teachers was lower than formerly, and they were a feebler folk. Vicious consequences followed. An earnest effort should be made for the adequate teaching of the young; and there should be a machinery for the discovery of the man whom God intended for the work; and that meant the renewal amongst them of the felt reality of the religious life exemplified in lay preaching. The average Unitarian slurred too much over divine things. Church committees ought to be Church councils for considering what the Church stands for, and not merely matters of finance. They must get above the idea that their ministers were simply the paid servants of the Church, to the higher idea that for the cause of righteousness in the world the majority voluntarily set aside small sums of money in order that one of their number might engage wholly in the work of all for the benefit of all. Not until then would their young men feel the glory and reality of the ministerial office, and come to their College as numerously as in the days gone by.

The Rev. J. E. MANNING pronounced a benediction, and the meeting terminated.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE MIDLANDS.

ON February 6, 1804, exactly one hundred years ago to-day, there died at Northumberland, in Pennsylvania, in the United States of America, a former minister of the New Meeting in Birmingham, If he had lived a few weeks longer he would have been seventy-one years of age. Joseph Priestley is held in high honour by those of his own household of faith and by all who value freedom of thought and utterance in matters of religion. A successor to his pulpit in Birmingham, whose memory is still cherished by many with the greatest reverence and affection, said of him seventy years later:—"Behold this holy saint of God—Priestley. Simple minded; simple hearted; patient in tribulation; quietly seeking truth as the business of his days; never desiring revenge for cruel wrongs; in poverty content, and thankful for blessings vouchsafed, however humble; unostentatiously making discoveries which have quickened the intellectual life of the world; refusing to dwell at pleasant ease with his own favourite studies, because he believed that his duty called him to expose errors and overthrow superstitions; loving mercy, doing justly, and walking humbly with his God."

After hearing of his death the congregation at the New Meeting held a general meeting and decided to go into mourning for two months, and to erect a tablet of white marble with a suitable inscription within the meeting-house. This tablet was afterwards moved to the Church of the Messiah, where it may now be seen on the wall near the entrance, close to the monument to the Rev. John Kentish, who succeeded Priestley in the pulpit after twelve years' interval. The inscription was written by Dr. Samuel Parr, vicar of Hatton, near Stratford-on-Avon, a friend of Priestley's.

Priestley was co-pastor at the New Meeting with the Rev. Samuel Blyth for ten years and a half, till his ministry was suddenly cut short by the Church and King riots, which began on Thursday, July 14, 1791, and lasted for four days. His life in Birmingham was a very active one. His Sundays were devoted to teaching and preaching, and his week-days were spent in "seeking truth" by study and research in the domain of physical science as well as that of theology and philosophy. The results were published in numerous books and tracts designed to "expose errors and overthrow superstitions." The replies of those who differed from him called forth further arguments. It was only by simple living and methodical habits that he was able to get through the enormous amount of work which he set himself to do; and it was owing to the generosity of friends that he was enabled to spare the time and meet the cost which such work involved. He was never happier, according to his own words, than while he lived in Birmingham, and this makes it all the more difficult to realise the effect of the terrible blow which came upon him in that memorable week in July when, at a few moments' notice, he was compelled to seek safety in flight, and leave everything behind him to the mercy of the mob—the house he had made his home for more than ten years, his laboratory, and nearly all they contained. I had nearly omitted to mention his chapel, the New Meeting. This and the Old Meeting had already been burned by the rioters, and Kingswood Chapel shared the same fate on the Sunday afterwards. In spite of all this he wrote a sermon a few months afterwards on the words of Jesus spoken at his crucifixion, "Father, forgive them for they know not what they do," and intended to have preached it himself in Birmingham, but it was not considered safe for him to attempt it. It was, therefore, delivered by the Rev. John Coates, one of the ministers of the Old Meeting (who had also been a sufferer by the riots) to the joint congregations which met at the Union Meeting House, Livery-street (formerly the amphitheatre), while the meeting-houses were being re-built.

His strong sense of duty and his contented disposition appear in the following words, with which he closes his reply to an anonymous writer in the Monthly Review for June, 1783, who had criticised his "History of the Corruptions of Christianity," which he considered of more-value than most of his other publications:—

"It has pleased God in the course of his providence to open my own eyes after having been educated in all the gloom and darkness of Calvinism, and I am determined (in conjunction with my philosophical researches) to do all that I can to open the eyes of others. With this object in view I am ready, with the Apostle, to go through evil report as well as good report; and whatever of active life may remain to me I am resolved to make the most of it; there being, as the saying is, rest enough in the grave. I have no higher wish with respect to this life than to live and die in the various pursuits in which I am now engaged; and I hope to rise to a scene of equal activity and of equally pleasurable and useful pursuits, in a future life.

He consistently acted up to the wish above expressed, and died in the midst of the work he loved so well, having dictated corrections to some pamphlets less than an hour before his death.

As I announced in my letter in THE INQUIRER of October 24 last, our churches in the Midlands have resolved to commemorate the 100th anniversary of Dr. Priestley's death during the present year. They have set themselves to raise a sum of at least £5,000, which is to be spent by the committee of the Midland Christian Union over a period of, say, ten years, in the manner they may think best calculated to instil fresh life and energy into the churches requiring help, and no doubt they will devote special attention to the careful choice of new ministers when vacancies occur (and one pulpit at least is now vacant) and to the making grants of money in cases where the minister's stipend would otherwise be inadequate. Between £1,900 and £2,000 (part of it conditional on the whole sum being obtained) has been already promised, the greater part of it by our friends in Birmingham; and the bazaar will be held in the Birmingham Town Hall on the last four days of the week ending December 3. Circulars appealing for help and explaining the grounds for the appeal and the purposes to which the money will be applied have been sent out during the last fortnight to the members and friends of our churches in Birmingham and the Midland district, and to some others farther away, and the committee appointed to make arrangements for the bazaar have now set to work in earnest. It will tax the energies of all concerned to do what will be required of them during the next nine months to make the enterprise a success. Special sermons with reference to Priestley and the religious outlook of the age in which he lived will be preached in the Church of the Messiah to-morrow by the recently appointed minister, and no doubt this will be done in other parts of the district.

Priestley has been dead 100 years to-day, and though we Unitarians have advanced beyond the theology of his day, and physical science has made great strides beyond what was known in his time, yet we owe a great deal to him as a fearless advocate of the truth and a leader in advance of his age. He was essentially a religious man, and the work of the ministry was his first care.

The object we in the Midlands are striving now to realise, a quickening of the religious life of the community, is in full accord with his most cherished hopes and aspirations, and would have his fullest sympathy and approval were he among us now. Let us take example by his intense enthusiasm, his indomitable energy, his untiring industry, his sacrifices for conscience' sake, and our labour will not be in vain. H.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—On Sunday evening the Unitarian Church was crowded, when the Rev. Alexander Webster conducted a lantern service, showing the pictures of Tissot's "Life of Jesus." The Evening Gazette devotes a column and a half to a description, by a correspondent, of the service, of Mr. Webster's earnest and reverent comments on the pictures, and their effect in quickening interest in the Gospel story.

Cefn Coed, Merthyr.—The second annual concert of the string band was held on January 25, and proved as successful as the first. The old Meeting House was crowded, and the programme was varied by singing, &c. The selections played by the band showed that much hard training had been gone through during the past twelvemonth. A selection from the gramophone was kindly given by a friend, and two pretty action songs were sung by twenty little girls. A noteworthy feature of the entertainment was that every item was contributed by regular attendants at the Sunday-school and Church.

Croft.—The annual party in connection with the Sunday-school and Chapel was held on Saturday last the unusually large attendance (despite the inclement weather) including friends from other denominations. Friends from Chowbent gave a concert and lantern entertainment, which were highly appreciated. During the evening prizes were distributed to the scholars for conduct and attendance throughout 1903. Much credit is due to the members of Croft Congregation, who in this isolated farming district, though few, are so faithful and come Sunday after Sunday great distances to their little chapel. The congregation is now under the oversight of Chowbent and its minister.

London: Essex Church. — To-morrow (Sunday) evening the Rev. F. K. Freeston is to begin a series of four addresses in rejoinder to Robert Blatchford's "God and My Neighbour," the subjects being "What is an Infidel?" "What is the Bible?" "What is Christianity?" "What is Humanity?"

London: Islington.—A most enjoyable evening was spent by the members and friends of the Unity Church Young People's Society on Saturday, January 23, when Mrs. Stuart and Miss Tyler invited them to an "At Home," and over a hundred guests shared in the pleasure of evening. On Monday an excellent entertainment was given under the direction of Mr. J. T. Mackey, the lecture-hall being crowded. This is the twenty-eighth season of these Monday entertainments, which are carried on with continually increasing success. The Rev E. Savell Hicks, in proposing a vote of thanks, referred to the activity of the Sunday-school and the hearty devotion of superintendent and teachers to their work. A Band of Hope has been started in connection with the Sunday-school, and meets every Wednesday evening.

London: Stamford-street.—The anniversary meeting of the Band of Hope and Mercy was held on Friday, 29th ult. Members assembled in full force, and were well supported by parents and friends. The report of the superintendent, Mr. A. W. Harris, recorded another year of good and steady work, though the society had seriously suffered through loss of helpers. Encouraging addresses were given by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, Mr. George Hawkins (Southwark Band of Hope Union), and Miss Edith J. Titford. Fifteen seniors' and thirty-three juniors' medals and prizes were also distributed by Miss Titford.

London: Bermondsey.—The tenth anniversary meeting of the Band of Hope and Mercy was held on Thursday, 28th ult., when the members were cheered by a good attendance of parents and friends. The superintendent (Mr. A. W. Harris) was able to report a very satisfactory year's work, and a most encouraging outlook. Addresses, greatly appreciated, were given by Revs. A. J. Marchant and Eustace Thompson, Mr. A. H. Biggs, and Miss E. Woolnough, who distributed 28 medals and 32 prizes for attendance, good conduct, &c.

North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association.—The quarterly conference was held at South Shore, Blackpool, on Saturday, January 30, about ninety persons being present. Immediately after tea the committee met for transaction of business, and the chair at the evening conference was taken by the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal. Mr. S. Derbyshire, of Blackpool, read a paper on Sunday-school work, contending that the Bible should not be taught by inexperienced teachers. Mr. S. Smith, of Kendal, also read a paper on teaching from Nature. Mr. Crookall, of Preston, spoke a few words on the evils of intemperance, after which Mrs. Halstead opened a general discussion on the papers; the Rev. N. Anderton also spoke on the papers, and brought a successful conference to a close.

North Midland Postal Mission.—The annual meeting was held at the Great Meeting, Leicester, on Thursday, January 28. Mrs. T. Fielding Johnson presided. The secretary, Mrs. Squirrell, presented the report of a successful year's work. The total number of applications for literature was 211; of the applicants 39 had become regular correspondents, and from many of these had come expressions of warm appreciation. Some had been enabled to find a way out of their perplexities into the serener atmosphere of a liberal faith. During the year 135 books had been lent, the Hibbert Journal circulated, and more than 900 pamphlets supplied gratis. The report was adopted, and the officers and committee thanked and re-elected. The financial report showed that the work of the mission was outstripping its income, and new subscriptions were asked for. The secretary's address is: Lynton, Stoneygate, Leicester.

Padiham.—The congregation of Nazareth Chapel have lost an old friend in Thomas Dodgeon, their chapel keeper, who died on the last day of January in his 76th year. For eighty-two years the care-taking of the old and new chapels had been in the Dodgeon family George, the father of Thomas, entered upon the duties at the opening of the old chapel in 1822, fulfilling them for fourteen years without remuneration, and afterwards for a very modest sum, until his death in 1854. Then for a time his widow and their son John did the work, till in 1859 Thomas Dodgeon took up the task, from which he has now been called to his rest. Thus he saw the opening of the new chapel in 1874, and had only been absent from his post for four Sundays in the last thirty years.

Pudsey (Induction and Welcome).—The induction and welcome of the new minister, Rev. Edgar Lockett, took place on Monday, January 18, and were very successful and inspiring. The church was filled at the induction service in the afternoon. Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, in delivering the charge to Mr. Lockett, said he was now solemnly devoting himself to the work which long ago he had made his choice in response to a Divine call. As a Unitarian minister he would not claim any authority of mere position, but only that which appertained to the man who spoke from deep conviction, and who had a real loving sympathy with his fellows, and who could throw himself heart and soul into the needs and desires of his people. Such authority was not only very real, but it was far higher and far purer than merely official authority. The Rev. H. Shaen Solly, M.A., of Bridport, delivered the charge to the congregation, and spoke of the joy it was to him to see Mr. Lockett settled as their minister, for he had known him for many years, first as a reporter at Bridport, and then as an earnest worker in his Sunday-school. Mr. Lockett had given up good prospects in his earlier profession to devote himself to the ministry, and he did not think he would ever regret the change. After tea in the school-room a welcome meeting was held at which there was a crowded attendance. Councillor P. E. Verity presided. The welcome from the congregation was given by Mr. Jas. Thompson and Mr. Bolton. Mr. Grosvenor Talbot and the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds, gave Mr. Lockett the right hand of fellowship on behalf of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, and the Rev. F. W. Turner (Baptist) welcomed him on behalf of the other Nonconformist Ministers in Pudsey. Mr. Lockett having replied, brief addresses were given by Revs. Dr. Drummond, H. S. Solly, J. Morgan Whiteman, J. Fox, W. H. Eastlake, and others. Amongst those present during the day, besides those already mentioned, were the Revs. E. Ceredig Jones and W. R. Shanks, Councillors J. D. Conyers and P. A. Reason, and other friends from neighbouring churches.

Rotherham. — On Wednesday evening, January 27, the Rev. Charles Hargrove lectured to the Literary and Social Union of the Church of Our Father on Dr. Priestley, in connection with the centenary of his death.

Stalybridge.—On Thursday, January 28, Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave a recital in the school in aid of the East Cheshire Christian Union Bazaar Fund. The varied selections from Shakespeare and Dickens, along with others from Lancashire and American humour, showed Mr. Harwood's elocutionary powers to great advantage, and his large audience was simply delighted.

St. Helens (Church Opening).—The iron church erected by the Liverpool District Missionary Association was opened on Tuesday evening, the chair being taken by the president of the Association, Mr. A. S. Thew, who formally declared the building open for worship, and wished the congregation every success. He quoted as a motto for the guidance of the worshippers at St. Helens, Huxley's well-known statement that a church should not be a place devoted to wearisome iterations of abstract propositions in theology, but to the setting before men's minds of high ideals of pure and noble living. Rev. R. A. Armstrong quoted a statement alleged to have been made by the Bishop of Liverpool, to the effect that the education of the present day must endeavour to preserve children from the superstitions of Rome on the one hand, and on the other from the darkness of Unitarianism. In regard to the latter portion of the utterance, Mr. Armstrong read a letter which he had that day written to the Bishop asking for an explanation of the offensive and unjustifiable statement. Unitarians, he proceeded, were just the people who, above all others, were pledged to engage in the quest for truth, to keep their minds open to every ray of Divine light, not merely from one community, or one book, or one teacher; and to follow fearlessly wherever it led them. The Rev. J. Morley Mills spoke of his progress from Wesleyanism to liberal religion, and pointed to the encouraging example of the Bootle congregation, also founded by the Association, as a specimen of what could be accomplished by assiduous work. Rev. J. Crowther Hirst gave interesting reminiscences of the life and work of Adam Martindale, born in the neighbourhood and converted, according to his own account, in the St. Helens Chapel; and held him up as an example of what a true minister ought to be. Rev. H. D. Roberts, ex-missionary of the Association, and organiser of the movement which has resulted in the founding of the present church, recalled the discussions which had followed his pioneer lectures in St. Helens, the toleration on both sides which had characterised them, and impressed upon his hearers that the principle on which the new church must rest should be an all-embracing love. On behalf of the local congregation Mr. Finnie, for half a lifetime a most active member of an orthodox body, a superintendent of Sunday-school, and prominent in all church work, made a vigorous and telling speech. Referring to Mr. Armstrong's quotation from the Bishop, he said that he had been converted from orthodoxy to liberal religion by the works of Broad Church Divines, as well as by the study of the Hibbert Lectures; spoke of his questioning of his spiritual advisers without obtaining any satisfaction for himself, or rational explanation of their position; related his subsequent ostracism notwithstanding his years of service; and avowed his intention to work as vigorously in the future on behalf of liberal religion as he had formerly done for orthodoxy. Mr. Griffin, also on behalf of the local community, joined with the previous speaker in thanking the Association for having erected the church, and expressed himself as specially indebted to Mr. Armstrong for his lucid statement. Mr. John Hughes, a prominent worker in Hope-street Church, earnestly urged the congregation to enter above all upon Sunday-school and temperance work. Some remarks from the present missionary of the Association, Rev. R. P. Farley, brought to a close proceedings, which were inspiring and encouraging in the highest degree.

Swansea.—The annual meeting of the congregation of the Unitarian Church was held on Monday evening, January 25, Mr. James Holmes presiding, when very satisfactory reports of Church, Sunday-school, and Postal Mission were presented. The church report, read by Mr. C. H. Perkins, hon. sec., congratulated the Rev. W. Tudor Jones on his Hibbert scholarship, enabling him to pursue a course of study in religious philosophy at the University of Jena for a term of twelve weeks in each of three successive years. The postal mission reported 250 correspondents, drawn from all parts of the world. Mr. Tudor Jones warmly acknowledged the kindness he received at the hands of his congregation. On the following Thursday evening the annual tea meeting was held, when, after a musical performance by the choir, the Rev. W. Tudor Jones gave an interesting lecture on his last year's experiences in Germany. The Mayor of Swansea, Mr. Griffith Thomas, presided, and expressed his great interest in the lecture. The proceedings concluded with the singing of the National Anthem.

CANON NUNN having in the Manchester Guardian objected to Sunday bands (playing in the parks) that they "have done much to destroy our Sunday-schools," the Rev. C. Nelson Dove (Wesleyan) writes to the same paper that the Wesleyan Sunday-schools are not being destroyed; that the Manchester District shows an increase of 1,216, the average attendance an increase in the morning of 415 and in the afternoon of 873 scholars; the number of scholars in Church membership shows an increase of 337. Therefore, says Mr. Dove, if Canon Nunn's suggestion is true of the Anglican Church it is not true of all the Churches, and it is due to the public that the correction should be made.

WHAT can any man better follow than the guidance of Law, Duty, Conscience, these cherubim of God? He who lives thus, in real, not in conventional obedience to the moral law, is in accordance with the whole teaching of Scripture, of which the very essence is "Keep innocency, and do the thing which is right, for that shall bring a man peace at the last"; and in accordance with the whole teaching of Christ, which is, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." F. W. Farrar.

NUT FOODS.

By far the most popular of the six varieties of NUT BUTTER I manufacture, as evidenced by rapidly increasing sales, are the

WALNUT BUTTER

AND

ALMOND CREAM BUTTER.

Many medical men order these to patients who are unable to assimilate dairy butter.

ADVERTISEMENTS 111

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE desire to call the special attention of our readers to the report of the annual meeting of the Sustentation Fund, held at Dr. Williams's Library on Wednesday afternoon, and particularly to that passage in the managers' report which refers to the serious deficiency in the income of the Fund. Last June, after a warning from the treasurer, the grants to congregations were made on the understanding that if no adequate response came to a special appeal for a larger income, all the grants above £20 must suffer a reduction of 10 per cent.; and that, unfortunately, to the great regret of the managers, is what has happened.

FRIENDS who have at heart the welfare of our ministers must realise what this means. The 10 per cent. reductions for the past half-year amounted to £48 15s., and on the payment of the second half of the grants next Lady Day, unless fresh subscriptions are forthcoming, a similar reduction must be made. Those who understand what two or three pounds less in the narrow income of so many poor ministers will mean, must earnestly hope, with the managers, not only that it may not be necessary to make the further reduction in March, but that the state of the Fund may then allow of the previous half-year's reduction being made good again.

WHAT is required, to maintain the full efficiency of this beneficent work is a further income of at least £200 a year. We ask that the report may be studied, and the significance of the long list of grants considered, translating the figures into the realities of daily life in the ministers' homes. If that is seriously done, we cannot believe that the appeal of the managers will again be made in vain.

ONCE more two great world Powers are at war, and the nations are holding their breath as they watch, for fear is everywhere lest others should be drawn into the struggle, and brother should be compelled to raise his hand against brother in a cause which is not his own. In England popular sympathies seem almost wholly with Japan, and there are those who are ready with a light heart to rush to her aid, regardless of the wide ruin and misery in which such an extension of the conflagration must involve the civilised world. For ourselves we can only regard the conflict as lamentable from every point of view, and grieve that the clash of conflicting interests could not be adjusted without this barbarous appeal to the arbitrament of war.

THERE seems to be a vague idea among some of the partisans of Japan that in thus desiring the defeat and humiliation of Russia they are showing themselves supporters of freedom and self-government, because the Russian Government has sanctioned the Kischineff massacres and the Russification of Finland. But, as the Daily News has well pointed out, it is the Russian Empire that Japan is fighting, and not merely the Ministers of the Tsar. The Jews and the Finns will suffer in Russia's defeat at least as much as the Chancellors or their Cossacks. Autocracies, it is true, have sometimes fallen after disastrous wars, but they have not infrequently only found fresh strength in the added miseries which war has brought to their subjects. In either case want and desolation must be the lot of the common people, free or still in bondage, when the war is over.

EARL CARRINGTON presided over a meeting at the Queen's Hall on Wednesday evening, to protest against the introduction of indentured Chinese labour into the Rand mines against the wishes of the people of the Transvaal. A forcible letter from Sir William Harcourt was read, and the protest was enforced from the experience of Australia. Among the speakers was Mr. F. H. P. Creswell, whose article on "The Chinese in South Africa" in the current number of the Independent Review should by no means be overlooked.

A CENTENARY of far greater significance to the world of thought than that of Joseph Priestley is to be remembered this week, for on February 12, 1804, there died at Königsberg, nearly eighty years of age, Immanuel Kant. In Königsberg he was born, April 22, 1724, of humble origin, and on his father's side of Scottish descent; and there for nearly fifty years he taught philosophy in the University. Hegel was thirty-three when Kant died, and did not live another thirty years. Of Kant's greatness as a philosopher we do not attempt here to speak, but touch only the note of personal interest.

SPEAKING last week of Priestley's death, it was natural to remember that in the following year James Martineau was born, and the same thought, though with very different associations, follows our remembrance of Kant. At the end of Martineau's "Types of Ethical Theory" there is an interesting reference to the close relation which he felt to subsist between his own ethical doctrine and that of Kant: and here we will recall another reference, in the second volume of the "Hours of Thought," as marking their kinship of spirit. At the opening of the second sermon on "Christ, the Divine Word," in that volume, Dr. Martineau proposes to meet the objection that this universe is too great for any revelation by a human personality, and he adds:—

> In doing this, I will start from a striking remark of Immanuel Kant, who says: "There are two things that fill my soul with a holy reverence, and an ever-growing wonder: the spectacle of the starry sky that virtually annihilates us, as physical beings; and the moral law, which raises us to infinite dignity, as intelligent agents." Between the two sources of wonder named in these deep words there is an apparent antithesis, but no real variance. A well-balanced mind will not be obliged to deny the one in order to feel the other; but will lie freely open to both together, and through their very contrast will blend them in profounder harmony. Our littleness as natural objects, our insignificance beneath the vault of night, does not contradict our greatness in the sphere of souls.

A step which may ultimately prove of very great importance to the Church of England has been taken in two similar resolutions passed by the Houses of Convocation in the province of Canterbury. A joint committee from six different bodies—the Houses of Convocation and the laymen in the two provinces—met in Church House, Westminster, last July, to consider the establishment of a Representative Church Council for the whole of England. This committee decided upon a report which outlined the nature of the proposed Council, leaving all details of procedure to be settled by the Council itself, and requested the Archbishops of Canterbury and York to act as joint presidents, and call the first meeting. On the initiative of the Archbishop of Canterbury the two Houses in his province have now considered the report, and asked the two Primates to call the first meeting of the Council next July, if Parliament be then in session. This new assembly will afford for the first time, in the words of the Bishop of London, "a living voice to speak on behalf of the whole Church." It will be at first a merely voluntary and unofficial conference, though some kind of recognition by Convocation and Parliament will doubtless be sought in course of time. But the decisions of such a body are not likely to be opposed by any of the "Houses" which represent sections of the Church. When the Church is disestablished, the Representative Council seems destined to become the real centre of authority in the communion.

THE recommendation of the joint committee restricted membership in the new body to persons of the male sex. The Archbishop of Canterbury moved in the Upper House, and the Dean of Canterbury in the Lower House of Convocation, a significant resolution, which was passed by the Bishops without dissent, but was warmly debated before being passed by the Lower House: "And this House desires that the Representative Church Council should at its first session give further consideration to the question whether the initial franchise of lay electors should or should not be extended so as to include women."

THE meeting of the Lower House began with an interesting ceremony, the election of a Prolocutor. "Prolocutor" is the old word which is now translated in the House of Commons into "Speaker," and the qualifications which the Dean of Lichfield enumerated as necessary in the one office apply very aptly to the other. First, a perfect knowledge of the "intricate and complicated machinery" of the rules of the House; secondly, a clear head and ready speech to enable him to explain them intelligibly to unconscious transgressors; thirdly, the power to rule impartially; fourthly, "those agreeable and courteous manners which have often proved such a potent factor in securing compliance with the ruling of the chair from recalcitrant members"; and, last, but not least, an imperturbable temper. In the course of his speech the Dean quoted Mr. Gladstone, who had told him that the best Speaker in his long experience of the Commons was Mr. Brand, whose temper nothing could perturb. The Dean of Windsor was unanimously elected, and having proceeded to the Upper House to be "confirmed" by their lordships, returned to assume the chair.

THE Bishop of Manchester, speaking at Bury last week, harshly criticised the "Pleasant Sunday Afternoons," which have become a very general and successful activity among the Nonconformist Churches in his diocese. He suggested that men "are enticed to the P.S.A. by the promise of a few comic things," that they come to be "amused and tickled," and that the P.S.A. caters for men's pleasures and bribes them in. Those who are engaged in the work are offended at these remarks, which appear to be founded on very inadequate knowledge, and the newspapers contain a number of rejoinders, generally courteous and dignified, from ministers and others engaged in the work. It is unfortunate and unpromising that the Bishop should thus early place himself in opposition to his Nonconformist brethren. Taken in conjunction with the late Bishop's affirmation that the Nonconformists neglected the poor and crowded areas of the city, and that these were practically dependent on the Church for spiritual ministration, this criticism of what the Dissenters from the Church are doing, and to outward appearance doing with great success, comes very ungraciously.

THE P.S.A. gives opportunities for the consideration of applied Christianity. The addresses are very often on the Christian attitude to pressing social questions, popular vices, and moral improvement. If the service is less formal, and is made to include sacred solos and instrumental music, there need be no harm in that. The religious influence of such meetings depends on the people who conduct them, just as the religious influence of a Sunday-school depends on its teachers and workers. There may be speakers who give vent at times to a comic vein: the comic man in the pulpit is, unfortunately, not unknown; but in the days when there is so general a lament about the "unchurched masses," surely this is not the right part for the spiritual head of the diocese to take, the disparagement of a movement which draws in many thousands of working men. It would seem that in Dr. Knox Manchester has not obtained another Bishop Fraser.

IN the columns of the Clarion, "Nunquam" writes pungent attacks on Christianity: the Examiner takes up the challenge, and prints a series of articles on "Blatchfordism and Jesus Christ." Now this is an unfortunate fact, and one that is typical of many other misplaced efforts to promote the truth by discussion. The unfortunate circumstance is this, that while the readers of the Examiner would be all the better for becoming acquainted with Mr. Blatchford's criticism, and the readers of the Clarion might profit by understanding the nature of the reply, yet nothing of the kind happens. One set of readers knows that there is an attack, another that there is a defence, but probably neither of them is much the better, inasmuch as few members of either class really knows what the whole dispute is about. The public of THE INQUIRER lives mainly in another world, neither accepting altogether the Christianity which the Examiner expounds, nor the anti-Christianity (if it may be so described) that gives force to the Clarion's revolutionary humanism. It almost seems that the readers of each of these journals would do better to read any one of them rather than that with which they agree.

THE difficulty we refer to assumes a much more serious aspect. There is a world of church-goers and a world of non-church-goers. In the one the emphasis is laid chiefly on the spiritual nature of man, and duty is approached from the point of view of the categorical imperative; in the other the emphasis is laid on environment. The one world is told you ought, therefore you can; the other, you cannot, therefore there is no ought. The cleavage is complete, and both sides of the contradiction are maintained by honest people. The discussion is a serious one, and we cannot do justice to either argument till we understand both. Yet it is an unfortunate fact that as a rule the people who are predisposed to believe one of these creeds rarely hear the argument in favour of the other; while it is just this contrary argument that they stand in most need of. The difficulty does not exist for the student, but it is a serious one for the practical man. If it were only possible it might be well that ministers of religion should for a time lay stress on the importance of the environment, provided that at the same time the Agnostic Journal would say all that can be said in favour of the power of the soul to triumph over adverse conditions. Meanwhile many people are left without guidance, in a world of feeling not rendered luminous by clear thought, and continually oscillate between a one-sided spiritualism and a one-sided materialism.

THE University of Leiden has after all found in England a successor to Professor van Manen in the Chair of New Testament and Early Christian Literature. Dr. Rendel Harris was unable to accept the appointment, which was offered him, but Mr. Kirsopp Lake, M.A., of Oxford, another distinguished worker in the same field, is now installed, and recently delivered his inaugural address on assuming the duties of his professorship. The subject of the address, which was delivered in English, was the "Influence of the Textual Criticism of the New Testament," dealing finally with its bearing on the Synoptic problem. Professor Brede Kristensen, who succeeded Tiele, now lectures fluently in Dutch, and Professor Lake will doubtless soon be equally at home in his new surroundings.

THE Rev. Herbert V. Mills, of Kendal, has just completed a second course of four lectures in the Brotherhood Church (Congregational) at Islington. On each occasion there has been an attendance of between 300 and 400. The general topic of the lectures was Evolution and Religion. Special attention has been directed to the Cell Theory and its bearings on Heredity, the instincts of animals, and the underlying principles on which society is founded, i.e., the Idea of God, the Idea of Humanity, the Idea of the Nation, the Idea of the Family.

UNLESS a man takes himself sometimes out of the world by retirement and self-reflection, he will be in danger of losing himself in the world. B. Whichcote.

THE PRIESTLEY CENTENARY

COMMEMORATED AT LEEDS, WARRINGTON, AND BIRMINGHAM.

THE chief celebration of the hundreth anniversary of the death of Dr. Joseph Priestley (Feb. 6, 1804), was held at Leeds on Friday and Saturday of last week. The celebration was promoted by the members of Mill Hill Chapel (of which Priestley was once minister), the Leeds Philosophical and Literary Society, and the Leeds Priestley Club, a scientific association which has been in existence for nearly thirty years.

On Friday evening, February 5, an address was given in the Philosophical Hall, on "Dr. Priestley among His Friends," by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, a great part of which is reproduced in our present issue. The portrait of Dr. Priestley, which belongs to the Mill Hill Chapel (the only full face portrait extant), was displayed in the hall, and also two water-colour sketches of Priestley's last residence, at Northumberland, Pa., made at the beginning of last century, and now the property of the Leeds Philosophical Society. Mr. Gordon also showed a relic of his own, attached to his watch-chain, a likeness of Priestley in wax by Wedgewood on a blue enamelled ground, and at the back crossed bands of the hair of Priestley and his wife. It was one of twenty such mementoes given by Priestley to his friends when he left this country for America.

The chair was taken by Professor Smithells, who, in introducing Principal Gordon as one of the most eminent authorities on the life and times of the eighteenth century, referred to the recent erection of a statue of Priestley in the principal square of Leeds. At the conclusion of a delightfully chatty address a vote of thanks to the lecturer was moved by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, seconded by Alderman F. M. Lupton, and cordially passed.

On Saturday, February 6, a memorial service was held in Mill Hill Chapel, attended by the Lord Mayor (Mr. A. Currer Briggs), aldermen, councillors, and magistrates in state, and a congregation representative of all classes and religious denominations. The service was conducted by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, and began with the anthem "Let us now praise famous men." The sermon on "Joseph Priestley: Minister of Religion and Student of Nature," is published in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. It recalled the memory of two north-countrymen, both scholars and lovers of truth, the Venerable Bede, who died May 26, 735, and Priestley, who died only a hundred years ago. The vivid scene at the death of each was described, and the contrast but yet the similarity of the two lives clearly brought out.

On Saturday evening there was another gathering in the Philosophical Hall, where Dr. Thorpe, F.R.S., president of the Priestley Society, and formerly professor in the Yorkshire College, but now head of the Government Laboratories in London, gave a lecture on Priestley. Colonel Harding presided, and a hearty vote of thanks to Dr. Thorpe was passed on the motion of Professor Smithells, seconded by Mr. A. G. Lupton, and supported by the Rev. C. Hargrove, with the request (which was agreed to), that the lecture might be published.

A tablet, commemorating the centenary, has been placed in the Priestley Hall, adjoining Mill Hill Chapel, built in 1859, on the site of Priestley's residence while in Leeds.

Earlier in the day on Saturday Dr. Thorpe had unveiled a memorial tablet at Warrington, affixed to Priestley's former residence in Academy-street.

At Birmingham, where the Midland Christian Union, as we have already recorded, have given a practical turn to their commemoration, special services were held on Sunday in the Church of the Messiah, the present representative of the New Meeting, of which Priestley was the minister, and the Rev. J. Worsley Austin preached in the morning on "The Religious Outlook of Priestley," and in the evening on "Priestley and Eighteenth Century Unitarianism."

DR. PRIESTLEY AMONG HIS FRIENDS.*

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER GORDON.

[The address opened with a reference to Priestley as a philosopher. The following passages are printed from a full report, but they are not to be taken as the whole address, for considerable omissions have been made.]

PRIESTLEY was not a man who made friends. That is to say, he did not go about to seek them. He was not known by the friends and companions whom he chose out, but he is known by the multitude and the variety of distinguished men who chose him out and made him a friend. Priestley among his friends is Priestley as he was, respected and beloved by some of the best and most eminent people of his own time.

Priestley, if I understand him, had none or few popular sympathies. In that respect he contrasted greatly with Wesley. Wesley was interested in science, but only in so far as it enabled him to educate his own people and minister to their needs, especially on the medical side of science. I do not think that in that practical side of science Priestley was interested at all. After he made his great discovery, he never thought of turning it either to popular or to personal account. He did not look at his life as dedicated in that way to the service of his kind.

Priestley and Dr. Johnson.

There is a singular instance of his non-desire to make friends in the case of Dr. Johnson. It is sometimes said that Priestley went to meet Johnson, but the reverse was the case. Priestley refused again and again opportunities of meeting Johnson. Johnson was curious; he wanted to know what sort of a man this was. Priestley was not curious at all. At last they were brought together at the house of one, John Paradise, and they suited each other admirably well, but it was Johnson who was the seeker, and he made a friend of Priestley.

The Brothers, Joseph and Timothy.

Priestley has taught us to make historical and biographical maps. If we adopt his method, Priestley's life may be divided into ten bits, none of them very long. In his home surroundings we find Priestley in conjunction with his brother Timothy, and Tim Priestley tells us a good deal that is very interesting about his brother's early life. He says, for instance, that he was reading a book of knight errantry, and that Priestley took it out of his hand and flung it into the fire. What struck him about the book was its absolute unreality. It was imaginary knight errantry It was not knight errantry grappling with real difficulties, encountering real problems, and it was that from which he wanted to save his young brother. Then his brother tells us of the display of his scientific bent by his bottling up spiders, to see how long they would live on a short allowance of air. Well, Darwin tickled the eyes of his infants with a feather, to see whether they could weep as well as howl, so I think we may excuse Priestley.

Timothy tells us that his brother never knew how to handle a tool. That is very remarkable, because Priestley's experiments were performed with the rudest and the crudest of apparatus. Here in Leeds, where he began his experiments on air, he had the simplest and the least promising of rudimentary apparatus to deal with. He must, therefore, have been exceedingly deft in the manipulation of his hands, and yet he was not at all a tool man. Timothy was. Timothy made many of his brother's mechanical instruments. Timothy got into trouble in Manchester, where he was an Independent minister, because they said he made boxes and packing cases on Sunday night. "But," said Timothy, "the clock always strikes twelve before I begin." It is curious as a contrast between the two brothers, and there were many contrasts between them. There was in them both the power of using their hands, but the power of using their hands in different ways; Timothy, an apt man when he had got tools, he could saw, plane, and fit; Joseph, an apt man when he had to deal with much more delicate matters, and yet he was not facile in the ways of mechanism in which his brother excelled.

His Eagerness for Knowledge.

As a lad, before he went to the Academy, what strikes me most about Joseph Priestley is the extraordinary number of places where he went to pick up knowledge, and the excellence of the knowledge which he managed to store from all the sources open to him. He was not intended originally for the ministry; he was intended for business. I do not think he would have made a first-rate business man, but one point of a business man he had in perfection, and that was his method. "If I have any faculty which has made me any pre-eminence," he said, "it is a faculty for arrangement." He arranged his time; he did everything with his watch before him, and when the hour was up, he could turn his mind without the smallest difficulty to a totally different topic. And that faculty for arrangement, of method, of scheming, of planning, and putting things systematically in order, pervades all the work that Priestley ever accomplished.

When he was quite a lad he learned shorthand, and he put himself in correspondence with his shorthand teacher,

* Passages from an address given in the Philosophical Hall, Leeds, on Friday evening, February 5.

Although, as I have said, Priestley never went out of his way to make friends, nevertheless, whenever he knew of a man from whom he thought he could learn something, he wrote to him, and so he wrote to Peter Annett, and sent him some verses. Peter printed these verses in a new edition of one of his shorthand books, but I sincerely hope they will never be reprinted, because they are not poetry, although they were a very good advertisement no doubt for Peter Annett's book. As a mere lad, Priestley learned Hebrew here, and Latin there, and mathematics somewhere else, and wherever there was anyone to back him, to that man he went and gathered from him all that he had to give, and thus he went to the Academy.

At Daventry Academy.

He chose his own academy, because his good aunt wanted to send him to a highly proper academy, where he had to bind himself up to certain articles of belief, and renew it every six months, and he was not going to bind himself in that way. So he went to an academy where a very large amount of liberty was permitted. There were two heads, one man "high," and the other not so high. They used to discuss in the lecture-hall the conclusions of both tutors, and the students were permitted to take sides. That, of course, was in an independent academy—independent in every sense of the word. Priestley made a good friend of the head of the academy, though he did not agree with him; he made a friend also of the second head, and also a particular friend of a room-mate of his, named John Alexander. The academy was not perfect. What academies are? And one defect in this academy was want of classic training, so Priestley and his room-mate set themselves to study Greek. You may say that was not a very promising foundation for a friendship. However, the study of Greek brought about a very fruitful friendship between Priestley and his room-mate.

At Needham Market.

He passed through the academy, and then they sent him to a small dissenting congregation down in the East of England at Needham Market. He did not make many friends there among his coadjutors in the ministry. They looked at him rather askance. He was very young; I suspect that he was very raw too. He had got an impediment in his speech. Ministers round about said their congregations did not care to listen to him. But he made friends among the neighbouring clergy. That, singularly enough, was always Priestley's resource. The Anglican clergy of Priestley's day were more open than were the dissenting clergy to the influence at any rate of scientific ideals, and Priestley never troubled anybody with theology who did not want to be troubled with it.

Not Warrington, but Nantwich.

Well, when he had been at Needham Market three years, a vacancy occurred at another academy at Warrington. There were four candidates, and Priestley had the strongest recommendation of all the four. He was recommended by Clark, his former tutor, by Alexander, and by George Benson, who, I presume, was then the most learned dissenting minister in London, with but one exception. And he was recommended by Kippis, of whom it was said he had piled so many books, nay, libraries, into his head that his brains could not move. However, they moved on behalf of Priestley, and the main reason why they did not elect Priestley was that they thought him too young. The other reason was that stammer. He had tried to get the better of it. His aunt had given him twenty guineas to go to London to a specialist and have it removed. He went to London to the specialist, paid the twenty guineas, and came back with the stammer worse than ever.

The effort which he had made to get away from Needham led him to make another effort. He tried to get to Sheffield, where there was a vacancy for an assistant minister. There they said he was too gay and airy. He did not get to Sheffield, but the minister who did said, "You try for my vacant place," and so he got to Nantwich. This was an improvement in many ways, because there was more access for him there to the kind of cultivated society in which he rejoiced. He made especially at Nantwich the friendship of two men—one was Edward Harwood, a great classical and Biblical scholar, and the other a clergyman named Brereton, who was a man of practical science. Brereton gave to Priestley a telescope which he had made with his own hands. I do not know whether there are many clergymen in the immediate neighbourhood of Nantwich now who can make telescopes, and, if so, whether many of them would give one away to a Dissenting minister. But such was the way of things in the old days.

At the Warrington Academy.

Well, after he had been there three years, the man who had been appointed over his head to a tutorship at Warrington was appointed to the Divinity Chair; then they fell back upon Priestley, and because he had got a stammer they put him into the chair of rhetoric. That did not dismay Priestley. Here he became a constituent part of a distinctly literary circle. He had no high literary fame, but it was good as far as it went, and Priestley made for himself friends among the young men who were students at the academy, and more among those who were devoted to commercial pursuits than those devoted to the ministry. He did not hold a divinity chair, but he found that there were young fellows educating for business, some for commerce on a large scale, and they knew little or nothing about the history and the constitution of their own country. Therefore, he turned his chair of rhetoric practically into a chair of constitutional history, and his lectures, accepted as a text-book at Cambridge, still remain the pioneer work in that direction. He directed attention to original unpublished manuscript sources for history. How he got to know about them I cannot tell, but he tabulated them and described them, and he laid in his lectures the foundations for a radical and thorough study of the constitutional history of his country. Many a young fellow who studied under him owed to him his knowledge of where he was, his orientation as an Englishman.

At Warrington he made many other friends besides the small and somewhat scholastic coterie which composed the professorial staff. Among them was a very remarkable man, who first turned Priestley's attention towards chemistry—one, Matthew Turner, of Liverpool. He was an obscure man, who had many eccentric notions; he was a devotee to the science of chemistry, and—what Priestley was not—he was a man who applied science in practical directions. He revived the art of glass painting, for example. A good deal of stimulus was received by Priestley from this contact with men of science who were brought into Warrington for special lectures, and who gave to the students from a number of points information which lay beyond the reach of the regular professorial staff.

Priestley's Wife.

[Mr. Gordon then told of Priestley's marriage in 1762 to Mary Wilkinson, the daughter of an ironmaster, at Wrexham. Of the wife he spoke in the following terms.]

Married at eighteen, blossoming straight away into the most sensible and capable of matrons, doing everything for her husband that a wife could do, taking off his hands every domestic and every financial care, not sharing in his opinions or caring about them, but honouring him and loving him above all things, Mary Priestley was an ideal minister's wife, an ideal wife for any man.

At this marriage ceremony a curious incident occurred, and that brought into view another friend of Priestley's. His bride was an ironmaster's daughter, and the ironmaster was too busy to fulfil a father's part by giving away the bride, so Priestley got a ministerial friend of his, named Threlkell, to do that part of the ceremony. When the ceremony came to that point, there was nobody to do it. Threlkell was a man with an abnormal memory, and, like most men of that kind, he was occasionally a nuisance to other people. Among other disadvantages of this abnormal memory, Threlkell was a man of absent mind. He was a student of languages, and in Wrexham Church he found in an old high-backed pew a Welsh Bible. He had never seen one before, and he sat down to read it, forgetting all about the ceremony, until they fished him out to say that he was the man who gave this woman away.

Priestley and Benjamin Franklin.

It was at Warrington that Priestley began his habit of going to London once a year for a month's visit, and it was then that he met Benjamin Franklin. Benjamin Franklin and Priestley were excellent friends. They agreed in politics and in some other ways. It was Franklin who put into Priestley's way some points of scientific work which he thought Priestley could do. It was Franklin who introduced him to other scientific men.

[Mr. Gordon then referred to Priestley's ministry at Leeds, where his friendship with Theophilus Lindsey and William Turner and others began, and proceeded to speak of his subsequent connection as librarian, &c., with Lord Shelburne.]

In Paris and London,

Shelburne took him about with him, and it was under Shelburne's wing that he first visited Paris. I should like to see an historical picture of that famous interview at Paris between Priestley and the French savants, when Priestley, to the amazement and the disgust of many, announced himself as a Christian, and when the abbé embraced him with tears in his eyes and told him he was the first sensible man he had ever heard make that avowal. That was the state of things in revolutionary France in those days. When Priestley stayed at Shelburne's house in town, he resumed his connection with Franklin and all that set. He joined what was known as the Whig Club, meeting at the London Coffee House, and it was there that was begun the series of subsidies or benefactions which were showered upon Priestley from time to time by persons who had no sympathy whatever with his philosophy or his religious opinions, but knew that he would make good use of every farthing that was put in his way in the promotion of scientific research. The first to institute a fund of this kind was John Fothergill, a Quaker, one of the founders of Ackworth. Benjamin Franklin said of Fothergill: "It would be hard to conceive that a better man ever existed."

Parting from Shelburne.

The end of the connection between Priestley and Shelburne is a little obscure. There are those who say that Shelburne got annoyed at the odium that was cast upon Priestley on account of his publications denying the freedom of the will and in favour of what he termed materialism. I do not think that was it at all. I think, perhaps, that Shelburne thought as Gibbon thought—only Gibbon expressed it more rudely—that Priestley had better confine his attention to science, in which he could bring out some tangible result, rather than to questions purely of metaphysics. I fancy there was something of that on Shelburne's part. Certainly it cannot have been that he was afraid of any odium cast upon Priestley attaching to himself; because, later on, when a great deal more odium had been cast upon Priestley, Shelburne asked him to go back. Priestley did not return. I think he was wise not to return. He was better fixed at Birmingham. Whatever the reason was, the connection between the two was dissolved honourably on both sides. The annuity which Shelburne had contracted to pay was regularly paid, and when Priestley's documentary proof was burned in the fire at the riots, Shelburne at once sent him a duplicate.

At Birmingham.

He went then to Birmingham. Now we know that at the end of his Birmingham days he got very much across with the local clergy; but will you believe this? The Rev. Charles Curtis, Rector of St. Martin's, took his curate on a fast day to the New Meeting to hear Dr. Priestley. That is an instance of the kind of liberality which prevailed in the eighteenth century between Church and Dissent before the ructions came. We have plenty of latitudinarians on both sides to-day. We have large professions of liberty, but I doubt whether it would be possible for any rector of a parish to take his curate with him to-day and listen to a Dissenting minister, as Charles Curtis did. Afterwards they fell out, and that marked a good deal of the relations between Priestley and the local clergy of all denominations at the outset.

Members of the Lunar Society.

Priestley's closest and most intimate friends there were the members of the Lunar Society, so called because they met once a month. Among the members were men whose names you all know, James Watt, Matthew Bolton, James Kear, and Erasmus Darwin—a strange, huge, unwieldy creature he must have been, with quite enough of genius to anticipate many of the positions arrived at by his greater grandson, but who just came short of getting the key to the theories of evolution.

Another member of the Lunar Society was a Roman Catholic priest, named Berrington, who was said to have reduced Roman Catholicism to a minimum; but, if so, what he retained he made effective. He was a man of a somewhat majestic presence, and he had a remarkable voice. It was said to have been like the baying of a bloodhound. Berrington was asked by Priestley to preach a charity sermon for him, but he did not think the time was ripe for it in view of the state of public opinion. Another Roman Catholic friend of Priestley's was Alexander Geddes, a Biblical critic. I think he was the most capable antagonist of Priestley on theological matters, and in one of his series of letters addressed to Priestley occurs this paragraph:—

> Christian is my name, and Catholic is my surname. I grant that you are a Christian as well as I. I embrace you as a fellow disciple in Jesus, and if you are not a disciple of Jesus, well, I embrace you as my fellow man.

Those words are inscribed upon Geddes' tombstone, erected by his friend, Lord Petre. Priestley would thoroughly re-echo that sentiment. At the time when the Dissenters were pleading for a larger toleration, Priestley wrote a memorable pamphlet, in which occurs this phrase:—

> Hitherto you have preferred your petition as Christians. Stand forth now as men, and ask for the abolition of every fetter on religious liberty.

That was the position of Priestley. That seems also to have been very much the position of his Roman Catholic friends.

Well, as another illustration of the liberality of those days—when Priestley was engaged in his controversy with Horsley, he wanted certain books, and he got them through the mediation of his friend, the Rev. John Hawkins, from the library of Worcester Cathedral. Here was a heretic slashing away at a representative Anglican and getting his powder and shot from the library of a cathedral church.

We know what ended Priestley's days at Birmingham. Along with him many persons were subject to the fury of a not very instructed mob, who really had very little sympathy with his opinions, whether political or religious. One of these was William Hutton. I regard him as the English Benjamin Franklin, with much of Franklin's sententiousness, with a good deal of Franklin's character, at the same time, of course, destitute of Franklin's exceedingly eminent powers. Hutton was a philosopher. Now, what is a philosopher? You have Erasmus Darwin's definition of a fool—"A man who has never tried an experiment in all his life." Hutton was asked for a rule of philosophy to enable one to bear the ills of life, and he said: "There are two kinds of evils which it is folly for any man to lament. The first are those you cannot remedy, and the second are those you can." There is Hutton's philosophy in a nutshell. Now John Hutton, who was a Calvinist, said: "All religions are right, yet no religion is perfect." Priestley might have thought that was a little sceptical. I only give it you as Hutton's view. Hutton was one of the laymen, antiquarian, historian, printer, stationer, and bookseller, and he was amongst those who cultivated ideas larger than his mere trade. He entered into many of the higher interests in Birmingham in which Priestley too was concerned. It was in Birmingham that Edmund Burke visited Priestley, and reported to his friend Lindsey in London that he was the happiest of men, and the most to be envied.

Priestley in America.

When the Birmingham period came to an end Priestley was for three years in London. He might have remained there to the end of his days. Don't go away with the notion given in some of his diaries that he was persecuted out of the country. It was not that at all. He went to America because his wife determined he should. She had already sent her boys over. She felt that her husband had been insulted, and that this little island was not worthy of him, and that, therefore, it was right for him to try another soil. With his migration to America Priestley's public life ends. He lived in his little room, and with portraits of his friends upon the walls he wrote to them plain but often pathetic letters. He said a year before his death if he could but see them again he would part from this life in peace. But he did not make new friends, and did not use new opportunities. Positions were offered to him—the head of a university, a chair in the college. No, he calmly pursued for the remainder of his days an even life of scientific research and literary labour, and when he died he asked that these words might be placed on his tombstone—"Return unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee."

It was said of Priestley's preaching by a very good judge that it was like a friend talking to friends. It was said of Priestley by Toplady, his personal friend, although, as you are well aware, not agreeing with him on many points of theology:—"I like a man whom I can hold up like a piece of crystal and look through him, and that I can do with Dr. Priestley." It was said of him by Professor Huxley in 1874 that he charmed away the bitterest of opposition by his personal presence. That was the man whose relations to some of the leading and eminent men of the eighteenth century I have endeavoured very briefly and imperfectly this evening to sketch.

ERRATUM.—In the second note, last week (p. 82), on the Lancashire and Cheshire Society for the Permanent Care of the Feeble-minded, for "Mr. Sandlebridge's garden," read "the Sandlebridge garden."

THE APOCRYPHA.*

THERE can be no doubt that Dr. André has supplied a want keenly felt among Biblical students, and it is, we think, no less certain that he has done his work admirably. We have in English and German excellent editions of the Apocryphal books, and much information on this subject is given in the various histories of Israel, or again by Schürer in his account of the Jewish people and literature towards the beginning of the Christian era. But there was still need of an introduction to the Apocrypha, complete, scholarlike, abreast of the latest investigations and discoveries, fit to compare with the best books of the kind on the canonical books of the Old Testament.

Here, then, we have the very thing required, and we are sure that Dr. André's volume will be in constant use as a book of trustworthy reference. We do not mean to imply that it is hard to read through. Quite the contrary, for it is written throughout in a flowing and graceful style. But from the nature of the case it deals succinctly with a great variety of matters, and has to give much minute detail. There is, of course, a great gulf between the union of Greek philosophy with Hebrew religion in the Wisdom of Solomon and the purely Jewish thought of Ecclesiasticus, between First Maccabæus with its truthful and vivid record of a supreme religious crisis, and an edifying and beautiful romance like Tobit, or again, a romance, not altogether beautiful and edifying, such as Judith. Moreover, Dr. André has had to consider the authorship, scope, integrity, text, original language, and canonicity of writings, which, in number, are not much short of a score. Sometimes the questions which arise are exceedingly intricate. Take, for instance, Ecclesiasticus. In 1896, Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson discovered the first fragments of a Hebrew text, and great additions have been made to these fragments by other scholars, viz., by Sayce, Schechter, Margoliouth, Adler, and Levi. Do these fragments belong to the original Hebrew? It is not possible to answer "yes" or "no." The different Hebrew MSS. demand separate consideration, and most likely it is only in part that the fragments can be taken as a transcription of the lost Hebrew text. There will, no doubt, be room for difference of opinion during a long time yet to come. Meanwhile scholars will be grateful to Dr. André for his clear and concise summary of the facts and arguments which may be adduced on one side or the other.

This being so, we can but put before our readers a brief outline of the way in which Dr. André has arranged his matter. He begins by explaining the very different senses in which the word "Apocrypha" has been used. Next he gives some account of the process by which the Jewish canon was formed, besides explaining the varying judgment of Christian writers and churches on the Apocryphal books. Then after dealing with the MSS. of the Septuagint and with the Latin and Syriac versions, he examines the Apocryphal books one by one, analysing their contents, and putting the reader in possession of the most important data respecting the authorship, date, original language of each. The relation of the narratives to ascertained history is always tested with sobriety and care. We should add that the bibliography is very full, so that the reader who desires to pursue any particular question farther, never fails to obtain ample direction on the point. It is, perhaps, to be regretted that the author has not distinguished more minutely Hebraisms from Aramaisms, or illustrated more fully the traces of rabbinical as contrasted with Biblical Hebrew. But in a manual like this absolute completeness is, of course, impossible, and we conclude with a renewed expression of the sincere pleasure with which we welcome this addition to our resources for the study of Jewish literature. ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THIS month's Independent Review opens with an editorial on "The Great Enquiry," which, however, proves to be not on the Fiscal Question, but on the proper rating of land values as essential to deliverance from the evils of overcrowded city life. This is supplemented by a valuable article on "Experience of the Housing Question," by Mr. N. G. Pierson, ex-Premier of Holland. Then follows a most damaging examination of the "Autumn Campaign" of the Protectionists, by Sir Edward Grey. Dr. Hastings Rashdall's reply to Dr. Sanday, on the subject of the ethics of clerical subscription, will be of special interest to many of our readers. There are also two valuable articles on "The Far East," and we would call special attention to Mr. Creswell's article on "The Chinese in South Africa."

The Contemporary gives the first place to Sir Oliver Lodge's recent address to the Teachers' Guild on "School Reform," and there are three Free Trade articles, the first significantly contrasting the condition and prospects of "Free Trade New South Wales and Protected Victoria." The Hon. Bertrand Russell examines Mr. Charles Booth's proposals for Fiscal Reform. "Voces Catholicæ," on behalf of progressive Catholics, upholds the position of Professor Loisy. A lurid picture of the massacre of Kishinieff is contributed by the Russian novelist Korolenko.

To the Nineteenth Century and After, Mr. J. H. Longford, late H.M. Consul at Nagasaki, contributes an article on "Japanese Relations with Korea," pointing out that the war (which has now come) is on the part of Japan purely in self-defence. The Bishop of North Queensland writes on "Primary Education in Australia," dwelling on the evils of "secular" education, and counselling a reasonable attitude on the part of the clergy in the matter of religious teaching. An Ex-Prisoner protests forcibly against Sir Robert Anderson's proposed method of dealing with professional criminals, and the Rev. Dr. Gregory Smith contributes a slight and unconvincing article on "Religious Apologetics" directed against rational critics. Mr. Herbert Paul in an article on "The Religion of the Greeks" writes in warm commendation of Miss Jane Harrison's "Prolegomena." Mr. Montague Crackanthorpe's article "Behind the Fiscal Veil" should also be noted.

The Monthly Review also has its article on the Crisis in the Far East, and there is a valuable article on "Danish Agriculture and Free Trade," by Mr. R. A. Westenholz, President of the Agrarian League of Denmark. The illustrated article this month is "A Further Study at Assisi," by Basil de Sélincourt.

The World's Work is varied as ever, Sir Edgar Vincent (with a full-page portrait) writing on "India and Free Trade," Mr. Alfred Stead (with some capital pictures) on "The Conflict in the Far East," while in other articles we are taken to the prospective Exposition at St. Louis, to the New Republic of Panama, to the Girl Gardeners' Training School at Studley Castle, into the Paris Municipal Laboratory, and elsewhere.

BISHOP AND UNITARIAN.

SPEAKING at Wimbourne House on January 29, in aid of the Schools of the Church Education Corporation, the Bishop of Liverpool (as reported in The Times) said: "As to Nonconformists, his quarrel with them was that they were creedless. What was needed was that the children of the nation should be saved from the superstition of Rome, and from the darkness of Unitarianism. He believed that the Church of England had a magnificent future before her, if she only remained true to the great principles laid down at the Reformation."

On this the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, of Hope-street Church, wrote to the Bishop asking him, if he was correctly reported, to give some explanation of his meaning, since "the phrase employed seems to be needlessly offensive, and yet I cannot believe such was your intention." Dr. Chavasse replied (on February 3) as follows:—

"Dear Mr. Armstrong,—Any religious system which denies the Godhead of our Lord Jesus Christ is, in my opinion, dark, for it rejects the great central truth which for nineteen centuries has been the accepted belief of the vast majority of those who profess and call themselves Christians, which has cast a flood of light on the sins, sorrows, and problems of life, which has been the secret of all the triumphs of Christianity in the past, and which we regard as the plain teaching of the New Testament. Most happily, many who are called Unitarians, and whose lives of devotion and labour for the welfare of their fellow-creatures constrain the admiration of us all, are often, as I well know, consciously or unconsciously approximating to this great central truth of Christianity, which intellectual difficulties for the time prevent them from grasping in its fulness. Between the system and the individual there is in very many cases a great gulf. Those who are 'willing to do God's will' as far as they know it learn to 'know of the doctrine.' But their pure and beautiful lives do not in the least reconcile me to the thought of rearing our English children in a Christless Christianity, which I believe to be darkness.—Yours faithfully, F. J. LIVERPOOL."

Writing on the same day and thanking the Bishop for his prompt and courteous reply, Mr. Armstrong says:—"Without entering into any controversy on the points of grave difference between us which you raise, I shall not, I trust, seem to push the matter too far if I make two observations on that explanation. I should like to assure your lordship that, so far as I can judge from a wide intercourse with persons who have passed over from orthodox to Unitarian Christianity, the effective agency ultimately leading them to that change has not been so much the intellectual difficulties presented by the popular belief, serious though these be, as the protest of their moral and spiritual nature against teaching which represents that universal loving fatherhood of God which Jesus proclaimed as infringed and overshadowed by a wrath which consigns myriads of His children to an everlasting hell. If, then, it were compatible with Unitarian conceptions of charity to brand the faith of good men and women as darkness, it would be in that conception that they would find that desolating quality rather than in an interpretation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ which permits them to believe that the light of God's countenance is unmarked by such shadow. I cordially recognise your lordship's testimony to the pure and beautiful lives of many Unitarians, but I am at a loss to understand how you can believe that the faith in which those lives have been reared and fostered is itself nevertheless sheer darkness. May it not be that even Unitarian Christianity may, at least, be a 'broken light'? Pure and beautiful lives are surely the fruit, not of the darkness, but of the light."

The Bishop, in a further letter, repudiated Mr. Armstrong's description of the Church of England teaching on the wrath of God. The Christian World, this week, adds the following comment on the correspondence:—

The phrase used by the Bishop, and which occasioned the controversy, was certainly an unfortunate one, and we wonder to find him still holding to it. Modern Unitarianism covers a wide variety of religious conviction. Of its more positive forms it would be safe to say that the educated laity of the Bishop's own Church are very much nearer to it in actual belief than to the system which, as Mr. Armstrong says, "consigns multitudes of God's children to an everlasting hell." The Bishop himself, it is plain, holds this creed with a reservation which robs it of its terrors. We assuredly hold no brief for Unitarianism; but it is not only bad taste, it is positively ludicrous for Anglicanism in its present mental condition to assign to this body of Christians a position in the outer "darkness."

AN address on "Remedies for Poverty—False and True" is to be given by Mr. J. Frederick Green, Secretary of the International Arbitration and Peace Society, in the Spears Memorial Hall, Highgate, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 16, at eight o'clock. This is the first of a series of addresses to be continued on alternate Tuesday evenings at the same time and place. Thus on March 1 Mr. F. Lawson Dodd is to speak on "The Inner Meaning of Municipal Trading," and on March 15 Mr. Will Reason on "The Problem of Unemployment." Mrs. Despard, Mr. J. K. Van der Veer, and Mr. Herbert Burrows are the other speakers announced.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

FOR THE LITTLE ONES.

As I was returning home the other evening in the dusk I met my little friend May with two kittens in her arms. Of course, we stopped to have a chat. I asked, "What are you doing with those kittens?" "Oh," replied May, "I found them wandering about in the road as I came back from school, and I am going up the lane presently to find out where they live. I have often rescued kittens," she continued, gravely, "because, you see, they are not big enough to know where they live." Was not that nice and thoughtful of May? I daresay that some one had found a new home for those kittens, and they did not know how to get back to it, for kittens, like children, skip about, and forget where they are until they feel hungry and tired and want to rest in a safe place.

I wonder whether you ever remember how very dependent our little animals are upon us. When we see a dog barking and frisking as he runs in front of his master, he looks so important, as if he were in charge, and dare do anything! But look at that same little terrier when he is lost. How anxious is his small face, and the eyes peeping through the long hair seem quite haggard. He stops every moment to smell about, and slinks near the wall if anyone approaches. At last he hears a whistle he knows; up go his ears, his whole expression changes, and off he rushes to the dear old master who has been looking for him. He is safe now, and though perhaps he gets scolded for being careless what does that matter? He is no longer a lost dog.

Even when we take the greatest care of our pets, we cannot always keep them from harm, as you will see when I tell you the story of a little cat I knew. It is rather a sad one at the end, but as it is true I cannot help that. I must tell you first that there is a very old cat, more than fifteen years old, in this house, and she does not like other cats. Her mistress, she considers, belongs to her, and ought to take no notice of strangers, as she has enough to do to nurse and look after her!

Well, one day, when I came in to breakfast, I saw a young and beautiful little brown and white cat sitting on the hearthrug. She was fat and glossy, and looked quite at home. But we did not want another cat, so she was driven out. This did not trouble her at all; she always returned, and at last we were obliged to allow her to make her home here. She was very dignified, took no notice of the old cat, who did not appreciate her visitor, but quietly went her own way. She was named the "Princess," and my little friend May would tell all sorts of stories about her, saying she was really the lost daughter of a king who had been turned into a cat!

Well, two happy years went by for this little Princess, and then she and the old cat had a peculiar illness. We nursed them both carefully; the old cat recovered, but our Princess became worse, and then she did a strange thing. She would go away and hide herself! (Naturalists have observed that when wild animals are ill they go away to die quite alone.)

Sometimes it was in the cucumber frame or under a tree, and we often found it difficult to find her. At last one day she was lost altogether. I went out into the road, and asked all the boys I met if they had seen my little cat. One told me he had found her, but added: "I took her to a pond, as she was ill, and drowned her." Well, I hope he really did so because he pitied the little animal; but boys are queer creatures, and it is sometimes difficult to know their motives. You see, although we did all that was possible for our Princess, we could not save her from a sad end. Do not forget, dear children, to be very thoughtful and gentle with your little pets; they cannot do without your care, and they are more dependent than you are, for you can speak and tell your wants, they can only show by sounds and movements when they are cold and hungry, tired or neglected. But, on the other hand, they can purr when they are pleased, and the joyful bark of a pet dog or the comfortable purr of a cat, are very pleasant sounds to the kind young master or mistress who loves them and looks after their needs.

FRANCES A. LEWIN.

THE publications agent, Rev. F. Allen, appointed by the British and Foreign Unitarian and Sunday School Associations, has been busy during the past month introducing to members of our churches and schools in the Midlands the recently published literature. He has conducted services on several occasions, addressing many gatherings of teachers and scholars, and from his report would seem to have been most cordially welcomed. Mr. Allen will next be visiting the Manchester District, many churches of which have already sent friendly invitations.

IT will be seen from an advertisement in another column that the Moral Instruction League is holding a public meeting in the Small Queen's Hall next Thursday evening on the "London County Council Elections and the Education Question." Mr. Philip Snowden, chairman of the I.L.P., and the Rev. J. Page Hopps are among the speakers announced.

CANON AINGER, Master of the Temple, who had been for some time in failing health, died on Monday afternoon, within a day of the completion of his sixty-seventh year. A native of London, where he was educated at King's College, and at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, Mr. Ainger held for twenty-six years the Readership of the Temple, and in 1887 was made Canon of Bristol. It was in 1894 that he succeeded Dr. Vaughan as Master of the Temple. His memory will always be associated with Charles Lamb, whose life he wrote both for the Englishmen of Letters Series and the Dictionary of National Biography. He was also editor both of the works and the letters of one whom he loved as "the last of the Elizabethans."

THE CONFERENCE "PASTORAL."

IN his paper on "Church Needs and Conference Ideals," read at the meeting of the National Conference at Liverpool in April last, and since widely circulated, the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD set in the first place as the most urgent need of our churches a more living interest in public worship. These were his words :—

"The first of our church needs is a revived interest in public worship. None of our social, educational, and philanthropic agencies can take the place of this. We may display a thousand activities, we may open our schoolrooms every night in the week, we may have an overflowing exchequer, but without worship we shall hear little but the clang and clank of machinery. The services of the church are the beating heart of all her life. I view with infinite regret and alarm the widespread neglect among our own members of public worship. It is a paralysing malady, the beginning of congregational decay. The Sunday services of prayer and praise are the central force of a living church."

And having dwelt further upon this need, he added the following suggestion :—

"I suggest that the Conference should issue a pastoral to the churches, published in a form to reach every member on our rolls, calling serious attention to the importance of public worship, to the danger arising from its neglect, to the value of creating the habit of attendance on the part of children, to the loss of spiritual faculty that must accrue by the materialisation of Sunday, and to the opportunity the worship of the church gives for public and much-needed witness-bearing."

This with other suggestions of the paper, the Committee of the Conference have since taken into earnest consideration, and last week was issued to the ministers and churches on the roll of the Conference the letter, signed by the President, which we here reprint. It is dated from the Memorial Hall, Manchester, simply as the place where the Committee held the meeting at which the draft of the letter was finally adopted. Such an address to the ministers and members of our churches throughout the country by the Executive of the Conference is a new departure, but one that may be fruitful of great good. Its purpose we take to be the chief aim of the Conference, to deepen the sense of unity in a common religious life throughout the churches, to draw them together in closer sympathy, to strengthen their endeavours and their aspirations after the highest ends.

Such an earnest word of counsel and exhortation from trusted leaders and representatives of the churches gathered together in the fellowship of the Conference should be heartily welcomed and accepted in the brotherly spirit in which it is offered.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE

OF UNITARIAN, LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, FREE CHRISTIAN, PRESBYTERIAN, AND OTHER NON-SUBSCRIBING OR KINDRED CONGREGATIONS.

Address from the Committee to the Ministers and Churches on the Roll.

DEAR FRIENDS.—At the last triennial meeting of the Conference in Liverpool, April, 1903, the attention of the churches was earnestly directed to the subject of public worship. With vigorous and persuasive utterance the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., set before us the ripened wisdom of churches beyond our own immediate fellowship ; while our brother, the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, in dealing with the needs immediately present to us, declared that the first is "a revived interest in public worship." Mr. Wood desired that the Conference should issue a pastoral to its constituent churches. By a resolution passed at the close of his paper, the Conference directed the executive committee to take his proposals into careful consideration. We venture, therefore, to address you on a matter which deeply concerns our common welfare.

Our churches exist to purify and elevate our daily life. The chief means which they employ for this end is the Sunday meeting for worship. The preacher's share in such worship we do not now discuss ; we ask your attention to the united act of congregational devotion. A church may abstain from taking any share in the social and philanthropic activities round it ; it may do little to teach the young, or to seek and save the lost ; and such withdrawal may seriously impair its testimony to divine things. But if its members neglect to meet together for praise and prayer, to utter a common gratitude, or to seek a common strength, its central function ceases, and the chief purpose of its being fails. To raise this function to its highest efficiency, to keep this purpose constantly in view, is thus one of our foremost duties.

At no time in our history has there been a more urgent need that this duty should be faithfully discharged. We are well aware that it is not always easy. But no noble cause can be furthered without loyalty and sacrifice, and the way of religion in all ages has been a way of self-consecration for tasks of difficulty and strenuousness. There have been great changes alike in urban and in country areas. Inconveniences of distance have been sometimes surmounted by the provision of new homes of faith and prayer ; but much still remains for personal effort. There have been other changes in the forms through which we express our highest religious ideas ; yet the sympathies and aspirations of the soul still find their best nurture and expression in common utterance before the Eternal, where the life of each is helped by the larger life of all. And there have been further changes in the churches around us, by which more kindling utterance is sometimes found for sentiments which we hold dear, and in the natural attraction which they exert, we forget that it is also our calling to "bear witness to the truth."

It is the object of social worship, as distinct from private devotion, to draw together in fraternal concord the trusts and aims which may languish in solitude, and strengthen them by the utterance of a common hope. They are few whose vision is not heightened by sharing in the experience of others. What we have felt in our best moments to be truest and most divine gains yet more living energy when it is attested by a wider faith ; and the meaning of the church is that it brings to our personal endeavours the supporting testimony of those who live under the same blessings, encounter the same sorrows, are beset by the same temptations, and seek the same "things above" as ourselves. Each one, therefore, who joins in public worship goes not only to receive, but also to give. It may be only by silence and devotion ; it may be through a more active participation in appointed forms ; there are "diversities of workings, but the same God who worketh all things in all." But herein lies the significance of our adhesion to a church. It is the agency by which our better life is fed, and by which also that life, trembling and feeble though it be, adds something to the general ministry, and in its turn feeds the life around. To promote the welfare of the church is thus part of our common duty, and an individual responsibility devolves on each and all.

We earnestly invite you, therefore, to keep constantly before you the vast importance of our Sunday services. For the young it is specially needful that the purpose of joyful attendance upon public worship should be early fostered. The almost complete disappearance of family worship from our homes has deprived us of opportunities for communion in prayer between young and old. Unless parents and children join together in the sanctuary, they have no occasion to kneel side by side at all. The tender intimacies and associations which lie at the basis of so much of our best religious experience, find no natural root ; and the far-reaching influence of early memories of piety is lost. In maturity this will be grievously missed ; for the value of the regular culture of the devotional spirit cannot be placed too high as a support in the difficulties and trials of after-life. The psalmist who was "glad" when they said unto him, "Let us go into the house of the Lord," spoke out of varied memories of thankfulness deepened, and burdens lifted, and common things transfigured by the presence of God. It may well be that those of us who are pastors do not always realise the need of careful preparation of spirit for the high task of speaking words of thankfulness or confession in the public services of religion. It may also be that even those who do not "forsake the assembling of themselves together" have not fully learned the value of brotherly help in sustaining the best energies of aspiration and endeavour. Do we not often enter the sanctuary without having first lifted our thoughts towards things unseen? Such contemplation is not part of our constant inner joy: and we find less profit than we might in worship with others because it has ceased to be the private and frequent gladness of our souls. The blessings of communion with the Eternal are not to be realised without effort; nor can the hour of public devotion yield its most precious help save to those who approach it with hearts already trained in the mystery of prayer. "Seek, and ye shall find," said the Master. But it was his conviction, as it has been that of so many after him, that the Father's gift of "holy spirit" comes most naturally to those who have first asked it of him.

Let us, therefore, unite with fresh rseolve for this great object. No common aim can be realised without common action. The call to worship embodies the ripened wisdom of innumerable believing souls. To this our most trusted elders have again and again borne witness; and to this the large experience of Christendom summons us with searching voice. The vitality of religion in the future as a personal and social power largely depends, we believe, on the ability of the various churches to harmonise the instincts of worship with the claims of intellectual freedom. May we have grace so to "walk in the Spirit" as to win abiding fruits of "love, joy, peace."

Signed, on behalf of the Committee,
Faithfully yours,
W. B. BOWRING, President.

PARLIAMENT AND REFORM.

IN the clash of arms in the Far East and the pressure of grave questions of national and Imperial policy men are likely to have little enough thought to spare for the prospect of purely domestic reforms in the session of Parliament which has just begun. Such zeal as was professed for social reform by the present Government in its earlier days seems long ago to have exhausted its small vitality, and if it manages to garner any domestic legislation at all this session it will be mainly in the direction of reaction and not of reform. Up to the time of writing, little or nothing has occurred to throw further light on the aims of the several Bills whose titles appeared in the King's Speech, though as to the aim of the principal measure of the session all doubt was removed in anticipation by the speeches of members during the recess

That principal measure is, of course, the "Bill amending the law with respect to licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors in England." Unless prudence comes to the Government at the last moment the "amendment" of the law will provide for the suspension or abolition of the discretion now vested in licensing magistrates with regard to the renewal of liquor licences where direct breaches of the law have not been proved against their holder. As the result of the evidence given before, and the findings of Lord PEEL'S Commission, responsible men all over the country had at last come to realise the necessity for reducing the excessive drinking facilities existing over so large an area in both town and country; and one had almost come to believe that the era of temperance reform had really set in. But one reckoned without the brewing interest, and failed to realise the hold it has taken on our political life. There are few more pitiful spectacles in politics than the meek acceptance by a once powerful Government of the mandate of the trade to choke back the advent of a saner attitude among those in authority towards this terrible problem. The end is not yet, however. The Bill may not pass, and, even if it does, we hope and believe that its place will be taken, before many months have passed, by some such wide and statesmanlike charter of reform as is embodied in the great Temperance Manifesto.

Of the other measures foreshadowed in the Speech, that dealing with Workmen's Compensation is perhaps the most important. The existing Act is essentially a class measure, for it gives compensation to members of the great organised and well-paid trades, but in the main withholds it from the more poorly paid and casual callings. Whether the present Government is the one which will remedy this injustice remains to be seen. The hours of employment in shops certainly need drastic reform, but again it may be doubted whether this session will see that need really effectively grappled with. The ballot has not been kind to the Bills of private members embodying social reforms. Mr. TREVELYAN, however, has secured the third place for his Bill for the rating of ground values, but it is impossible that it should pass the present Parliament in an effective form. Mr. REGINALD LUCAS is fifth on the list with a Bill which, from its title, presumably seeks to remedy the injustice by which even a small provision from a friendly society may disqualify the recipient from any relief from the rates. The Deceased Wife's Sister Bill has a good place, and, in the new humour of the House of Lords, should have a chance of at last reaching the Statute Book. Mr. PAULTON'S much-needed Bill defining the financial liability of trade societies in connection with labour disputes, though well-placed, stands no better chance, we fear, in present circumstances, than other remedial legislation.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE twenty-first annual general meeting of the contributors was held at Dr. William's Library, Gordon-square, on Wednesday afternoon, the 10th inst. The late Alderman Rawson was president, and the vacant place was only filled in the course of the annual meeting. Mr. William Long was called to the chair, and there were also present the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, James Harwood, and V. D. Davis; Messrs. D. Martineau, Charles Harding, John Harrison, J. Cogan Conway, and Delta Evans; Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke, treasurer, and Messrs. A. W. Worthington and Frank Preston, hon. secs.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL moved the following memorial resolution:—

That the annual meeting of the contributors to the Ministers' Stipend Sustentation Fund have received the information of the decease of their president, Alderman Rawson, J.P., with the deepest sense of the irreparable loss it has inflicted on the fund. The warm interest Mr. Rawson took in the well-being of the congregations, which form the National Triennial Conference, led to the laborious and exhaustive inquiry on which he based the convincing paper which he laid before its first gathering in Liverpool in the year 1882. By it he earned the permanent gratitude both of congregations and ministers, frequently and warmly expressed, as it resulted in the foundation of the Fund which has done such benefit to both. With never-failing sympathy and zeal he has, since its establishment, devoted his rare business abilities, his exceptional accuracy and generous spirit to the service of the Fund as one of its managers and secretaries, and has been called by God to his reward while guiding its councils, even to the end of his days, as its President.

The meeting records its gratitude with reverent affection. Its members will always remember the many years of faithful toil which Mr. Rawson has devoted to the accomplishment of the object for which their society was founded by him, at the same time bearing in mind the unnumbered ways in which he has consecrated his prolonged and honoured years by the constant application of his pure and simple Christian faith and love to the development of earnest and sincere religion in public and in private life.

In communicating this resolution to Mrs. Rawson and his daughters, they respectfully offer their heartfelt sympathy with them in their bereavement, and pray that the remembrance of his long years of public service and his tender and loving spirit in his home will, together with the widespread recognition of his worth, help them to submit with trustful faith to the bereavement which our Heavenly Father has caused them to endure.

In moving this resolution, Mr. Steinthal spoke of Mr. Rawson as a very old personal friend, with whom he had worked for nearly sixty years, not only in the religious interests represented by that Fund, but in educational and public affairs of various kinds. Never during that long time had he known a man who gave himself so freely to the work in which he was engaged, or showed such wonderful power of adding a pleasant grace and courtesy to all the business he took in hand. Mr. Rawson made a name for himself in Manchester and its district that would not soon be forgotten, and every honour that Manchester could confer on him it had striven to confer, but did not always succeed, for there was a modesty, a retiring spirit about him, which led him to refuse positions which his friends knew him to be worthy of and would gladly have seen him accept. His long life showed what the power of a true religious spirit could be in public and in private work.

The Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, who seconded, said that, though he had known him in earlier years, his closer friendship with Mr. Rawson began almost with the foundation of that Fund, since he had come to live in his neighbourhood, and become a member of his congregation at Monton a short time before he began the preparation of the paper for the Liverpool Conference, on which followed the foundation of the Fund. He remembered the extreme care and the fine feeling shown by Mr. Rawson in sending out his paper of inquiries to ministers for information; and then his scheme was drafted again and again, and he felt that it was largely owing to the great skill and fine feeling shown in that preparation, and in the paper itself, that so happy a spirit had characterised the management of that Fund from the first. That was only one out of a great many services which Mr. Rawson had rendered to their churches. He had always looked upon Mr. Rawson as one of the finest types of Unitarian piety. He dwelt, also, on those traits of character in Mr. Rawson to which Mr. Steinthal alluded, and said that his activity had deep roots in his religious life. It was for many years the rule of his life on Sunday morning, not simply to be in his place at church, but also to prepare for the service. Every Sunday morning he spent half an hour or an hour in reading something—for instance, a sermon of Martineau's or the Meditations of Marcus Antoninus, as he said, to put himself in tune with the service to which he was going. He came with a definite religious purpose. Such a man they did not merely respect for the sake of his work, they felt it a privilege to be associated with him as their friend. Happily, such men, when they passed away, left an influence behind which continued for many years to come.

Mr. A. W. WORTHINGTON supported the resolution, and bore testimony to the happiness of his association with Mr. Rawson for twenty years in the secretaryship of the Fund.

The CHAIRMAN also spoke of Mr. Rawson's deep interest in the Fund, which he looked upon as a child of his own, very near to his heart, and his devotion to the work of the secretaryship.

The resolution was then passed in reverent silence.

Mr. FRANK PRESTON then read the annual report, as follows:—

REPORT.

It is with deep sorrow that the managers record the loss which has so suddenly befallen the Fund, and so many other religious and benevolent institutions and public organisations, by the death of their president, the founder—Alderman Harry Rawson, J.P.

The carefully prepared paper which Mr. Rawson submitted to the first Triennial Conference in 1882 was not the first of his efforts to place the ministers of the congregations which the conference represents in a more satisfactory pecuniary position, and it was the most successful in its results. The managers have tried, in the resolution which will be submitted to the annual meeting, to give some expression to the gratitude which they share with the contributors, not only for the establishment of the Fund, but for the care he gave to its management to the end of his life.

This is not the place to attempt any appreciation of the varied services which Mr. Rawson has conferred upon the Liberal Christian Church or on society at large; but, while sorrowing over the loss which they have sustained in their revered colleague's death, they feel thankful he has passed, as he himself desired, with no break in his career of usefulness; he had done his duty to the end, and God called him to his rest.

Last year we recorded the loss of one of our honorary life contributors, the Rev. E. S. Anthony; and we have now to record, with equal regret, the death of the other, viz., the Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved, who had shown his great interest in the fund by appropriating for its benefit the sum of £500, out of monies left at his disposal for charitable purposes by a relative.

We must also add to the list of deceased contributors the names of the Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, Mr. James Cooper, of London, and Mrs. Henry Crook, of Monton.

There has been a strong feeling on the part of many of the managers during recent years that grants should be made as far as the available funds allowed, and that it was inconsistent with the intention of the Fund to keep any considerable balance in hand.

In the year 1902, accordingly, it was decided to deal as liberally as possible with the numerous applications for aid. The grants were increased from £1,252 9s. 7d. in 1901, to £1,351 5s. in 1902, and the balance brought forward on January 1, 1902, was diminished on December 31 following, and further reduced by grants to the amount of £50, made in February, 1903.

When the managers met in June last, the treasurer warned them that the funds would hardly justify grants to an equal amount; but they resolved to go through the applications, and consider each according to its merits. Grants were therefore provisionally allotted to the amount of £1,325. As this amount proved to be in excess of the funds available, an appeal, stating the circumstances, and asking for new and increased contributions, was made through THE INQUIRER and Christian Life; and it was resolved that, unless an adequate response should be made, all grants above £20 should be reduced by 10 per cent. Practically no response was obtained, and the half-yearly payments of grants, made at Michaelmas last, were reduced according to the above resolution.

The managers trust that this statement may touch the hearts of the friends of the Fund, and that additional contributions may enable them not only to make the full half-yearly payments, due at Lady Day next, but also to make up the deficiency in the instalments paid at Michaelmas last. It must be remembered in reading the following list of grants that all above £20 in amount are at present subject to the reduction above mentioned of 10 per cent.

A grant made to Llwynrhydowen on condition of increased efforts by the congregation has, as in similar cases previously reported, been duly paid, in consequence of the favourable response of the congregation.

Several applications have been referred to the Augmentation Fund, and one to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, as more appropriate for the consideration of those funds.

The Managers regret to announce that the Rev. Thomas Thomas has felt it necessary to resign his seat on the Board; but he has kindly induced the Rev. Wm. James, B.A., J.P., of Llandyssul, to allow himself to be nominated for the vacant post, and there can be no doubt that Mr. James's experience and acquaintance with the Welsh congregations will make him a very useful and valuable member of the Board.

Mr. EDGAR CHATFEILD CLARKE, as treasure, presented the accounts, which showed interest from investments £819 16s. 3d. and annual subscriptions £370 17s. 6d., a falling off of £20 from the previous year. The year's grants amounted to £1,332 5s., less by £20 than in 1902. They had spent £132 16s. 4d. more than their income, reducing the balance in hand to £48 12s. 11d., or with the donations £11 15s. 7d., which could not be used as income, £60 8s. 6d.

The adoption of the report and accounts was moved from the chair and seconded by the Rev. V. D. DAVIS.

Mr. A. W. WORTHINGTON called special attention to the passage in the report as to the reduction of all grants above £20 by 10 per cent., and that morning they had been obliged to refuse three fresh applications for grants, but with the hope that the additional income required to meet their needs would be furnished. The 10 per cent. reductions for the half year had amounted to £48 15s., and for the year would be £97 10s., so that taking into account the excess of their actual expenditure over income they must say that they required at least another £200 a year adequately to meet the present claims on the Fund.

A resolution was subsequently passed, on the motion of the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL requesting the officers to appeal for fresh subscriptions and to take steps to place the finances on a satisfactory footing.

The report and accounts having been passed, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal and Mr. A. W. Worthington were re-elected managers, and the Rev. W. James, J.P., of Llandyssul, was elected in place of the Rev. Thomas Thomas, who had retired from the Board.

On the motion of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. David Martineau, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal was elected President, and the Treasurer and Secretaries were re-elected, with warm expressions of gratitude for their services.

Mr. E. W. Marshall was thanked for his services as honorary auditor, and requested to continue that service; the trustees of Dr. Williams's Library were thanked for their generous grant of the use of rooms for meetings during the year, and with a cordial vote of thanks to the chair the meeting terminated.

WE are informed that Mr. Hargrove proposes to complete his visits to the Australian churches before going to New Zealand, instead of, as was first intended, sailing from Melbourne, round the Bluff to Auckland, taking the chief East ports on the way, and thence going to Sydney and Brisbane. He will arrive at Auckland from Sydney probably towards the end of July, and be at the service of the Unitarians of the two islands till his departure for San Francisco about Sept. 20. It is considered that this course will be preferable in view of colonial press notices making his mission known and expected as he passes from one centre of population to another. Mr. and Mrs. Hargrove will leave England on April 5, for Marseilles, where they will take the P. and O. steamer India for Fremantle.

RELIGIOUS FAITH AND CHURCH ATTENDANCE.

SIR,—My desire to express some views on these questions springs from a perusal of Rev. Joseph Wicksteed's letter in the last issue of THE INQUIRER on "Attendance at Our London Churches." My views may differ from his, but if you think fit to publish them it will be not for the sake of difference of opinion, but for the sake of presenting a different type of mind taking a standpoint on a different level.

To the question, "Why we appear lacking in devotional fervour," I make bold to give the simplest answer—answering in the same broad way in which the question is asked—We are actually lacking in that which we appear to lack. Those who have devotional fervour can no more disguise it or suppress it under normal conditions than water heated to the boiling point in an open vessel can refrain from ebulition. I grant that one of the excellent qualities of an admirable type of Unitarians is religious reserve—an unwillingness to be religiously demonstrative in the presence of persons supposed to be prone to religious cant, or in dread of cheapening sentiments of piety; but those are to be compared to water super-heated yet devoid of ebulition because it is heated under pressure; besides, it is not Unitarians of that type who give the impression to outsiders, that we, as a body, are a people lacking in devotional fervour, and, only to mention another fraction of the truth, lacking in religious faith. Church attendance may not be the sole criterion of devotional fervour and religious faith. From the services in some churches absence might be explained in isolated cases as being due to the extreme sensitiveness of persons possessed of intense religious faith pining for a fit expression of devotional fervour. Anyone who felt like the man who visited Zion Chapel in Browning's poem called "Christmas Eve," but felt a little more so, might well be excused for staying away from that place though it might well be a gate of heaven to some of those assembled. But when a people habitually absent themselves from public worship altogether, it cannot fail to give the impression to others of the lack of religious faith, and lack of a desire to foster the same; since there has never been invented, and never will be invented, a better opportunity for deriving the sense of all that I understand Mr. Wicksteed to signify by what he calls a "larger presence," from the human electrification of a company of fellow souls, than that which is afforded by a congregation of fellow-worshippers of kindred minds. In the congregation, their voices are attuned and animated by secret emotions escaping freely in the flowing flood that washes away the obstacles incumbering the outlet of their hearts. Or they listen in holy silence for golden words that will illuminate forgotten memories of the past, or lighten the mysteries of pressing problems or foreboded afflictions. Or they lift themselves toward the Most High; either in the solitude of their own thoughts, assisted only by the silently permeating sympathy from and for others present, or in humility following the steps of some human voice, faltering and blundering, yet always aspiring. One would have supposed that a people religiously reserved in their ordinary intercourse would have needed more, and more eagerly sought, the opportunity in Divine service for exercising their religious feelings and sympathies, if their religious faith was indeed a reality.

Still more than the absence of some, the deportment of others, who do frequent our churches, creates the impression that we are an undevotional people. How can we wonder that people who have been accustomed to enter with the throng their own sanctified shrine, with the air of reverential decorum, should be shocked on entering one of our own places of meeting, where those who assemble, professing to regard as superstitious the distinction between sacred and profane, walk, talk, and in general bear themselves, in a manner fitted, not to demonstrate that God is in every place, and that every place is therefore sacred, but to make that place with all others equally profane? I have often heard Unitarian ministers describe the impious gaze and the irreverent lounge assumed by attendants in our churches during the period allotted to prayer, and though I have never seen anything of the sort myself, I have frequently been greatly annoyed by the disturbance of subdued conversation during all parts of the service alike; and I have walked into some of our churches where I have found young people old enough to know better—not without casting a reflection upon the rest of the congregation—conversing and giggling about mere nonsense and personalities, less than a minute before the service was to begin. It is not for me to say they who behave in that manner are irreligious; but it is a mystery to me how they can so desecrate with frivolity, and the vanity of vanities, the hour they have nominally consecrated for communion with the Holy One who inhabiteth eternity, if their faith in Him is indeed a reality.

But there is another way of producing the impression that we are a people lacking in religious devotion and religious faith; a much more refined way, and a much more effective one. I allude especially to the determined set that is made by so many in our body against what they conceive to be an undue reverence for the Book of Books. It is a tendency that will probably pass out of date when the cry for novel conveyances for religious feeling has subsided to form the trough of the next rising wave of true religious enthusiasm; but for a long while the Bible has been used in such a way as to make the hearer wonder at the survival of a book so little esteemed, or in such a way as to make one think the chief motive for using it at all was a desire to expose the fallacy of others who value it at a higher rate. When one hears a religious teacher revelling in an exposure of the iniquities of the King of Israel to show that he did not deserve to be called "a man after God's own heart," on wonders at the boldness of that critic of spiritual things, who cannot penetrate the veil of barbarisms in as anguinary age to the God-aspiring soul of David, and who is himself so little spiritually minded that he is not sufficiently humiliated by the recognition of his own blackness of soul beside the bright glory of the Holy Perfection so much more easy for him than for David to discern; whilst he has lived so far from the true thought of God that he does not know the tender mercy and infinite fondness of the Father of Spirits even for him, the sinner that he is. Again, when one hears a preacher citing the wisdom of a Muhammad, or a Confucius, or any other of the inferior lights of the world, as if they were the peers of the Son of Man who has received a name which is above every name, one cannot help asking whether he has much experience of the deep things of God who has so little spiritual discernment as to go to these others, when it is he, Jesus of Nazareth, who has the words of eternnl life.

If some should find fault with the terms I have just used, because they have themselves new wine which must be put into fresh wine-skins, my reply is, that I should want to do the same if I were in their case; but mine, and I hope I am not alone, is the case of the man who having drunk old wine desires not new; for he says "the old is good."

It has often been urged, Mr Wicksteed says, and I venture to urge it once more, that the rational type of mind is, by nature, less devout than others. It is not the desire to be rational that is antagonistic to an inclination towards devoutness; indeed Unitarianism—and I like to give a name to my position, and that is the name I prefer, means for me sincerity of belief; and I cannot perceive how any can be called devout who is not ready to give a reason for the faith that is in him, seeing that God desireth truth in the inward parts. But it does happen that the rational type of mind is naturally inclined to be wholly occupied with pointing out the fallacies of others, and walking delicately to avoid the despattering with others' superstitions, so as to have no time and freedom to get up a religious fervour of its own, needing vent for its own expression, The rational type of mind is prone to beget the merely negative criticism of the child, who can readily point out an imperfection that seems to him to make the whole nothing but ridiculous in the painting of an Old Master, but lacking the mature and cultured judgment of one who has grown artistically devout, is entirely incapable of appreciating the mark of excellent genius. Had the men of Nehemiah held their weapons with both their hands they would never have built up the wall of Jerusalem. A zeal for the mere defence of truth will never result in the edification of a people unto God.

I suspect that persons of Mr. Wicksteed's school, if there are any, are in reality conscious of the presence of a Living Spirit, but confound it with Nature; reversing the tendency of those pagans of old, who confounded all phenomena with the manifestations of living spirits. For my part, I believe in a living God, the Father of my spirit, who has a care for me. I have, besides, a sympathy with everything that lives, and am inclined to imagine, sentimentally perhaps, that there is a kind of vitality in all creations, so that I have a kind of sympathy with all. But I am quite sure that Nature has not a care for me, and if I believed in no God other than Nature I should—if, indeed, I could summon sufficient moral courage—avow myself an atheist, and I fail to see how any in that case, unless he were one whose lines had fallen unto him in exceptionally pleasant places, could be otherwise than without hope in the world, Those who use, as I do, humanitarian terms in allusion to the Deity, are often said to believe in an anthropomorphic God. If there are any that so revere Nature as to allow it to usurp the place of an "all-loving, supremely righteous Being," I should think they might be said to believe in a mighty fetish.

However, it may be that I fall very short of a right understanding of what Mr. Wicksteed has written on this subject; for it seems to me somewhat profound, and I can lay no claim to ability to fathom profundities. But I think there must be very many believers who would be struck by his mode of thought very much as I have been, and I think they ought to have representation. I do not regret if I have given myself away on their behalf; and in any case my impetus to write has come from no lack of love for Mr. Wicksteed himself, under whose occasional ministry I have been alternately convicted of sin and filled with a hope of salvation, whilst he has helped my own belief in God, and even helped me, though less successfully, to suffer my share of the bitter things of life, that can hardly be separable from the lot of sentient souls.

EUSTACE THOMPSON.

MR. HARGROVE TO AUSTRALIA.

SIR,—The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, looking forward to the visit of the Rev. Charles Hargrove as their representative to Australasia, are anxious to promote its success in every way. I am desired, therefore, to request any English Unitarians who may have sympathising friends at the Antipodes to send out Mr. Hargrove's letter, which appeared in THE INQUIRER a few weeks ago (of which copies may be obtained at Essex Hall), to their friends. I suggest to them that they should make themselves known to Mr. Hargrove as opportunity offers.

JAMES HARWOOD,
Chairman of the Foreign Mission Sub-Committee.

NUNQUAM AND OTHERS.

SIR,—Permit me to indulge in a little merriment over the tone of Mr. Willis's letter in your last issue. It amusingly exemplifies a phenomenon with which I am becoming very familiar, viz., the indignant surprise of "Clarionettes"—to give them their self-chosen name—that anyone should dare to preserve an erect posture in the presence of their idol. (I submit myself to public cross-examination on the subject of my sermon every Sunday evening immediately after service, and am speaking from experience.)

Your correspondent asks why I find it necessary to devote a course of lectures to "Nunquam's" cheap agnosticism. I will tell him. It is because there are a great many half-educated and superficial people who are in danger of letting themselves be impressed and carried away by "Nunquam's" fallacies, unless they hear the other side presented to them.

Why a correspondent whose sympathies are with a writer who declares the existence of a Father in Heaven to be a delusion, should associate himself with a Unitarian or any other Christian Church, is to me a problem beyond solution.

J. WARSCHAUER.

Oakfield, Apsley Road, Clifton.

Dr. Warschauer will contribute to these columns a series of four articles on the the questions raised by "Nunquam's" Agnosticism, the first of which we hope to publish next week.

WE referred last week to the February Seed-Sower, which is a Priestley Centenary number. In its enlarged form, with eight extra pages (still costing only a penny), as the Provincial Assembly Messenger of London and the South Eastern Counties, it has on the cover an admirable portrait of the late Dr. Brooke Herford, and on another page some autobiographical notes of his, and other passages from his sermons. The Messenger promises to be of great service to the churches of the Province, and can be adopted by congregations, so as to contain their own calendar. There is a note from the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, the minister at Largs, and also the following note from the President of the Assembly, the Rev. F. K. Freeston:—

A PROPOSED BOOK EXCHANGE.—Our ministers in country places have sometimes no libraries within reasonable distance, and would oftentimes like to see books which are otherwise beyond their reach. The Postal Mission Library is at their service, and so is Dr. Williams's, if they will take the necessary steps. But would it also be possible to convey books to our ministers by means of private gift, or loan, or exchange? If any fellow minister, or layman, who is willing to co-operate with this plan, will communicate with me saying what books, if any, he is willing to exchange, lend, or give away, I will very gladly put the scheme into operation immediately.

THE Bishop of BRISTOL, in this month's letter, published in his diocesan magazine, acknowledges a generous gift to the Palace library in the following passage, which will be of special interest to many of our readers:—

"He has received for the library which he is forming at the Palace for his successors a gift of the eight noble folios of Walton's Polyglot Bible and Castell's Lexicon. These books were the property of Bishop Hall, of Bristol (1691-1710), whose book-plate they contain. They are presented by the Rev. Kentish Bache, vicar of Walford, in the diocese of Hereford, on the part of himself and other members of the family of the late Rev. Samuel Bache, of Birmingham, of whose library they formed part. They have been put into perfect order by Mr. Bellowes, of Gloucester, at the cost of Mr. Bache, and each volume has on the cover an inscription setting forth the facts of the donation. The Bishop is very grateful, both for the gift and for the manner of it."

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE.

WITH the cotton trade in the state it has been in during the past year, it is not to be expected that the members of our congregations in this district should escape unhurt. But in spite of bad times, which affect them all, they have kept up their spirits and not allowed their work in church and school to suffer more than could be helped. I am struck with the note of hopefulness and cheery courage in the reports that reach me from different parts of the district. Thus, at Colne, where our people have by no means an easy task, the attendance at the services has increased, twenty-eight new members have been added to the roll during the past year, all outstanding debts have been paid, the chapel and school have been repaired, and a sum of £54 added to the Independence Fund. That, for a congregation which is not large and includes no rich members, is very good, and speaks of more than money. The same spirit of cheerful hard work is shown in other places besides Colne, and would, I believe, be found in all the congregations in this district. If then there is nothing very striking to record in the doings of our churches here, there is abundant life in them, and they are doing much quiet good.

There are 27 congregations in this district, and the distances between them make communication difficult. It is not much that the people at Astley, e.g., are likely to see of those at Todmorden, and neighbourly exchanges between Ainsworth and Lancaster can hardly be frequent. Yet it is possible to acquiesce too much in isolation, and during the past few months an attempt has been made to counteract its effects. The committee of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission have watched with great interest the experiment tried by the Manchester District Association, of visits paid by the governing body to the various constituent churches. That policy seemed to answer so well that the committee of the mission determined to try it in this district. The trial was made first at Burnley in October, and was so successful that it was followed up by meetings at Leigh and Bolton (Unity). Where the distances are so great such meetings cannot be held as often or be as well attended by members of neighbouring congregations as in a compact district like that of Manchester. But the experience gained so far has shown that they are much appreciated, and there is no doubt but that they will be continued, till every one of the churches has had the opportunity of such a visit. I mention this work because it is quite the most interesting feature in the recent congregational life in this district; and also because it is only due to the Manchester District Association to acknowledge the valuable lesson they have given, and to commend it to the consideration of other local Associations, on the ground of our experience here.

Turning to another aspect of local affairs, I have to record changes in the ranks of the ministry whereby this district loses two of its chief workers. The Rev. C. J. Street has removed to Sheffield after a ministry of seven years at Bank-street, Bolton. All the work that is done in this district has felt, directly or indirectly, the stimulating influence of his vigorous personality, and his departure, if it is the gain of Yorkshire, is the decided loss of Lancashire. The Rev. J. Collins Odgers also removes from Bury to Liverpool, after nine years of hard work; and the regret of all his friends in the district at losing him is cheered by the hope that at Ullet-road he may find a field of work in every way congenial. Who is to succeed him in Bury is not yet known. At Bolton, the congregation have invited the Rev. J. H. Weatherall of Carmarthen College, and he has accepted the invitation. He will begin his ministry in a few weeks' time, and he may rely on a hearty welcome when he comes, from friends old and new.

R. T. HERFORD.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Birmingham: Newhall Hill (Appointment).—Mr. Thomas Paxton, formerly of Unity Church, South Shields, has received and accepted a cordial invitation to the pulpit of this Church, in succession to the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth.

Blackpool.—The Rev. D. Davis, who succeeded the late Rev. William Binns in the pastorate of the Banks-street Unitarian Free Church four years ago, will close his ministry at the end of March.

Dudley.—The centenary of Priestley's death was commemorated at the Old Meeting House on Sunday, when the Rev. Alfred Thompson preached, in the morning on "Priestley's Life and Work," and in the evening on "Joseph Priestley: an Example for Young Men." There were good congregations.

Great Yarmouth.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Sunday evening last after the service. The Rev. John Birks, F.G.S., presided, and there was a good attendance. The secretary, Councillor J. Williment, presented the report and treasurer's accounts, which were unanimously adopted. The congregation had been nearing its extinction when Mr. Birks, after twenty years' ministry at Derby, accepted the charge in May last, and there had been an encouraging revival and considerable advance. The number of subscribers and amount of subscriptions had doubled, the offertories were higher, whilst the minister had over seventy names on his pastor's list. The chapel and schools, which were getting into a dilapidated state, had been thoroughly renovated, with the aid of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Miss Emily Sharpe, and a few friends, without incurring any debt. A Social Union had been formed with great success, the meetings being held in the Middlegate Hall belonging to the congregation. Altogether, the prospects were more hopeful than for many years past. Officers and committee were appointed, also new trustees. The meeting closed with Doxology and Benediction.

London: Central Postal Mission.—On Friday evening, February 5, a conference was held in the Council Room at Essex Hall, when, after tea and an hour for social intercourse, the chair was taken by Dr. Herbert Smith, and, when he had to leave, by Mr. E. F. Grundy; and the Rev. George Critchley read a paper on "Sin and Salvation from the Standpoint of Rational Religion," followed by discussion. There were thirty members and friends present. The paper dwelt eloquently on certain aspects of the evolution of life in our world, and pointed to its bearings on the progressive moral life of man. Sin, Mr. Critchley declared, was the survival of the beast in man; the man in us must continuously ascend, and true salvation would be found in the elimination of the brute. The right line for moral and religious work was not the ascetic's aim to crush out the natural passions and desires, but to consecrate them to noble uses. In the interesting discussion which ensued Miss Emily Sharpe, Miss Tagart, Miss Florence Hill, Mr. Hugh Stannus, the Rev. V. D. Davis, and several friends, who had been brought by the help of the Postal Mission to Unitarian ways of thinking, took part. Several speakers emphasised the truth that sin consists in giving way to the lower impulses of life where the claim of the higher has been felt, and Mr. Critchley was heartily thanked for his paper. A second conference is to be held on Tuesday, February 23, when Mr. T. J. Hardy is to read a paper on "The Newer Religious Thought and Practical Life." These meetings are freely open to all, a charge of 6d. being made to those who have tea.

Manchester.—The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter gave his first lecture on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" in the Memorial Hall on Thursday the 4th inst. before a large audience. Among his hearers were representatives of nearly every denomination in the city. There has been a larger demand for tickets for this course than for the former on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century."

Manchester: Bradford.—The visit of the governing body of the District Association last Saturday was most successful and encouraging. In the afternoon the service was conducted by the Rev. George Evans, and a fine sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles Roper, from Ephesians iv. 6. When the service was over the congregation broke up into parties of about twenty-five each, and partook of tea in the various class-rooms adjoining the large central hall. Opportunity was taken to hold a meeting of the Mission Committee, at which plans for the extensions rendered necessary by the large Sunday-school that has been gathered were approved and instructions given to get out the specifications and advertise for tenders. The evening meeting began with the hymn, "Live for something, be not idle"; and prayer offered by the Rev. James Ruddle, and then Mr. Wm. Mort gave a welcome on behalf of the congregation, expressing at the same time his gratitude to the Association for gathering in a church in that locality, and suggesting that ladies and gentlemen should be induced to undertake to conduct classes for, say, singing, literature and discussion. The choir followed with some selections admirably rendered, and Mr. John Dendy, who presided, said he thought that, instead of requiring musical aid, Bradford might send out a band of musical missionaries. His address dealt with the "Indifference of Laymen to the Presentation of Religion by the Churches." He asked, "Are the churches failing to make men see that the highest belongs to them?" Attendances at our churches are not satisfactory; strong men are not forthcoming; funds are wanting; our special message, "about which we speak rather largely," is not gathering in the masses; we think we preach Christianity pure and undefiled and yet many, brought up amongst us, keep away. Either we are failing to preach Christianity effectively, or the plain man has satisfied himself that the higher righteousness cannot be put into practice. Then the man who stays away is at any rate honest in his absenteeism, and we must win him back. The Rev. H. J. Rossington, one of the earliest workers in the Bradford movement, declared he had often felt disheartened as he walked home from their school. But the thought that their work might mean a starting point for a nobler life had cheered him. The sad thing at the first was that they did not touch the parents, and he asked himself "why?" His experience was that the work needed could not be done unless the members joined with their minister in visiting the homes of the scholars, and showing by word and deed that they believed in everybody's capacity to rise. Personal influence would tell. Mr. Hepworth (Oldham), Mr. Robinson (Pendleton), and the Rev. W. E. Atack also spoke, and a most helpful meeting was brought to a close.

Newcastle-on-Tyne Services for the People.—At the invitation of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association a series of four Sunday evening services has been arranged for by the committees of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association and the Church of the Divine Unity. The first of these was held last Sunday evening in the Town Hall, a splendid building with seating accommodation for upwards of seventeen hundred persons, the Rev. John Page Hopps being the preacher. The congregation, which numbered 714 persons, the majority of whom were men, was most attentive. At the outset the preacher explained the object of the services, and said those responsible for their organisation were desirous that they should not be controversial, but rather should give the people a happy, thoughtful, and enlightening Sunday evening. The singing was very hearty, the members of the Unity Musical Society having formed themselves into a choir for the purpose of leading the singing. As the people were assembling a selection of music was given on the grand organ by Mr. E. J. Chapman, organist of the Church of the Divine Unity. During the week preceding the opening service the young people of the church, assisted by those of the Byker and Gateshead Churches, undertook a house-to-house distribution of 40,000 circulars, on which had been printed a complete notice of the services, the whereabouts of the churches in the district, and their ministers, and the very fine plea for Unitarian Christianity by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, so that a splendid piece of missionary work had already been done. The Rev. J. Page Hopps will again conduct the service on Sunday next, the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie and J. M. Lloyd Thomas being responsible for the concluding services.

Newchurch.—Bethlehem Unitarian Church has just suffered a great loss through the death, on Jan. 31, of Mr. Richard Holt, of Stackstead, who for many years was a teacher in the school, and for more than forty years officiated as voluntary organist in the church. Our friend was sixty-eight years of age, and belonged to a family which has taken an important part in the work of the church almost from the time of its origin, nearly 100 years ago. Mr. Holt was a man of cultivated judgment, and took a deep interest not only in the work of our own churches, but also in the welfare of other religious bodies. On every hand testimony is heard to his sterling worth and simple manly goodness. The funeral took place on Thursday, Feb. 4, in the graveyard of the chapel, and was conducted by the Rev. J. J. Shaw. On Sunday a special memorial service was held, when Mr. Shaw preached from the text Matthew vii. 14. There was a large attendance of members, scholars, and friends from other churches. During the past year the congregation has suffered repeated losses through death, and at times a cloud of sorrow has seemed to hang over the whole church. In this trying experience it is good to find that the younger members of the church and the adult scholars in the school already realise their responsibility, and give promise of a zeal and devotion not unworthy of the many examples of high service we prize and cherish.

North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association.—At the meeting, which we briefly reported last week, held at Blackpool, Jan. 30, the President in his opening remarks called attention to the fact that the Rev. N. Anderton, of Preston, was shortly to take up a fresh ministry at Pendleton, Manchester, and he expressed profound regret that the Association was to lose one who had laboured so zealously for the welfare of all the churches within the Union He referred to his excellent work done in committee, and to the willingness and the exceptional ability with which Mr. Anderton had prepared and delivered weeknight lectures in the churches at Kendal, Lancaster and Blackpool, and rejoiced in the hope that he might still be able to receive occasional help from him. Mr. Anderton had been one of the first promoters of that very active Association of churches, and leaves the district with the sincere good wishes of all his fellow workers.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—On Tuesday evening Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave a recital of Dickens' "The Cricket on the Hearth," to the Literary and Social Union, which was very much appreciated and enjoyed by a good audience. Rev. A. H. Dolphin presided, and at the close expressed the gratitude of the audience for the rich treat they had enjoyed.

Tenterden.—A largely attended and very successful meeting was held in the ancient chapel here on Thursday, Feb. 4, to welcome Rev. Harold Rylett to the pastorate. Mr. Mace, J.P., presided, and the following took part in the proceedings:—Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, of Gee Cross, Rev. S. S. Brettell, of Maidstone, Rev. R. C. Dendy, and Rev. Felix Taylor (former ministers), Rev. H. Rylett, and Messrs. A. J. Ellis, of Maidstone, and Edgar Winser, J.P., of Tenterden. A party drove over from Maidstone, and several visitors from Northiam were also present.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE publish this week an article by Dr. G. Dawes Hicks on the Centenary of the death of Immanuel Kant; also the first of a series of four articles by Dr. Warschauer on "Nunquam's" Agnosticism, as developed in his book "God and My Neighbour."

FROM this week's News from the Churches it will be seen that Miss Gertrud von Petzold, M.A., who will complete in June her three years' course as a regular student for the ministry at Manchester College, Oxford, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the pulpit of the Narborough-road Church, Leicester. This is the first instance, if we mistake not, of the appointment of a woman to the regular ministry of one of our churches in this country, and we offer our congratulations and most earnest good wishes to Miss von Petzold and the Leicester congregation.

AFTER a full week's debate the Government on Monday succeeded in defeating Mr. John Morley's Free Trade amendment to the Address by a majority reaching less than half the normal figures, even after the series of reverses it has sustained at the bye-elections. The House of Commons has refused, by 327 votes to 276, to express the belief that "any return to protective duties—more particularly when imposed on the food of the people—would be deeply injurious to our national strength, contentment, and well being," or to express dissatisfaction at the "conflicting declarations" on the subject by Ministers of the Crown. It would be rash, however, to assume that these figures are absolutely representative of the relative strength of Free Trade and Protectionist views in Parliament. The Government took care to remind its followers that the issue involved a question of confidence, and that a General Election must follow an adverse vote. And whatever their views on the Fiscal issue, Ministerialists have no great reason, in face of the series of bye-elections which has culminated in Mid-Herts, to desire an early appeal to the constituencies.

BUT whatever the attitude of some timid M.P.s, it is difficult to see what Ministers themselves hope to gain by prolonging the crisis. By throwing over the advocates of the extremer forms of Protection they may have secured the support of some Conservatives in the House of Commons who would otherwise have felt themselves compelled to vote against them. But they cannot suppose that these tactics will be equally successful with the free and independent elector who has no personal ends to gain by assisting them in their futile game of hair-splitting. The figures at the bye-elections show clearly that the electorate recognises and understands no distinction between the more or the less in the Protectionist propaganda. The fight is between Free Trade on the one hand and Protection on the other, and there is no room between them for the half-hearted wobbler. Every man must choose his side or go to the wall.

THE Government, we are told now, stands purely for "freedom of negotiation" with Protectionist countries. It asks for the power to back its demands for the reduction of hostile tariffs with threats of retaliatory duties, and it asks that Parliament should, upon occasion, translate those threats into action. But no one but a believer in the wisdom of full Protection, irrespective of the success or failure of such negotiations, could for a moment entertain the idea of any such procedure; and, as a matter of fact, we find practically every Government speaker in support of retaliation justifying the step by the stock Protectionist arguments.

THAT being the case, who is going to believe that, were a majority of "free negotiators" returned to Parliament, they would confine their introduction of the benefits they suppose Protection to confer to our imports from those countries which refused us concessions on tariff treaties? Once the principle of restricting imports is conceded our whole Free Trade system goes by the board. The Government, like other people, must make up its mind whether it is officially for or against Protection—unofficially its members are Protectionists almost to a man. The constituencies will allow it no resting-place between the two.

WHEN the turn came of Mr. Herbert Samuel's amendment on Chinese labour Ministers made no better show in defence of their position than they did over Protection. The amendment merely expressed the view that it was highly inexpedient that sanction should be given to any Ordinance permitting the introduction of indentured Chinese labourers into the Transvaal until the approval of Colonists had been formally ascertained. All the new Colonial Secretary could say in reply was to express the personal conviction of the Government that the Colonists did approve of the Ordinance, and that the Ordinance was necessary to the prosperity of the Transvaal. But so long as the promise of self-government for the Transvaal remains unfulfilled, and so long as the expedient of a plebiscite is rejected, it is useless to claim in support of any Government proposal a public opinion which has no constitutional means of expressing itself.

IN support of the plea that Chinese labour is "necessary," it is urged (1) that natives cannot be got to do the work, and (2) that white men will not do it. The supply of natives depends upon the wages paid and the conditions of labour offered. Till the mine owners have at least restored the rate of wages in force before the war—they have been halved since—and have made the life of their employees tolerable to free men, they have no right to talk of a shortage of native labour. As for the statement that white men will not do the work, this is traversed, not only by the experience of equally "low grade" Australian mines, but by the experiments of Mr. Cresswell in the Transvaal itself, which prove both that white men are ready to do the work, and that they can produce better results than the natives. The Colonial Secretary's "distinct conviction" that the importation of Chinese "will increase, and not diminish white employment," is at variance with the expressed desires and intentions of the mine owners, whose spokesmen have openly declared their desire to reduce white employment to the lowest possible amount because of the inconvenience of the white miner's trade unionism and love of the franchise.

BUT even supposing the Ordinance were proved to be both necessary and expedient from the point of view of dividend making, or even of the material prosperity of South Africa as a whole, which it most emphatically is not, the Ordinance would remain an iniquity with which no true lover of the British Empire can afford to make any terms. To conciliate the well-founded prejudice of the Colonists against the admixture of white and yellow races the Transvaal Government proposes to sanction restrictions upon the liberty of these Chinese immigrants which are totally at variance with all principles of human liberty, and which must bring the sure harvest of moral and material ill to both the authors and the subjects of the scheme.

"ONLY little more than four and a half years ago it seemed likely, some people thought, that South Africa would be the grave of England's greatness. Let us see to-day that it shall not be the grave of England's honour." So Major Seely, the Unionist seconder of Mr. Samuel's amendment, concluded his speech. But, in spite of powerful protests from both sides of the House, the Government can still command a majority, and having closured the debate on Wednesday, secured a vote of 51 against the Amendment. When the people of this country can speak out at the polls, the answer will be different.

THE "Durham Concordat," which has been much discussed by Churchmen and others interested in education, has been rejected. It was prepared by the Durham County Council, and offered to denominational school managers as an alternative to the adoption of the Education Act. Its chief features were as follows:—(1) School buildings were to be handed over to the Council for a term of years at a nominal rent; (2) the board of managers would have a denominational majority; (3) the Council would appoint the teachers on recommendation by the managers; (4) special attention would be given to Scripture lessons in all schools; but (5) on one day a week in provided ("Board") schools, and on two days a week in non-provided ("Voluntary") schools, representatives of all denominations, clergy or otherwise, would be allowed to attend the schools and give "distinctive religious teaching." If this system were accepted, the Council would undertake repairs to the relief of the denominations. It is noteworthy that the plan here indicated obtains in New South Wales, and apparently with such acceptance that other colonies are adopting it. After consideration, however, it has, as we have said, been rejected by the denominationalists of Durham; and we can only express our satisfaction at the result. Imagine what our Board Schools would be like on the fifth day, when the different shepherds came in to drive their respective flocks into this corner and that!

A DISTINGUISHED committee, which includes the names of our most eminent physicians and surgeons, has forwarded to the registered medical practitioners of Great Britain and Ireland a petition, of which the opening sentences are as follows:—

We, the undersigned members of the medical profession, having constantly before us the serious physical and moral conditions of degeneracy and disease resulting from the neglect and infraction of the elementary laws of hygiene, venture to urge the central educational authorities of the United Kingdom to consider whether it would not be possible to include in the curricula of the Public Elementary Schools, and to encourage in the Secondary Schools, such teaching as may, without developing any tendency to dwell on what is unwholesome, lead all the children to appreciate at their true value healthful bodily conditions as regards cleanliness, pure air, food, drink, &c.

The petition concludes by urging that all teachers should receive such a training as will qualify them for the teaching of hygiene and the nature and effects of alcohol.

SUCH a memorial set forth under such auspices demands the serious consideration, not of the Government alone, but of the country at large, and especially of those who are called to be religious teachers. From the medical profession, at any rate, it is receiving a large and impressive response. Twenty-nine thousand five hundred copies have been distributed. No less than 8,500 signatures were received by return of post, and up to the present the total has reached nearly 14,000. And each of these represents the opinion of an expert. Some of the replies are from medical officers of health, others from medical men who are members of various local government authorities. Many of these have already taken steps to bring the matter before their councils of education. The petition has the approval of the leading medical papers, and especially the staunch support of the British Medical Journal.

THE memorial gives a summary of what is being done in the way of health and temperance teaching among English speaking peoples, from which it would appear that we are behindhand in this matter, and have much to learn from our colonies and the United States. It is worth noticing, and laying some stress upon the fact, that the medical profession does in this memorial set a due knowledge of the nature of alcohol at the very centre of its proposal. This is no teetotal manifesto, and partly on that account is the more authoritative a pronouncement, one the importance of which cannot easily be discounted. The medical profession has spoken words of weight and wisdom; it should not be beyond the power of the pulpit to enforce the lesson of the paramount necessity for the child to know and respect the value of his own body.

FOLLOWING on the correspondence between the Rev R. A. Armstrong and the Bishop of Liverpool to which we referred last week, Archdeacon Wilberforce wrote a letter, which appeared in The Times of Feb. 11:—

Thousands will doubtless have read the reply of the Bishop of Liverpool to the Rev. R. A. Armstrong with profound regret that a ruler of the Church should still be found to reiterate the conventional libel upon Almighty love based upon the long-exploded mistranslation of St. Matthew xxv. 46. Upon this fatal obstacle to faith in God I say no more, as I am convinced that you will not permit the reopening of a practically defunct theological controversy in your columns. But the Bishop of Liverpool speaks of "the teaching of the Church of England." A statement so misleading demands contradiction. In 1562 Convocation, under the presidency of Archbishop Parker, deliberately suppressed the Article which predicated endless suffering, and in 1864 the question whether endless torment was a doctrine of the Church of England or not was tried by the Judicial Committee. It was argued on both sides by most able counsel, and, after mature deliberation, the Lord Chancellor gave judgment that it was not a doctrine of the Church of England, and it should be specially noted that this verdict was given with the approval of the two Archbishops.

AN intimate friend of many years contributed to last week's Athenæum the memorial notice of the late Master of the the Temple. Of Canon Ainger's genius for friendship and his delightful humour there is much to be told. Here we will quote a passage referring to his gifts as a preacher:—

In the course of his long tenure of the Readership of the Temple he attracted a constantly increasing congregation to the afternoon services by his thoughtful and intellectual discourses, and not less by his exquisite reading of the service and the lessons. By the time he had reached the dignity of Master, which gave him the privilege of addressing the morning congregations, his preaching had gained enormously in maturity, both of thought and expression, and held the close attention of one of the most critical audiences of the country. Scorning all the arts of the popular preacher, his fine literary sense, his wide reading, his spiritual perception, and his gift of humour, kept ever in strict subordination to the proprieties of the pulpit, but playing with lambent light over the gravity of his theme, enabled him to produce an impression not less deep, though more subtle, than is achieved by eloquence of the more obvious kinds. At times his sermons had all the charm and point of the most highly finished essay. On other occasions, when his feelings were stirred by some great public event, or by the death of some master in Israel whose memory he delighted to honour, his earnestness and his happy choice of words carried him to a very high level of pulpit oratory. Always the beautiful modulation of his voice, and his exquisite elocution enhanced the pleasure of his hearers.

PROFESSOR L. KNAPPERT, of Leiden, has been in London this week. He preached on Sunday in the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, and in the same place on Tuesday evening gave a most interesting lecture on "The Religious and Moral Life of Our Fathers, as pictured in the novels of Wolff and Deken." The period dealt with was the end of the eighteenth century, the novels being the joint production of those two distinguished women. Dr. Knappert gave a vivid and sometimes humorous picture of the life of those times, and made it clear that the religious rationalism of the novels was instinct with a very earnest piety. The thanks of the audience for the lecture were warmly expressed by Dr. Baart de la Faille, minister of the church. Dr. Knappert, who had spent Monday at Oxford, returned the same night to Holland.

"GOD AND MY NEIGHBOUR."*

I.—BY WHAT AUTHORITY?

A DESIRE has recently been expressed in these columns by an admirer of "Nunquam's," that either I or some other Unitarian should show wherein that writer "is wrong." Such a reasonable wish I am quite willing to gratify to the best of my ability—not, however, as was rather implied that I should, in the Clarion, and that for two reasons. The one is that only "Christians" are admitted to the privilege of replying to the editor of the Clarion in his own paper, and that Mr. George Haw, the sub-editor of this department, has just defined "Christian" in terms which exclude Unitarians (see Clarion, Feb. 5, 1904). The other is that I have pleasant obligations nearer home, in the shape of an invitation from the editor of THE INQUIRER to accept the hospitality of his journal for the undertak ng in question. Perhaps I may as well say at once that I do not intend to write as a "Christian" at all, but simply as a theist—that is to say, I shall not deal with "Nunquam's" specifically anti-Christian arguments, but confine myself to an examination of his agnosticism and determinism.

Before, however, I so much as begin to try to show "wherein 'Nunquam' is wrong," an important preliminary question has to be attended to—viz., By what right does this author, eminent as he may be as the exponent of a certain school of economics, come before the public with a volume on the profoundest problems of theology and philosophy? I trust that no cry of "superior person" will be raised when I take leave explicitly to deny at least one interpretation of the popular belief in the sacred right of every man to his own opinion. To give an instance, I have no right to an opinion on tariff reform, submarines, Giotto, and many other subjects. Every man has a right to form an opinion: only when he has done so with such seriousness and industry as he may, and by the help of the best guidance diligently sought, has he the right to an authoritative expression of that opinion. The question addressed to Jesus, "By what authority doest thou these things?" is really, prima facie, the sanest and most legitimate inquiry possible. We have the right, when being asked to listen to a man's deliverances on the high themes of religious belief, and on questions of critical scholarship, to have some reasonable assurance as to his competence to "sit in Moses' seat." Questions touching his natural ability, his insight into the nature of the problems on which he is giving judgment, his actual knowledge derived from study, his fairness and freedom from bias—all these arise on the very threshold, and must be answered.

Nothing, perhaps, would better enable us to form a preliminary estimate of "Nunquam's" competence to deal with the topics treated in his volume, "God and My Neighbour," than a glance at the genesis of that book. On January 23, 1903, an article from his pen appeared in the Clarion, warmly eulogising Haeckel's "Riddle of the Universe," concerning which he informed his readers that he had perused it "very carefully," and that there was "no answer" to that work, which dogmatically denies the existence of God and the possibility of a future life. So unreservedly did "Nunquam" identify himself with Haeckel's materialism that he declared that even a "packed jury" could not refuse that author a verdict. It is a selection from the many articles of which the one referred to was the first, which constitutes the bulk of "God and My Neighbour." How is it, then, that in this work we shall look in vain for the downright atheism of Haeckel, which, less than a year before, his admiring critic had pronounced "unanswerable"? How is it that now "Nunquam" does not deny the possible existence of a Creator (p. 45), and will "neither assert or deny the immortality of the soul"? (p. 122). There is assuredly nothing dishonourable in a man's altering his opinions; but a writer who within a few months retreats from the main positions of a work which he had enthusiastically avowed to be "conclusive to an open-minded, level-headed man," does not possess the intellectual seriousness which would entitle him to a hearing. Again, a writer who told his readers—a circle of readers, it may be pointed out, who regard him as a very great authority, to whom he almost stands in loco Papæ—that a "packed jury" could not help finding a verdict in Haeckel's favour, but who neglected to point out Haeckel's own admission that such a conspicuously *un*packed jury as one consisting of Wundt, Virchow, and Du Bois Reymond had refused to find such a verdict, hardly displays that sense of responsibility without which the power to mould public opinion is a most dangerous endowment. A writer who, in seeking to define Christianity, does so by identifying it with a form of the doctrine of the Atonement which he was taught in his boyhood, forty years ago, is lacking in a sense of logic. And a writer who starts with the contention that Christians are committed to a belief in the verbal inspiration of the Bible, and then supports his arguments against that belief by quotations from Christian writers like Aked, Gladden, Clifford, Farrar, and Rhondda Williams, has—one is regretfully forced to conclude—no sense of humour.

Perhaps a few illustrations of "Nunquam's" attainments as a critic will be of further use to us in our exploratory survey of the field. "Nunquam" tells us in round terms that he "cannot" believe in the existence of Jesus Christ, (p. 9), the "cannot" being, of course, a definite denial, meaning that the question has passed outside the region of reasonable doubt. When we reflect that he does so, against the authority of Frazer—whose "Golden Bough" he commends as decisive on the subject of religion (p. 13), and upon the authority of J. M. Robertson's "Pagan Christs": when we remember Professor Carpenter's recent judgment on that work, as convicting its author of "constant inaccuracy, suppression of evidence, treating the wildest conjectures as historic facts," and "inability to use his materials" (INQ., Dec. 12, 1903)—it will be seen with how much discrimination "Nunquam" has proceeded in launching his dogmatic statement upon a class of readers unable for the most part to check his words by means of inquiries of their own.

It is in the same spirit that on p. 91 he observes that "many critics and scholars deny the existence of Peter and Paul. There is no trustworthy evidence to oppose to that conclusion."* Let anyone reflect upon the effect of such a crude statement upon a large proportion of the constituency of the Clarion; let him further remember that that statement is grossly inaccurate—that "Nunquam" could not produce one critic or scholar of first-rate standing who holds the views against which he presumes to say that no trustworthy evidence can be adduced; and he will, I venture to think, find it difficult to refrain from indignation at this immodest display of what in a famous instance was happily called "slovenly omniscience." Indignation, however, is quenched by amusement when on page 65 this Biblical critic, who does not believe in the existence of Paul, nevertheless ascribes to him the authorship of Hebrews, when "every schoolboy knows," and the most orthodox theologian would have told him, that Paul had no more to do with the composition of that Epistle than with that of "In Memoriam" or "God and My Neighbour." The same acumen which shines in "Nunquam's" expressed disbelief in the existence of David (p. 58) exactly four pages after he has quoted with approval the verdict which allows to that monarch the possible authorship of at least a few of the Psalms: in his affirmation (p. 161) that "the origins of the Sermon on the Mount have been fully traced" "from the Old Testament," which contains not one complete parallel to any of the sayings in Matt. v.-vii., "from the Talmud, and from the recently discovered 'Teaching of the Twelve Apostles' (a pre-Christian work)" !!*: and in his attribution of the statement that spiritual truths must be spiritually discerned, to Archdeacon Wilson (pp. 175 and 178). But in seeking to account for deliverances like these, it must be remembered that their author has put it upon record that the problems of religion can be mastered in six months. This frame of mind sufficiently explains his assurance that "it would be easy to compile a book more suitable to the needs of Man" than the New Testament (p. 152): that Jesus did not proclaim "a single new ethic," but that his teachings were "mere shreds and patches, made up of quotations, paraphrases, and repetitions of earlier teachings" (p. 108); and the genial and comprehensive statement (p. 57) that "the Bible is a compilation from the literature of savage and immoral tribes." We must not be surprised that within eight pages he should give us two different sets of figures, both wrong, of the relative numbers of Christians and Buddhists, nor that he should imagine Hinduism to be a religion like Buddhism, Mohammedanism, &c. (p. 116). The wonder is rather that in the course of necessarily rapid researches he should have been able to enrich pre-

Christian classical literature by the discovery of a hitherto unknown author of the name of Sextus (p. 162).

There is, however, one attribute above and beyond mere knowledge, one supreme qualification, indispensable to a writer on the subjects dealt with by "Nunquam" in this volume of his; and without naming that attribute, I will enable the reader to judge, by means of one or two quotations, whether this author possesses it or not. I have my own views of a man's fitness to expound or to criticise religion, who addresses an imaginary opponent as "You funny little champion of the Most High"; who describes the story of the Fall in these words: "Jahweh made a man whom he supposed to be perfect. When the man turned bad on his hands Jahweh was angry" (p. 51); who asks: "When did man fall? was it before he ceased to be a monkey or after"? (p. 124); or who demands what evidence can be "sharked up" (p. 38) to prove the superior holiness or inspiration of the Bible. Such utterances as these—and they are merely typical of the whole book—convict "Nunquam" of that vulgar flippancy, that coarse irreverence which would disqualify a man fifty times more competent and learned from laying hands upon sacred things. It is frankly humiliating, not to have to defend religion, but to have to defend it against such an opponent. It is depressing to think that a book of this stamp, revealing such a level of intelligence, learning, taste, should be making a successful appeal to a large section of the reading public. I am firmly convinced that, issued by an unknown man—issued by anyone who had not won, in other fields, an enthusiastic following—this book would not have attracted more than the scantiest attention outside professedly "rationalist" circles, nor have demanded the examination which will occupy the three succeeding articles.

J. WARSCHAUER.

DURING the last generation there has been an accelerating movement among the younger Congregationalist ministers away from the harsh teaching of Calvinism, and in the direction of a gentler if not an easier gospel, founding itself on such conceptions as "God is Love," "God is Father." There are some indications that this newer Congregationalism, in its turn, is being subjected to a necessary criticism by the men who have most boldly advocated it. It is doubtful if the rigid system of the Genevan autocrat, being once given up, can ever again hold sway over the minds of men. As we understand the feeling, it is not at all that Calvin's answers are more correct than they have been regarded these many years, but rather that, however bad his theories, he did attempt to face the facts. There is, as a very thoughtful minister puts it, an element of terror in nature and human nature. In the current preaching there has been too great a tendency to regard God as infinite good nature. But the facts do not vanish because they are ignored, and the newer gospel, it is held, needs to be restated more carefully, and in such a way as to account for and find resources against the terrible element in life.

THE ANAGARIKA DHARMAPALA IN LIVERPOOL.

ON Monday afternoon last, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong presided at a meeting held in the Ancient Chapel Meeting Room to hear an address by the Anagarika Dharmapala (houseless Keeper of Truth) on the subject of his mission to the Ganges Valley.

In perfect English, and calm but manifestly earnest manner, he described the sad lot of the Sudras (the lowest caste) in the neighbourhood of Benares; subjected to a life of toil, degradation, ignorance, superstition, abject poverty, and utter helplessness, their condition was far lower than that of the poor of any other country the speaker had visited; he had traversed China, Burma, Siam, Japan, and several other Asiatic countries, but nowhere had he witnessed such depths of degradation. To the uplifting of these poor folk the Dharmapala is devoting his life and his substance, making sacrifice of self to help them, even though it be but little.

For the past two years he has been travelling,, ever with the one object in view, gathering information and ideas that might be usefully put into practice by these people. In America he has had an insight into the various methods of education there adopted, has learned how their excellent manual training schools are conducted and equipped. He visited the wonderful industrial school of Booker T. Washington, and gained thereby strength and encouragement for his own work. Somewhat similar methods, but, of course, adapted to the different circumstances, the Dharmapala proposes to adopt with the children of the Sudras. To improve the adult would appear to be a hopeless task, his hope lies in the children.

In the neighbourhood of Benares he proposes to acquire a few acres of land, erect upon it a suitable schoolhouse and the workshops necessary for the carrying out of his plans for manual training.

Here he purposes that the children should be taught technically in various handicrafts and arts, carpentering, cabinet making, smithing, bookbinding, printing, broom, brush, and pottery making, wood carving, metal work, drawing, and painting, farming, gardening and floriculture—these for the boys; for the girls he purposes instruction in spinning and weaving, embroidery, modelling, drawing, &c., not forgetting cooking and other necessary household knowledge. With this is to be combined the ordinary school routine adapted to the requirements of the people and place, but a prominent place is to be given to ethics and physical culture.

He proposes a modest beginning, say with about twenty children, and then after a time and success he will gradually enlarge his borders.

Mr. C. H. Viggars, a young Englishman, is to be a co-worker with the Dharmapala. Having received a good training in agriculture, he has spent several years in qualifying himself for just such work as that on which he is entering; he is a good worker in wood and metal, has a fine artistic taste, has drunk deeply from the wells of artistic knowledge as filled by John Ruskin and William Morris, and has every confidence in the work undertaken.

Earnest words of encouragement and sympathy were spoken by the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, T. Robinson, and J. C. Odgers; several others asked questions and added kindly words. The meeting was brought to a close by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in wishing the two visitors success in their undertaking and a hearty "God speed."

It may be added here that the Dharmapala was one of those who took part in the World's Parliament of Religions at Chicago in 1893, when he read a paper on "The World's Debt to Buddha," which is printed in the second volume of the Proceedings, beginning at p. 860, where a striking portrait will also be found.

Anyone wishing to know more of the Dharmapala's work, or wishing to assist in any way, may write to Mr. W. T. Haydon, 135, Bedford-street, Liverpool.

THE Bishop of Manchester has written in reply to the many criticisms on his reference to the P.S.A. movement, but has not improved matters, as his reply indicates pretty clearly his ignorance of the institution to which he referred. He writes:—

> I spoke of a certain kind of P.S.A. hypothetically. If there is no such P.S.A. in existence, what I said remains equally true: "If I were a working-man and people came to tempt me with a P.S.A. in which there was a certain amount of music and promise of a few comic things to be said," &c.

If the Bishop did not know whether such a P.S.A. existed at all, his reference is of the nature of a "new diplomacy" that unfortunately divides instead of uniting the forces of the churches. The real objection of Churchmen to the P.S.A. movement is shown in a letter from Dean Maclure in the Manchester Guardian. He writes:—

> To the Churchman the true worshipper is the faithful and devout communicant. As a Churchman I take exception to P.S.A.'s not because they try to "catch men," but because when they have caught them, they do not, in my opinion, or in the opinion of the Church, lead them on to the higher life through the Divinely instituted ordinances duly and properly administered.

It should, therefore, be understood in all controversies and criticisms of this kind, that the Churchman of the type of Dean Maclure recognises nothing as of religious validity which does not lead up to submission to the administration of a priestly function, and that the Nonconformist minister or layman, not being ordained for the purpose, cannot, in his judgment, fulfil this function. Many complaints against the Nonconformists for neglecting the spiritual cure of souls, and on account of the character of the meetings and services they hold, amount, therefore, to this, that they are not sacramentalists to the same extent as the High Churchman, but believe that spiritual influences may be active in the absence of a priest, and of certain established forms.

IT is a preposterous thing that men can venture their souls where they will not venture their money; for they will take their religion upon trust, but not trust a synod about the goodness of half-a-crown.

LITERATURE.

GIORDANO BRUNO.*

WE are grateful for Mr. McIntyre's book, since many of us are becoming interested in the "heresiarch" — Giordano Bruno. Attempts have been made at different periods, and not always by writers who dissented from Bruno's position, to disparage the originality and the worth of his work and genius. Here we have a whole-hearted, though discriminating, champion, who gives us "The Sources of the Philosophy," treats of "The Foundations of Knowledge" unfolds "The Practical Philosophy of Bruno," tells of his "Religion," and traces his influence in "The History of Philosophy."

There are nine such chapters in the second part of the book, occupying 235 pp.; whilst Part I., the "Life of Bruno," takes up 112 pp. It is probably idle to suggest, after the work is published, that a more equal division of parts would have proved more interesting to the general reader, or even more valuable to the student. Still, when it is fully admitted that the philosophy is "unscientific" and that "the out-reaching guesses at truth of his own time and of the times that had gone before" were "a difficult mass to turn into nourishment," we may be pardoned a regret that Bruno and his own times have not received the fuller treatment.

It is from the point of view, particularly, of liberal religious thought that the regret is emphasised; but in justice to Mr. McIntyre it has to be confessed that research into the obscure byways of heresy and the "unmakings" of Trinitarianism is at present only the privileged enthusiasm of a few. Bruno attended the ministrations of Nicolo Balbani at the Italian Church at Geneva, and it is this Balbani who tells us of the "band of Anabaptists and abominable Arians, whose brood had swarmed in Naples and throughout the kingdom and put in peril the faith of the Evangelicals." Further, it is noteworthy that Servetus had hoped to find a place of refuge in that very kingdom of Naples which was the native land of Bruno; and, but for the tragedy at Geneva, would have breathed the same air as the child of five who was to stand like himself for intellectual and religious freedom.

In the cloister above Naples, which had been the home of St. Thomas Aquinas, Filippo Bruno assumed the mantle of the Dominican order, and with it the name Giordano. In the church stood the image of Christ which had spoken with the angelic doctor, and had approved his works. Long afterwards, at his trial, Bruno spoke of having the works of St. Thomas always by him, "continually reading, studying, and re-studying them and holding them dear." Yet, in spite of the Council of Trent and the spirit of St. Thomas, a "writing" was drawn up against him because he had given away some images of the saints, retaining for himself only a crucifix; and again, because he had advised a fellow novice who was reading "The Seven Delights of the Madonna" to throw it aside and take rather "The Lives of the Fathers," or some such book. A more serious charge made against him by his Prior was founded on an apology for the Arian heresy. It would appear that Bruno was in possession of a commentary of the later heretic Erasmus; and it is certain that he perceived the vivid contrast between Christianity as it was then usually presented, and as it actually was in more primitive days. For some sixteen years he was a knight-errant of Philosophy and Free Thought, and earned his livelihood in the academic jousts. Geneva could not tolerate his over-free criticisms on the accredited authorities; and the fate of Servetus, a little over twenty years before, had not yet lost its suggestiveness. Retracing the steps of that "other self," he would find anti-Trinitarians at Lyons; whilst at Toulouse he was elected to a University Chair, and lectured, among other subjects, on Aristotle's "De Anima." By way of Paris, he reached London in 1583; and a quotation from his letter, asking permission to lecture at Oxford, will give a glimpse of Bruno, the man:—

> Salutation from Philotheus Jordanus Brunus, of Nola, doctor of a more scientific theology, professor of a purer and less harmful learning, known in the chief universities of Europe, a philosopher approved and honourably received, a stranger with none but the uncivilised and ignoble, a wakener of sleeping minds, tamer of presumptuous and obstinate ignorance, who in all respects professes a general love of man, and cares not for the Italian more than for the Briton,... but loves him who, in intercourse, is the more peaceable, polite, friendly, and useful; (Brunus) whom only propagators of folly and hypocrites detest, whom the honourable and studious love, whom noble minds applaud.

It was against the pedant that Bruno fought most fiercely: and therein lies the chief source of his influence on his world, and on posterity. Seven of his works were published in England; and he loved the best Englishmen, and was warm in his praise of the beautiful ladies of England; but, in his belief, England "could boast a Plebs, which for want of respect, roughness, rusticity, savagery, ill training was second to none in the world." We may be surprised to hear that he was pleased with our climate:—"The superfluous fervour of the sun blesses it with a continuous and perpetual spring, as is testified by the ever green and flowery land." From the "Spaccio," it appears that he was struck in England, inter alia, with the multitude of crows, the richness of the sheep, and the sleekness of the cattle, the stern game-laws, and the land hunger of the people.

It was at Venice that the wande ing philosopher was pulled up; and we are given by Mr. McIntyre an interesting account of the proceedings there. A reprint of the Apologia of Bruno, such as we find in Frith's book, would have been very serviceable, even if only in small type in an appendix. The best testimony to the worth of this martyr to truth is the description of him by the Church as "a heresiarch." "It was as the apostle of a new religion, founded on a new intuition, a new conception of the universe, and of its relation to God that Bruno died." Eight years' faithfulness in the prisons of the Inquisition bespoke his living conviction, not of "any special cult or any special interpretation of Scripture or history," but in a "broad freedom of thought, with the right of free interpretation of history and of nature."

For his philosophy, readers must be themselves guided by Mr. McIntyre. His personal religious creed was in "the law of love." Himself a victim of intolerance, with ever a strong faith in Filippo Bruno, he mainly reserved his own intolerances for all the restraints and ignorances "that might weaken the bonds of civil society and of human brotherhood." "ESARHADDON."*

FROM the days of Nathan until those of Olive Schreiner all the prophets of the Lord have been good tellers of stories. Tolstoy, who is in the true line of succession, is no exception to the rule. Many a pathetic legend of his native land has been rescued from oblivion and sent on with new power to the confines of the reading world by this great reformer, who does not scorn to use the simplest tools; his genius for the discovery of the picturesque and humanly interesting, even in the midst of the most revolting and brutalising circumstances, is made plain to us in "Sevastopol and other Stories," the earliest efforts of his pen; his skill in enforcing the greatest moral truths by stories drawn, as were the parables of Jesus, from peasant life, has been recognised wherever books are read.

"Esarhaddon and other Tales" contains not only these suggestive stories, but a photograph of Tolstoy, and a letter from his hand; in addition, there is supplied in the purchasing of this volume the means of doing a truly Christian deed, for all profit on the publication goes, by the translators' wish, to the relief of the Russian Jews who suffered through the Kishinef massacres.

Tolstoy was appealed to for an expression of opinion concerning the tragedies at Kishinef; his answer, which appears in this little volume, is characteristically simple and significant: these words especially should commend themselves to upholders of democratic institutions:—

> Unfortunately, what I most wish to say, namely, that the guilt—not only of the Kishinef horrors, but of all the discord apparent in a certain small part (not the peasants) of the Russian people—lies solely with the Government. But that is just what I may not say in any publication printed in Russia.

The moral of Esarhaddon is strikingly enforced: the hero, an Assyrian king, has a certain truth burned into him so effectually that he resigns his high office in order to accept a higher, becoming a wandering preacher, testifying to the people "that all life is one, and that men only harm themselves when they wish to do evil to others."

The last story of this little collection is a very valuable parable. One sets out to find answers to these th ee questions. What is the right time in which to act? Who are the most necessary people? What is the most important thing to do? A perfectly satisfactory set of answers is worked out by the time the end of the story is reached. The really right time is—now; the most necessary person is he with whom you now are; the most important affair is to do him good.

Teachers of every sort will be grateful for this small volume, and students of Tolstoy are once again indebted to Mr. and Mrs. Aylmer Maude for a translation at once pleasant and idiomatic.

 Of the two versions of Tolstoy's stories noted above, Mr. Tchertkoff's is the more complete, including a striking passage in the first story, omitted by the other.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Note Line in the Hebrew Scriptures, commonly called Pāsēq or Pĕsiq. By James Kennedy, D.D., Acting-Librarian in New College, Edinburgh. — Paseq is a short perpendicular line, like a bar, placed between two Hebrew words. It is of frequent occurrence in the Hebrew text, being found, e.g., twenty-nine times in Baer's correct edition of Genesis. What purpose was it intended to serve? Dr. Wickes, in his classical work on the Hebrew accents expresses the opinion that Paseq was introduced after the accentual system was complete, and was meant to separate by a slight pause words conjoined by the accents and thus to secure emphasis, distinct pronunciation, and reverence. This theory is in accord with the name "divider." Dr. Kennedy's view is quite different. He believes that the sign Paseq is older than the accentual system, and was designed to mark a reading which the scribe thought singular, doubtful, or indeed remarkable in any way. If this be so, its critical utility is much diminished by the arbitrary method followed by the scribes. They have omitted it in passages obviously and grossly corrupt, and inserted it when there is no difficulty, or at least a difficulty of the very slightest kind, e.g., in poetical passages when the relative is omitted, quite in accordance with the common rule. But whatever we may think of Dr. Kennedy's conclusion, it is certain that his learned and able book deserves the attention and gratitude of all Hebrew scholars. (Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark, 1903.)

The Model Prayer and The Glorious Company of the Apostles. By the Rev. J. D. Jones, M.A., B.D.—These sermons by the noted pastor of Richmond-hill Congregational Church, Bournemouth, are of much interest. They give the impression of having been preached extempore, and taken down in shorthand. None the less, the style is finished, while it is simple and unaffected. The theology is broad, though in some respects extremely orthodox. The Model Prayer is of course the Lord's Prayer, arranged in nine sermons, which deal adequately with various petitions in the prayer. They contrast with James Freeman Clarke's deeper utterances on the same subject. But they are likely to have had an abiding effect upon their hearers. The other volume is somewhat more ambitious, and contains twelve striking and impressive discourses. Mr. Jones is most suggestive, perhaps, in his treatment of Judas, in which his orthodox theory of the person of Christ causes him much difficulty. He does not lean to the view that Judas intended to precipitate the appearance of Christ as a temporal Messiah, and so betrayed Him. But he is much puzzled by what seems to us a very simple question. Why did Jesus choose Judas? The answer is obvious to everyone who has no artificial theories about the personality of the Christ. Jesus made a mistake in his judgment of Judas. But enough has been said to attract readers to these interesting and suggestive sermons. (James Clarke & Co., each 2s. net.)

Harvest Gleanings and Gathered Fragments Miss Marianne Farningham dedicates to her friends of many years in many places, and she does well to claim this large heritage of friendship, because her graceful verses have brought joy to a great multitude of those who rarely read poetry simply as poetry, but who respond to that vista of a boundless life that is so hardly presented in mere prose. Her friends are many, because to many her message has been one of courage and of cheer. If she does not deal with the great problems of thought, yet the difficulties of faith and conduct are important and more frequent, and for these there is a ministry of health in such songs of Love and Home, of Life and Experience, as we find in this volume. (James Clarke & Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

IN the publication of picture postcards of real artistic merit Messrs. Raphaël Tuck & Sons have shown great enterprise. The variety of subjects in their list is astonishing, and while some of the series marked "humorous" tend towards the simply vulgar and ugly, it is a pleasure to call attention to such charming sets in the "Oilette" series as "Picturesque Cornwall" and "The Broads." The coloured prints of the "Inns of Court" series are also very happy in reproducing the quaint old buildings. The "Oilette" cards pride themselves on being entirely of English production.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER'S autobiography, which will be published by Messrs. Williams and Norgate at the end of March or early in April, will form two large volumes and will contain a number of portraits. It ends before the completion of the "System of Synthetic Philosophy," at the time the author left London and retired to Brighton, where, as is well known, he spent the later years of his life. In his preface he calls the work "a natural history" of himself, and this it is; but it is also a book full of sidelights on the intellectual life of the Victorian era.

OBITUARY.

MR. HUMPHREY WOOD.

THE town of Chatham has lost a highly respected and honoured citizen in Mr. Humphrey Wood, who died at his residence in Rochester on Feb. 9, in his sixty-seventh year. To the Unitarian Church the loss is serious, for Mr. Wood was for many years secretary of the congregation, acting-trustee, and a most generous supporter. He had been in delicate health for some time past, though the end came suddenly.

Mr. Humphrey Wood was one of the leading solicitors of Chatham, esteemed by his clients and the public for his ability, sterling uprightness, and gentle bearing. He took a keen interest in the welfare of the town; for several years he was a member of the Town Council, and afterwards an alderman. He was an eager and devoted antiquarian; those who have had the privilege of visiting his house in Chatham or at Rochester will be familiar with many tokens of his antiquarian knowledge and artistic taste. He was so quiet, modest, and retiring that only those who knew him intimately were aware of the wide range of his thought and interests. He was a large-minded and large-hearted man, a thorough Liberal in life and religion. Although a member of the council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, he shrank from taking any prominent part in denominational affairs, but he was deeply interested in the promotion of Unitarianism. Widespread sympathy has been expressed in Chatham and Rochester with his widow in the sorrow which has overtaken her, in which many readers of THE INQUIRER will desire to join.

DR. POLLEY, OF BELFAST.

BY the sudden death through apoplexy of Dr. John Lowrey Polley, Belfast has lost a staunch Liberal in religion and politics, who had endeared himself to a very large circle of friends, by his kind disposition and his generous support of progressive movements for the good of the community. At an early period in his career Dr. Polley joined the press and served on the staff of The Northern Whig. The interest in the knowledge of public affairs thus begun remained with him during his medical studies, and throughout his professional career. He was well known for his intellectual and moral courage in the open advocacy of his views as a religious rationalist, and as a consistent and thorough Liberal in politics. For a long period he was a prominent and active member of the Second (Unitarian) Congregation, Belfast, and a generous supporter of its various activities. He was a member of many Ulster societies advocating self-government, land law reform, the improvement of the position of the labourers, and other progressive measures. Though well known to hold opinions which were unpopular among his neighbours, his honesty, modesty, and goodnature secured him the esteem and goodwill of all who knew him. Many representatives of various creeds and parties followed his remains from his late residence, Glenwood House, Shankhill-road, and many of his poor neighbours, who had benefited by his gratuitous medical aid, evinced a melancholy interest in the funeral. Much sympathy is felt for his widow and sisters in their unexpected bereavement. The funeral service at the house was conducted by an old personal friend and former minister, the Rev. J. C. Street, who delivered an eloquent and sympathetic address. The remains were interred at Moneyrea, which was his native district, and the Revs. J. C. Street, W. H. Drummond, and R. Lyttle conducted the service at the graveyard.

IN HOSPITAL.

Chime I.—The City chimes
,, II.—Each passing Hour.
,, III.—All Souls, all Times,
,, IV.—Are in God's Power.

THE great world sleeps, but we must watch and wake,
And count each chime,
For rest comes not to us who long to slake
Our thirst for sleep in one life-giving draught,
Forgetting pain and time.

The night nurse softly comes and goes, the light
Burns dim and low;
And many thoughts take shape and form to-night,
Half weird, half real, that day would scorn as dreams—
The Quarter-past rang slow.

Once, legend tells, in far-off Eastern lands,
The sick were laid
Beside the Temple gate by hopeful hands,
That Peter's shadow, as he passed, might fall
With healing in its shade.

The Half-hour chimed.—Was I awake? or dreamed
That he was here
In Ward 14, and blessed me? Yet it seemed
As if his face had Sister's own grave smile,
And eyes serene and clear.

Hers is the steady hand to pain, and heal
With tenderest power,
Soothing, uplifting, till our faint hearts feel
The restful strength of loving sympathy.—
A Quarter to the hour.

The twilight shadows crept around the bed,
The light burned dim;
From far away a dream voice softly said:
"If in His Name is wrought the smallest deed,
Ye do it unto Him."

Waking and dreaming, so the night wears through,
And with the day
The shadows fade, but Faith in all things true
Has still its old, old power to heal and save.
God grant it always may.

The City chimes
Each passing Hour.
All Souls, all Times,
Are in God's Power.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE TEN VIRGINS.

MATTHEW XXV. 1—13.

YOU will need your Bibles, for this column is about one of those stories with a sermon inside, which Jesus often told the people who heard his teaching, as he wandered about Galilee, showing in his life and words how to love God and goodness in a way the world had never known before. The Jews were fond of, and remembered best such sermon-stories or parables, when they listened to their wise and good men, and so those who, many years after, wrote down the Gospel or "Good News" of Jesus' life found that much of his preaching, as then repeated from memory, was just the telling of tales with some beautiful lesson wrapped inside.

Read the first thirteen verses of the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel. You see they tell about a wedding. In Jesus' country the weddings were at night, and generally on a Wednesday night. The bride, dressed in white with loose flowing hair, a long veil, and a crown of gilded myrtle leaves, was led from her home by the bridegroom to his own house. A band of gay friends went with him to the sound of music; and on the way the procession was joined by girl companions of the bride, "bridesmaids" as we should call them. These were the "wise and foolish virgins" of the story, and there had to be at least ten to make a proper wedding-party. Some carried oil-lamps, others waved myrtle-boughs, and scattered grain and coins to the crowds beside the road. When the bridegroom's house was reached the merry-making began, and often lasted a week.

Now this parable contains many sermons, some of which you will understand better when you are older. There is, however, a simple lesson in the part about the foolish bridesmaids, who forgot to take extra lamp-oil in case they had to wait a long time for the procession. The bridegroom did not come till midnight, and it was only then that they remembered they ought to have brought flasks of oil for refilling their nearly empty lamps. So that they had to go and buy oil, and were too late for the feast.

Thoughtfulness, forethought. What a difference these make every day in our lives! I recollect thinking myself a very "foolish virgin" once, when I went a long bicycle ride through country lanes at night. I had plenty of oil for the lamp, but only three matches. On a gusty part of the road the light went out, and had to be lit three times. Again it flickered out. No matches—so I was punished for not refilling the matchbox by having to walk my 'cycle a long distance in the dark. You all know bits of forgetfulness. They happen so often when one is a child: forgetting to be in time for meals, to say "please" and "thank you," to shut the door after you, to let other people pass through the doors in front of you, forgetting not to shout about the house when someone is ill, forgetting to put books or toys away tidily when done with, forgetting to give up your seat in a tram to a woman or any old person, forgetting somebody's birthday.

Now, what enables us to become more thoughtful as we grow older? Well, first of all practice; and then will, which helps us to remember things at the right time, and to persevere in so doing. If we do not use our wills they grow like slack elastic with no pull in them, and we ourselves become slack-minded and shiftless. And, thirdly, conscience. Do not we all hear its shaming voice when we have been thoughtless, and if we keep on listening to it will it not direct our will, and show us the duty of remembering? Lastly, God's love in our hearts should help our heads, for want of thought or forethought comes largely from our selfishness. Forgetfulness not only may punish ourselves, but may cause trouble to other people. The foolish bridesmaids suffered disappointment at being shut out from the feast; but, worse still, they disturbed the party by their knocking, upset arrangements by their absence, and disappointed the bride and bridegroom. Look again at those bits of forgetfulness above, and see if there is not selfishness at the back of them. Yes, and if we realised how not taking the trouble to think may cause not merely inconvenience but serious injury to others we should never be so unkind as to go on being happy-go-lucky.

A very loving and wise old lady once told my mother that she thought everyone ought to look on forgetting as a crime. It certainly is cruel to forget to feed or take one's dog for a run every day, or to leave the cat unprovided for when the house is shut up. It is worse than trespassing to forget to shut a gate, and so let cattle stray. You may break someone's leg by not remembering to throw orange peel off the pavement. It is very like stealing to forget to return a book lent you. It almost amounts to murder for a signalman to forget to move a signal which should keep one train from crashing into another.

A little girl friend of mine the other day received a post-card asking her to do something for the sender. She was rightly pleased that it began, "You are a reliable little person. Will you remember, &c.?"

Now her reliableness just grows, because she is persevering, and exercises her will in the right way, because she is a conscientious and above all a very loving and tender-hearted child. She is fond of reading, especially poetry and fairy-tales, and of playing, especially "pretending" games. She likes all the jolly things children love, and therefore easily remember to do, but she also seldom forgets, whether she likes them or not, the little practical duties when once learnt, the politenesses and kindnesses which we all need to remember if home and school, and the big world of people and animals are to be orderly, comfortable, happy, and full of kindliness. When she grows up I rather expect she will be the sort of woman Jesus means by a "wise virgin," a bridesmaid who had forethought to enable her to fulfil her love and good intentions, and who went in with the bridal-party to help the happiness of the marriage-feast.

RUSSIA AND JAPAN.

"And inasmuch as the human mind rests not in the limited possession of land, but ever, as we see by experience, desires to acquire more territory, needs must discords and wars arise betwixt kingdom and kingdom."

So DANTE wrote nearly 600 years ago, and he sought the remedy in a universal system of law, presided over by a single officer. Since strife, he argued, may arise between any two princes, one of whom is not subject to the other, there must needs be some third power of more ample jurisdiction, which can embrace and control them both. He was still haunted by the dream of the Holy Roman Empire, and the tradition that it might still "lay upon the nations the yoke of peace"; and he looked to the ideal Emperor to play this part of universal pacificator.

The problem still remains. South Africa, the Far East, the Indian frontier, are so many commentaries on the text: "Inasmuch as the human mind rests not in the limited possession of land." Another solution has been sought in our day; and the Hague Court of Arbitration appears, to many a sad heart, to stand as its funeral monument, just as DANTE'S "De Monarchia" may be regarded as the dirge of that reign of Imperial peace of which it was meant to be the prophecy or the proclamation. In both cases alike the defect was in executive power. The tradition or sentiment of abstract justice and international law is backed by no sustained enthusiasm and determination capable of meeting the fierce emotions (fed alike by the stubborn tenacity of greed and the noble passion of self-sacrifice) which stir nations to their depths when the dogs of war are loosed. And yet—

"To grieve is wise, but to despair

and "hope" still remains the "paramount duty." History tells us that, in its origin, civil and domestic law had either no external sanctions, or quite inadequate ones. Originally, it merely provided a means of escape, for those who wished to avail themselves of it, from the duty of private vengeance, without loss of prestige. To find an honourable means of settling differences or atoning feuds was much. To enforce the adoption of such peaceful methods, or even to enforce the observation of the awards on those who had sought them was a far later step. Indeed, it is only in a qualified sense that we can even now regard it as accomplished.

So with nations. It is something that whenever the matter in dispute is not, in the opinion of the nations concerned, worth fighting for, they shall no longer be driven to war by the supposed dictates of self-respect, and by care for their prestige. In the immense majority of cases in which nations have disputes, each one knows that it would be more to its interest to yield the point in peace, than to gain it by war; but each conceives that surrender would be base in itself, and productive of disastrous consequences. The treaties of arbitration, and the permanent Court at the Hague may confine war to those occasions on which the nations concerned regard the immediate issue as intrinsically worth the risks and losses of war—the risks and losses, and the moral responsibility. The light-hearted estimate formed, in times of national excitement, of those risks and losses, and above all, of that responsibility; the deep corruption and the heavy burdens, the dislocated relations, moral and material, and the evil tradition that follow in the wake of war, must appal us; and the Transvaal War and the war in the Far East show us how far we still are from any such organisation as will enforce the reign of justice and the reign of peace upon the nations; but none the less we repeat:—

"To grieve is wise, but to despair
Is weak and vain."

Into the general questions, whether of policy or of right and wrong, raised by this particular war it is not our purpose to enter in this article; but there is one aspect of the possibilities it opens out which we shall do well to consider. There can, I suppose, be little doubt that Japan aspires to the hegemony, or leadership, of the yellow races. The results of her late war with China seemed to give her promise that she would attain her ambition; but the Western nations declined to regard this as a domestic concern of the Far East, and interposed to defend the "integrity of China." Japan acquiesced only externally. Her alliance with England was a move in the game. We may well ask whether one of the two contracting Powers was not taking part in "a game he did not understand"; but however that may be, it is clear in any case that there is now the sincerest desire on the part of England to escape any serious complications that may threaten to arise from our alliance. Japan will probably have to fight her own battle to the end. But what if she succeeds to the uttermost? What if she becomes the leading Power in the East, and controls the policy and the organisation (the civilisation she can never control) of China? That might mean that China would become a great world power, that the Western nations could no longer bully. We should have succeeded at last, though by most indirect means and quite unintentionally, in moving China, and in conferring upon her, as we have already conferred upon Japan, the most conspicuous outward sign of Western civilisation, namely an effective machinery of slaughter on land and sea. And what then?

King ALFRED, when telling the story of NINUS, King of Assyria, declares of the Scythians that "while they were contending with him they became skilled in war-craft, though ere that they lived a life of innocence; and, thereafter, they gave him grim guerdon for the war-craft they had learned from him." Are we to look for another great period of Eastern invasions, sweeping over Europe? We should indeed receive our "grim guerdon" if it were so. But, for our part, we do not believe it. England and Japan, between them, may teach China many things, but those who know the Chinaman best, know two things of him. First that, when properly handled, he is a magnificent soldier; and second, that he detests the military spirit. China will not send out conquering hordes to swamp Europe, but no one can tell how soon she may so organise her military resources as to negotiate on an equality with Western nations. There is no reason for great apprehensions with respect to our commercial relations with such a reorganised China, so far as these relations are founded on the honest exchange of commodities desired on either side. In this respect the example of Japan is encouraging. But it is certain that the history of this country's relations with China, including that black chapter that deals with the importation of opium, would never have been written, had China been able to defend herself; and who shall say that portions of it may not be obliterated and written over, should she ever attain such a position? It is a grievous reflection that (as we are constantly assured) the balance of the finances of India would be fatally disturbed if the opium traffic with China were closed, and yet more grievous to be comforted by the assertion that the trade has now established itself so firmly that even a free and independent China would not interfere with it. But however this may be, and whatever questions might be reopened, this at least is certain, that, should China ever be able to negotiate on equal terms with the Western Powers, a running sore in the moral life of Europe will be closed. PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

THE CENTENARY OF THE DEATH OF IMMANUEL KANT.

ON February 12, 1804, just one hundred years ago, there passed quietly away from earth the greatest thinker of the modern world. The end came as a merciful release, for the aged man had no desire to linger on, now that bodily weakness had become the prison-house of the mind. It was in the forenoon of a lovely Sabbath that he breathed his last, in the presence of two relatives, two dear friends, and the servant who had taken the place of the faithless Lampe. A gloom fell over the little retired town, and even the humblest of the citizens felt that the Fatherland had sustained an irreparable loss. "The day," we are told, "was clear and cloudless—a day such as Königsberg seldom sees in twenty years, and a bright cloudlet floated in the zenith of the azure sky. A soldier on the Schmiede Brücke, so the story runs, called the attention of the bystanders to what had happened, in that he exclaimed, "See, there is the soul of Kant flying heavenwards!"

Kant's Moral Ideal.

Nothing could be more in accordance with the fitness of things than the ascription of that vision to a soldier. The soldier's ideal of conduct Kant had venerated from his youth upwards, and had elaborated in all his moral teaching. Duty, the root of whose noble descent he could trace in no power short of that "which elevates man above himself and connects him with an order of things which only reason can conceive"—such was the "sublime and mighty name" of the commander he revered, and every detail of his life had been regulated according to the maxim which was his own expression of the categorical Imperative, "So act that the principle of thine action may become by thy will a universal law of nature." Whether or no this rule of conduct be open to the charge of converting human life into a kind of parade exercise, the sterling integrity and lofty tone of character it engenders cannot be called in question. "Whoever will suggest to me a good action left undone, him will I thank, though he suggest it even in my last hour!" is an utterance of Kant's which represents the inner spirit of that rule, the aspect it presents for the soul that contemplates it from within. So regarded, it means rigorous devotion to the work the individual is called upon to fulfil, such an ordering and regulation of daily routine, that neither the confusing medley of mechanical occupations, nor the rebukes of a disquieting conscience, shall be permitted to dissipate the mental composure needful for the discharge of the spiritual service, which each particular member of a "kingdom of ends" is under the obligation of rendering to humanity. How it appeared to those who viewed it from without, as external spectators, may be gathered from the celebrated picture the poet Heine draws of the career with which we are now concerned.

Heine's Picture of Kant.

"The life of Immanuel Kant," writes Heine, "is hard to describe. He had, indeed, neither life nor history in the proper sense of the words. He lived an abstract, mechanical, old-bachelor existence in a quiet, remote street of Königsberg, an old city at the north-eastern boundary of Germany. I do not believe that the great cathedral clock of that city accomplished its day's work in a less passionate and more regular way than its countryman, Immanuel Kant. Rising from bed, coffee-drinking, writing, lecturing, eating, walking, everything had its fixed time; and the neighbours knew that it must be exactly half-past four when they saw Professor Kant in his grey coat, with his cane in his hand, step out of his house door and move towards the little lime-tree avenue, called after him the 'Philosopher's Walk.' Strange contrast between the outer life of the man and his world-destroying thought! Of a truth, if the citizens of Königsberg had had any inkling of the meaning of that thought they would have shuddered before him, as before an executioner. But the good people saw in him nothing but a professor of philosophy, and when he passed at the appointed hour, they gave him friendly greetings, and set their watches going!"

The Centenary Celebrations.

A hundred years have sufficed to prove that the "good people" of Königsberg did well in their day and generation to abstain from shuddering, and that had they done so, it would only have been before a shadow of their own mind's throwing. It is not as "der Allzermalmende," but as the intellectual builder, that cultivated men and women all over the world have united at this time to pay tribute to the memory of Kant. Would that in our country the spirit of his unique personality might rebaptize us to that genuine reflection on the problems of the universe, that patient striving to penetrate to the truth of things, of which in all history there is no more striking and beautiful exemplification! Those, at all events, who are conscious of humanity's indebtedness to the lonely thinker are doing what in them lies to bring it home to the mind and intelligence of the community. In every German university, almost in every German town, Feb. 12 was observed as a day of grateful remembrance. In Königsberg there was a noteworthy gathering of savants, and from Halle there comes to us the earnest "Aufruf" of Professor Hans Vaihinger, the distinguished scholar, who has already done so much towards the interpretation of the Kantian writings, to make it the occasion of a renewed dedication to the study of the Critical Philosophy. The foundation of the "Kantgesellschaft," and the placing of that excellent periodical, the Kantstudien, upon an assured financial footing, will have the effect, it may be predicted, of binding together those who are bent upon the serious pursuit of metaphysical science and the furtherance of the method of inquiry to which Kant was the first to point the way. In France there were similar observances, and the chief philosophical journal, the Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale, is issuing a special number entirely devoted to the centenary, and containing contributions from the leading philosophic minds of the Continent. In England we are, alas! too completely under the sway of the miserable utilitarian idea of culture, which prides itself on being "practical" in a sense very different from Kant's meaning of the word, to render such efforts possible; but the day was at least recognised by the fellows of the British Academy, who considerately invited younger Kantian students to join with them in doing honour to the memory of a master having in the history of speculation no compeers save Plato and Aristotle alone.

Kant's Revolution of Thought.

The Copernican change which Kant introduced in philosophical reflection was, as we now know, much more radical than even he himself imagined. Copernicus, he tells us, being unable to get on in the explanation of the movements of the heavenly bodies, so long as he assumed that the stars moved round the spectator, tried whether he could not succeed better by assuming the spectator to be moving round, and the stars to be at rest. A similar experiment in metaphysics, so far as the ordinary familiar knowledge of objects was concerned, would take the form of asking, whether we should not succeed better if, instead of assuming that all knowledge must conform to objects, we assumed that the objects known must conform to our modes of knowing; or, in other words, if things were not there for mind rather than mind for things. For, on this supposition, he insists, it becomes at once clear how we can make universal and necessary statements in regard to the objects of our experience, whereas on the other supposition the fact that we do so remains an inexplicable enigma. And the result of his minute and laborious analysis of knowledge was to confirm the hypothesis on which it proceeded. The world of experience, he found,—the world in which we live and act and feel and rejoice, and which science explores and describes,—is what it is because it is a world for intelligence, constructed no doubt out of material, given and not created, but constructed, nevertheless, by intelligence and in accordance with the nature of intelligence, and containing as essential ingredients of its structure those links of connection, those modes of relation, those laws of systematic arrangement, which are the very ways in which intelligence comes to know at all, and to be aware of itself as knowing. Intelligence could not live in a world where no intelligence was; were nature suddenly to be relinquished into the hands of an omnipotent Caprice, mind in its presence would lose its sanity and the human race would be converted into a horde of madmen. The principle in us by which we experience and interpret nature must be akin to the principle in nature in virtue of which it is capable of interpretation. And to this principle Kant gave the somewhat outlandish title of the "Transcendental Unity of Apperception," meaning thereby the universal consciousness which forms the basis of every individual self, and which, if it cannot be described as God, is, at all events, closely allied with what Christian theologians have denoted under the name of Logos. God no longer smites us, so to speak, across the void; through consciousness itself we are born into a realm of divine truth, the same and identical for every intelligence, exhibited as a rational world to each individual through the presence in him of that which is not individual.

Knowledge and Reality.

Kant, indeed, did not take the step upon which the bolder idealism of later German speculation ventured, and maintain that the sphere of the knowable exhausted the sphere of reality. And the recent revolt against the extreme conclusions of Hegel, and the consequent "return to Kant" on the part of many who have lived through the Hegelian movement, seem to justify the caution which Kant showed in the development of his position. It is true that the doctrine of things-in-themselves, as he sometimes conceived it, has succumbed to the criticism levelled against it. A multitude of unknowable entities per se, acting upon a multitude of equally unknowable minds per se, and through such interaction giving rise to the known world of experience, is a conception wholly irreconcilable with the cardinal principle of the Critical Philosophy, and probably in this crude form seldom entertained by Kant himself. But current reflection seems tending to the conclusion that the nature of the mechanism operative both in nature and in mind does not form part of the known world of experience of which we are aware. On the one hand, if nature in the last resort be reducible, so far as its mere existence is concerned, to a vast collection of atoms or electrons, all that can be said is that these ultimate elements are, and must remain, absolutely outside the range of what we directly experience. We may speculate as to their constitution, we may become convinced as to their actuality, but of them we can lay claim to no such knowledge as we possess of the objects of nature. On the other hand, a similar obstacle confronts us, as it seems to me, in regard to those mental states or occurrences in and through which we become aware of the contents of our known world. Just as, in seeing, we do not behold the organ of sight, so in knowing we do not apprehend the character of the processes by means of which knowledge is possible. As Kant asserted, in another connection, we "cannot know that as an object which we must presuppose in order to know any object." But of one thing we may rest assured. Whatever may be the nature of the mechanism we have referred to, it is not from it, though we were to know it through and through, that we could ever derive the key to an explanation of the universe in which we are stationed. For existence, as such, is the poorest and most abstract of all the categories, and can in no sense exhaust the truth of reality. Knowledge, as Kant was the first clearly to discern, is no mere monotonous copy of the existent machinery that generates it, and we may be devoutly thankful that it is not. Machinery is one thing, knowledge is another; and the machinery, whatever it may be, exists for the sake of knowledge, not knowledge for the sake of the machinery. The reality that attaches to the world of experience is not that of mechanism, but the reality of meaning, of validity, of worth. The course of the known universe is, as Lotze once put it, analogous in this respect to the poetical idea that interests us in some great drama we see developed before us on the stage; its essential truth is the meaning set forth so as to be intelligible to the mind, and it would be a woeful bargain to exchange this fair scene of grandeur and significance for the most accurate acquaintance with vibrating molecules, or undulations of ether, moving with more or less velocity in this and that direction. Knowledge possesses an intrinsic value of its own, a value which it does not derive from any function of photographing some independent world of mechanism; it is itself the higher reality, in relation to which, whatever mechanism there may be in existence is subservient and subordinate.

Truth and Duty.

And as with knowledge, so also with those ideals of duty, virtue and goodness, which Kant found immanent in the soul of man. The source of the moral law and of the objectivity of nature, the orderly and connected way, that is, in which experience comes before us, he conceived to be one and the same, viz., the fundamental unity of Self-consciousness, which renders intelligence and an intelligible world possible. In both cases there is laid upon us an obligation, in the one that of the categorical imperative, in the other that of conformity to the rules of intellectual apprehension. To the highest exercise of intelligence Kant gives the name of Reason. In the department of theoretical knowledge, reason sets for us problems, lays upon us demands, constrains us to seek for unity, completeness, totality in the world of experience. So that even here the ideas of reason are, in a sense, ideals of what should be, of what ought to be; ideals, that is to say, which are gradually being realised as we proceed in the search for truth, although such realisation never is, and never can be, fully attained. And in the field of moral practice, the function which reason discharges is very similar. Here, too, reason sets for us problems, imposes upon us commands, constrains us to seek that form of consciousness which ought to be. There is, indeed, one important difference, for whilst the problems of knowledge remain problems, however much we may more or less succeed in solving them, the problems of practice can be, and are, completely solved every time a purely moral deed is willed. The point, however, I wish now to emphasise is that of the common origin. For it sheds a new light upon that grand apostrophe of the philosopher's which is probably the most widely familiar of all his sayings: "Two things fill me with an ever-increasing wonder and awe, the starry heavens and the sense of moral responsibility in man." We can now see why he links these apparently disparate contemplations together; they are but divergent ways in which the one supreme principle of self-consciousness expresses itself and reveals its meaning. The new teacher, for whom Emerson sighed, who should "see the identity of the law of gravitation with purity of heart," and show that "Ought, that Duty, is one thing with Science, with Beauty, and with Joy," had in fact, then, already appeared. The vindication had, moreover, extended further than Emerson anticipated. For just as Kant's ethical philosophy finds its highest expression in the maxim, "Duty for Duty's sake," so, as we have seen, his theoretical philosophy may be said to find its highest expression in the maxim, deeper, indeed, in meaning than is usually implied, "Knowledge for Knowledge's sake."

Kant's Incomparable Method.

But, perhaps, the richest legacy Kant has bequeathed to us consists not so much in the results he actually reached, as in the method he employed to reach them. Once awakened from his "dogmatic slumber" by the scepticism of Hume, he realised to the full that further advance in speculative construction was only to be made on the secure and certain lines of exact research. In opposing Criticism to Dogmatism, he gave a new bent to philosophical investigation, and set it on a path where fruitful problems could be proposed and valuable work done in the effort to solve them. Briefly, the opposition came to this, that it was perfectly futile to attempt to deal with the facts of knowledge and reality, without a previous examination of the notions (such as identity, difference, cause, purpose, end, and the rest) we are constantly using in our interpretation, so as to determine their meaning, significance, and range of application. After a hundred years, we find ourselves still confronted with the old antithesis which Kant sought to reconcile—the antithesis of Matter and Spirit, of Necessity and Freedom, of mechanical law and moral worth. Since Kant's time, the outlook both upon nature and man has been immensely widened—upon nature, by the modern theories of Evolution and Development; upon man, by the rise and progress of history as a scientific pursuit, and the mass of material it has brought to light illustrative of the making and growth of the human mind. A "Critique of the Historical Reason" remains to be written, which shall show how it is possible that the mechanical system of things can be so adapted to the rational life of the human race as to serve as means for the embodiment and realisation of the ideals of Morality, of Art, of Religion. To the fulfilment of this task, the dilettante dogmatisms of popular philosophising, under whatever specious sectarian names, can contribute nothing. It will be accomplished, if at all, only by the patient labours of those who pursue their work as men of science, in the larger sense, and according to the method which Kant called the method of Criticism.

G. DAWES HICKS.

WE do not find our friends till friendship springs up in our own hearts. How should we find God except through sonship—through the awakened sense of our kinship with Him? And, as He is best known, so is He best shown, by the best men. Have we not found it easier to believe in the reality of goodness after seeing it made alive in good men and women? They are our benefactors, indeed: they reveal to us our own higher possibilities. C. G. Ames.

RATIONALISM AND DEVOTION.

SIR,—I am glad to see Mr. Lummis' reply to Mr. J. H. Wicksteed's letter, but it hardly covers the whole of the ground. The gist of Mr. Wicksteed's letter—I speak from memory, for my INQUIRER has unfortunately gone astray—seemed to be this: We have lost the worshipful spirit, our devotional phrases seem to have a false ring. How are we to recover the spirit of devotion? And the reply he gives is—"By interpreting nature through the poetic faculty." I have nothing to say against this so far as it goes, but does it go far enough? However sufficing it may be for the cultivated leisured few, can such a religion have any effect upon the weary and heavy-laden, the sin-stricken and sorrowful, the down-trodden and hopeless ones who form such a large portion of the population? A short anecdote may introduce what I have to say: A week or two ago a mate in a coasting vessel was in this position, he could do injury to another, but if he refrained he might himself be put in a false position. He hesitated, but at last spared the man. "I don't know why I should do so," he said, "but I know what the preacher I heard last week would have me do, and I'll do it." The dynamic power of Christianity lies in personality; it is a quickening spirit flowing from soul to soul; it had its origin in a supreme personality, whose influence does not fade, though the generations pass and knowledge changes. Of course, if we reject Christianity, we must build anew for ourselves; but I, for one, demur to the assumption that Rationalism is inconsistent with Christianity, and that, judging by your last "Note of the Week," I take to be your position.

If I had written a few days ago, I might have ventured, in my own words, to sketch an outline of a Rational Christianity, but since then I have read in the Hibbert Journal the brief review of Auguste Sabatier's posthumous work, "The Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit," which we are shortly to have in an English dress, and from that inspiring writer I will venture to produce a few conceptions of Rational faith.

God, as evolved in Hebrew thought—first as Power, then as the Moral Authority, and then as Love as revealed by Jesus: "Being revealed to Jesus as Father, God was so revealed to men in general."

The authority of Jesus is to be found in his teaching, in the influence of his personality, "and the conquering charm of his love." "The guide, strength, and sustainer which Jesus gave to his disciples was the spirit of the Father that abode in him and would abide in them. The dogma which makes a metaphysical entity of the Holy Spirit paralyses that spirit, and thwarts its dynamic influence on the Christian life." Jesus becomes the object of Christian faith and love in his supreme God-consciousness, the shining forth of the presence of God in him.

This spirit is historically determined. "It is the spirit of the Father which was in Jesus Christ, and it manifests itself in a spirit of truth, of moral sincerity, of perfect righteousness, and of universal love for others." "The spirit becomes in every child of God an inward light, a secret light from within outwards renews the soul, exalts its powers, and sanctifies the whole life; this is the new gospel, the religion of the spirit. This is apostolic Christianity presented from cover to cover of the New Testament."

The Christian consciousness, in which sin is a very real factor, is formed "by the antithesis of the sense of moral separation from God and that of a happy reconciliation with Him. The passage from one to the other is the passage from darkness to light, from death to life, and the religious consciousness of Christ becomes ours, works in us this change, which is a true moral resurrection."

"The criterion of Revelation is not that it is found in a book or church, but that it must be able to repeat and continue itself as an actual revelation and an inward experience in the consciousness of every Christian."

"The Church and other Christian institutions are not to be set up as an authority between the soul and God, but should stand for the principle of the duty of the strong to help the weak."

I need hardly add that this teaching implies the doctrine of personal immortality, which is also supported by the best psychology of to-day.

Here, then, are the outlines, I venture to say, of a rational faith that can appeal to every heart as well as mind. It may be well for us to do as Isaac did, to meditate at eventide at our tent door in the presence of the stars. But not in solitude shall we find salvation or the highest truth. Christianity is a social gospel; our object in life should be to work for the coming of the kingdom. If the tone of mind expressed by Mr. Wicksteed may be regarded as the present attitude of Unitarianism, I would venture to point to the above as the conclusions of a Free Christianity. Hitherto the two terms have been regarded as interchangeable; perhaps in this century there may be a parting of the ways. Christianity, I venture to think with Sabatier, has all the contents of the ultimate religion. Well might he say after writing the last words of his book: "My work is done; I may die now."

OTHER CORRESPONDENCE.

ON the subject of "Dr. Warschauer and 'Nunquam'" Mr. F. E. Willis writes again, commenting on the "pontifical tone" of last week's letter: other questions raised by him and another correspondent will, we trust, be sufficiently answered by Dr. Warschauer's series of articles begun in our present issue.

Mr. Walter Brooks, of Ainsworth, writes on the subject of Sacerdotalism in our churches, which he thinks is encouraged by the wearing of a special ministerial garb, and by the use of reading desk or lectern as well as pulpit in the conduct of service.

WILLIAM BLAKE.

THE exhibition of works of William Blake at present being held at the Carfax Gallery in Ryder-street, affords us one of our too infrequent opportunities of seeing and enjoying the paintings of a great artist, who was also in his own way a philosopher. Everything Blake did was with a purpose, and we feel in the presence of his pictures that he means to communicate more than ideas of beauty, beautiful as many of the paintings are. He delivers a message, and a few square inches of colour on paper or copper contain a world-theory. He snatches us into the realm of great convictions, great imaginings. We behold the secret of mighty deeds, the creative impulse of things fair and terrible. We watch the working of the same tremendous forces which bewilder us in the world of familiar experience, and we come out as from the Interpreter's House, with a more vivid perception of the meaning of the troubled beauty of our common life. It is to those who feel the terrible aspects of existence that Blake makes his appeal: to those whose life is a quiet walk along easy paths he must seem wild, and his work exaggerated.

To single out one of Blake's tremendous imaginings, which is illustrated in several of the pictures, we may note the two water-colours, Job confessing his presumption to God, and Elohim creating Adam, and the coloured print, "The Ancient of Days." In the last we have a venerable, yet strong figure of One kneeling in the sun, which is surrounded by a broken circle of fierce flame; down through the lower rim of the disc, reaching out through the flames into the outer darkness, stretches to its full length, tense, untremulous, and firm, an arm ("my great power and my outstretched arm."—Jeremiah). The hand grasps a pair of compasses, wrought from living fire, which revolve in the gloom to circumscribe from chaos a world of light. The unlimited reach of omnipotence is strained to the uttermost to create.

Blake was bold; he did not fear to feel and express sympathy with the Most High. This is very manifest in the picture, Elohim creating Adam. The man lies prone on the ground, the breath not yet breathed into him; coiled round his limbs the earth spirit, the serpent. Elohim, hovering above him, is yet gathering the cold earth, to form and fashion the human head. Here we have audacious, imaginative realism. But the whole force of the artist is reserved for the face of Elohim, in which we read the meaning of those eager hands working from the ground to a man. For in the pre-occupied face, full of mighty purpose, we behold not hope alone, but fear. A human soul is to be. To what end? Earth and spirit. Shall it be Godward for a perfect communion? The creation of man is a mighty venture of faith. Man must not fear, says the picture, to have sympathy for God.

The trilogy is completed by the picture of God and Job. Darkness below, radiant confusion above. It is the moment when the Divine has confounded the human with unanswerable questions. Job replies, "I am vile; I will lay my hand upon my mouth." But he is bidden to gird up his loins, to leave that crouching posture. Omnipotence has crushed him, and cannot lay aside omnipotence. Yet God needs Job, as Job needs God. For Job is work of God in order to be his intimate fellow worker. The forefeeling of expectation in the creation is intensified. Until man rises to his possible power the fear implied in the creative act is not allayed. In these three pictures we find a great drama. Still incomplete; still full of appeal; for the Divine has not yet received in full measure the sympathy and understanding of the human. That may not be a correct theology, but it is the true humanity and great poetry of William Blake.

Almost every picture rivets the attention, and although the too short catalogue is over-long to recite, we may mention two. In the Oberon, Titania, and Puck, the laughing mischievous boy is perhaps the most entirely pleasant sight in the gallery. A leaf from the prophetic book, Jerusalem, appeals to lovers of Blake for many reasons, for it enables us, as it were, to step into his workshop and watch his processes, with a reminder that there is originality in his every method. The illustrations in the margin, the letters themselves bitten by him into the metal, and the page thus printed, coloured by hand, help us to feel that all of this is the man, the mind to create, the eye to see, and the hand to work out the imagining; that in this we have not the division of labour, but the more fruitful concentration of work.

B. KIRKMAN GRAY.

THE suffering of the unemployed and those dependent upon them is severe in the Manchester district. At the newly instituted Municipal Employment Bureau over 2,850 men have registered their names. They are all anxious for work, but only about 180 places have been found for them. The Trades' and Labour Council, the Independent Labour Party, and the Social Democratic Federation are among the number of working men's organisations which have expressed satisfaction at the establishment of the Bureau: some urge its extension to women, and advocate that an organised plan for providing useful work shall be adopted. The Improvement Committee of the Corporation has decided to proceed at once with a number of new roads that need to be made, and to employ men whose names are registered at the Labour Bureau.

THE Rev. John Mellor, Superintendent of the Sheffield South Circuit of the Methodist New Connexion, who died on Monday, after sudden illness, was a younger brother of the Rev. William Mellor, of Huddersfield. "Sturdiness combined with mental vigour," says the Christian World, "and his underlying gentleness of heart, gave him weight of utterance and influence in both circuit and connexional life." Mr. Mellor was fifty-eight years of age, and had attained the highest honour in his communion, being President-elect of Conference.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

THE GRAND BAZAAR.

ONE experiences a little timidity in placing before readers of THE INQUIRER an account of any movement which has a direction toward their purses. Were the case exceptional, the present writer, confident in the repeated declaration that Unitarian money tumbles precipitately into a good case, would be mercilessly bold in what must assume the character of an implicit appeal. But, unfortunately, he is restrained by the knowledge that other Unions besides his own are plagued with similar needs and can adduce an equally reasonable claim for their satisfaction. He had a dream aforetime of one great denominational effort to put our various associations on a firm financial basis, but, waiting for a powerful advocate, he has been left to write this letter on a particular undertaking.

The East Cheshire Christian Union, at its annual meeting at Ashton-under-Lyne, in March, 1902, resolved to organise itself for the raising of £5,000 by means of a bazaar, to be held in Manchester in 1903 or 1904. As many readers are aware, local circumstances a year ago caused the general committee to decide that the bazaar should be held in the autumn of the present year. The original resolution, defining the objects of the bazaar, states that of the sum thereby raised, "not less than one-half shall be appropriated by the governing body of the Union for investment to be held in trust, the interest of which shall be applied to the general purposes of the Union, and the remainder shall be used for assisting congregations in the Union to build churches, or pay off building debts, or otherwise, as the Union may direct."

Against the proposal for providing an endowment for the Union, as against the general principle of endowment, many readers would probably make objection. Yet, when it is considered that for some years the Union has been over-spending, and still has been unable satisfactorily to support its weaker churches and to enlarge its missionary efforts, no exception will be taken by those who value the continuance of congregations which exist to preserve liberal religious faith, and undertakings which aim at its extension. It is lamentable that the Union has been unnaturally limited and crippled in its missionary work for want of an adequate annual income. There is in its somewhat indeterminate geographical area more than one town of good population in which an effort for the establishment of a new congregation might be made, but which cannot be attempted under present financial conditions. The more effective promotion of our principles in the district is a matter not so much of workers and enthusiasm as of money and businesslike enterprise. Workers we have; we want money, and a successful bazaar will rid the officials of the Union of much anxiety, and place in their hands a powerful instrument for the performance of their general work.

The immediate cause of the bazaar effort is the needs of the congregation at Ashton-under-Lyne. This congregation, originated in 1897, has for nearly seven years made steady progress and increased its financial resources. Apart from its contribution to the maintenance of its religious services and associations, it has paid the original cost and the expenses of maintenance and improvement of its present temporary building—a matter now of nearly £400—and has actually raised besides nearly £1,000 for the fund of its future permanent building. The want of adequate premises has been felt severely for several years, and the Union is determined that the congregation shall, without unavoidable delay, be properly housed and equipped. The reader will understand the reticence of the minister of this congregation in furnishing no more an a plain statement in this connection.

There are several other congregations in the Union which might in many ways derive great advantage for their work from the assistance which it is believed the success of the bazaar will at least enable the Union to render.

For the various objects which the Union has in view the sum of £5,000 is certainly required, and it is hoped that this amount may be raised before the end of October.

I can report on the activity of the constituent congregations. Most of them are already hard at work, and intend giving a good account of themselves. The spirit of emulation is rising among them, and they are making willing responses to the many calls made upon them by the bazaar committee. The Sunday-schools are working with the congregations with which they are connected, and, apart from what they may effect in this relation, have decided to promote a Schools' Stall.

One has to recognise that much of the success of an undertaking of this character necessarily depends upon the help which outside friends are willing to contribute. Unfortunately, very few donations have been received as yet, but the officers are confident that their appeal will find generous givers during the coming months. Of workers for the bazaar itself, many are to be found in congregations outside the Union. For example, most of the members of the Art Stall committee, which is ready to accept almost anything—from a Turner to a picture postcard—were promoters of similar work at the great Manchester Bazaar. It is especially to be noted that the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire has thrown in its lot with the Union, undertaking to provide a stall. The matter has been taken in hand by a strong committee of ladies, whose very names are a sufficient guarantee of its success, and a working party is meeting fortnightly in the Memorial Hall. There can be no doubt that such assistance, readily and willingly accorded, will very materially further the effort of the Union, while its effect upon our congregations is already stimulating and inspiring.

A letter of this kind, which goes forth as a sort of encyclical to THE INQUIRER'S whole world, may strike at the centre, and hazard the hope that some of our London friends may be persuaded to labour on behalf of East Cheshire as they did for Manchester. The Union is not financially a powerful organisation; it has not a single church which in itself is distinctly wealthy; it embraces many congregations which are poor. But it has the will, through men and women devoted to the cause it represents, to labour faithfully in enterprises for which it now seeks effective means. Without extensive support in this particular undertaking it may not achieve all that is desired. With my fellow-workers I look forward hopefully to the generous sympathy of the public, not only the Unitarian, but that which –and with joyful surprise I have more than once found it in this district—appreciates effort on behalf of religious principles and ideas plainly expressed.

WILLIAM C. HALL.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Cardiff.—The annual general meeting of the congregation was held on Monday, February 8, under the presidency of Mr. G. Carslake Thompson. The report and accounts for the past year were read and adopted. The report referred to the ministerial vacancy caused by the resignation of the Rev. J. Tyssal Davis; to the kindly supervision of the pastoral affairs of the church for three months by the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, when the pulpit was occupied by the Rev. James Harwood, London; to the call of the ministry of the Rev. W. Whitaker, of Leicester; to the induction services on December 6 and 7, when congratulations were received from all parts of the country; to the steady and efficient manner in which Mr. Whitaker is carrying on his ministerial duties. The report also referred to the ever-increasing influence of the Sunday-school, to the good work done by the Band of Hope, and to the handsome help received from the ladies' sewing circle, through whose kindly efforts, two sales of work have been held during the year, enabling the ladies to hand over the sum of £117 to the church funds; and the report concludes with an acknowledgment of the great help received during the year from the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The officers and members to serve on the committee were then appointed, and Mr. Whitaker addressed a few encouraging remarks to the congregation, in which he emphasised the importance of regular and punctual attendance at the services, and whilst commending the various most useful institutions of the church to the hearty support of the members, urged, as of primary importance, the attendance at the Sunday devotional services.

Halstead.—After service on Sunday, at which the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards was the preacher, the annual business meeting was held. During the past year nine large copies of the latest edition of the Bristol Tune Book, for the use of the Church band, had been bought, and a quantity of crockery, which much reduced the balance in hand compared to last year.

Heaton Moor.—On Sunday last the Rev. Priestley Prime conducted a memorial service for the late Mr. Edward Ashworth, a supporter of the Heaton Moor movement from the beginning, and, until his retirement through failing health a year ago, the chairman of the congregation. A number of friends attended in sympathy with the family and in respect for Mr. Ashworth. The text of the sermon was: "We have no abiding city here, but we seek that which is to come." The "Dead March" was played.

Horwich.—On the first Sunday in the month the Nonconformist ministers in the town had their annual exchange of pulpits, and collections were taken on behalf of the District Nursing Association. The Rev. R. C. Moore took the evening service at the United Methodist Free Church. He also addressed the Men's Bible-class in the afternoon on "Wesley's Services to Mankind." His pulpit was occupied by one of the Congregational ministers. Following upon the exchange a united Communion service was held in the Independent Methodist Church, which was largely attended. The Wesleyan minister gave the address, and Mr. Moore offered the closing prayer. Such exchanges are productive of much good. Last Saturday evening an entertainment, provided by the teachers and scholars in aid of the prize fund, passed off successfully. On Sunday evening Mr. Moore read the Pastoral from the Committee of the National Conference in place of the Second Lesson. Next Tuesday the Rev. H. V. Mills (of Kendal) is to deliver the first of three lantern lectures on "Evolution and Religion"; and on the last Sunday in the month the eighth anniversary of the opening of the church will be celebrated.

Kidderminster.—On Sunday, the 7th inst., the Rev. Priestley Evans held services in commemoration of the centenary of the death of Dr. Priestley, the subjects of his sermons being:—Morning: "Priestley, the Scientific Pioneer"; evening: "Priestley, the Religious Pioneer." On Sunday morning, the 14th inst., Mr. Evans preached on "Public Worship," and in the course of his sermon read the "Address" or pastoral letter on the subject issued by the National Conference Committee. During the winter a monthly service for the people has been held on the second Sunday evening in every month, and when the weather has been favourable they have been exceedingly well attended and much appreciated.

Leicester (Appointment).—Miss G. von Petzold, M.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the ministry of the Free Christian Church, Narborough-road, and will enter on the duties about the end of August.

Liverpool: Ullet-road.—Last Sunday the Rev. J. Collins Odgers entered on his ministerial duties as successor to Dr. de Beaumont Klein. At the morning service he prefaced his sermon with a few remarks appropriate to the occasion. He said that on that day, in accordance with the invitation extended to him, and relying upon the divine help and mercy, he commenced his ministry in that place, and if he kept in view nothing else than the responsibilities attaching to that office and the solemn duties they had asked him to fulfil, his mind might certainly misgive him as he turned over a new chapter in his life's history and set his hands to fresh tasks in unfamiliar fields. But there were three considerations which, whilst they humbled him, gave him renewed confidenee both in the message which he brought and in his own power to labour among them in the cause of God and of humanity. The first of these was that he knew their kindness of heart towards all who exercised among them the pastoral office; he knew also how noble and honourable were their traditions. He would not rehearse to them their own religious history, nor recite to them the names of many whose memories were still justly revered and loved, and whose virtues were recorded on the walls of their own cloister; but he would say that any participation in the traditions of that worshipping assembly, and in the rich associations which clustered around its history could not depress, but must rather upraise, strengthen, and refresh every one who was privileged to share in them. And so, instead of meeting them that day with the burden of misgiving and foreboding in his heart, he was uplifted into a new atmosphere of joy and hopefulness, because he was grafting himself upon their stock and deriving strength and courage from their rich inheritance of holy memories. There was another thought which gave him confidence that day. To efface oneself was the preacher's first duty; he must lose himself in his message, and forget himself in the desire to move the souls of others. The truths which he uttered were greater than he; the doctrines which he held existed before he had birth; and the life which he endeavoured to build up in his hearers was fully exemplified long ago for all time in Jesus Christ. So the speaker might be nothing, might be left out of account altogether, but his words might have power somewhere and at some time to awaken slumbering souls or to heal sad and bleeding hearts. Yet another consideration gave him confidence. They came thither to worship rather than to listen to a preacher's views; they came to lift their thoughts to the throne of the Infinite Father, to sing His praise, and to await His answer in the depth of their souls, rather than to gauge the extent of their agreement with, or dissent from, their minister's statements and surmises. They came thither not to obey the demands of conventional usage nor to avoid the rebuke of a censorious world, but because, amidst life's duties, sorrows, and trials, they desired to catch some note of a diviner harmony, and to experience even there something of the very peace of heaven. In the holy rites of worship he gladly joined with them, and sought to lose himself in the joy and in the service of an adoring throng. And so he was emboldened to put aside all misgiving, even the consciousness of his own feebleness, and place his trust in that Divine Power which alone could direct his efforts and wing his words aright. A preacher never knew how nor when nor where he touched the depths of human hearts; all results he must leave to a Higher Power. He could but pray that both he and his people might together be borne along upon the tide of the spirit out into the full ocean of the Love Divine, onwards towards those peaceful shores upon which fell the radiance of the fadeless light. Mr. Odgers then proceeded to speak from 1 Cor. xiii. 3: "And now abideth Faith, Hope, Love, these three, but the greatest of these is Love." He showed how Faith in a person or in a principle surpassed Belief in the truth of a proposition. Faith involved more than the exercise of the intellect, it was the apprehension of divine things by every faculty of the conscious being. Speaking of Hope, he referred to the young, and stated that in his public ministrations he should endeavour to have them always in remembrance. But Love was the greatest. High up over the entrance of their church was to be seen the best and noblest symbol of a pure, beautiful, and unselfish love. It was the figure of Jesus (Thorwaldsen's Christ) holding out his hands lovingly, invitingly, beseechingly, to the weary sorrowing men and women of his time and of all times, and his attitude could not but remind them of his words "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Might that church be ever ready to extend the hand of fellowship and sympathy to all who came within its doors, and become a true religious home to many a storm-tossed soul. The subject of the evening sermon was "A Helper of Your Joy." On Thursday evening a congregational soirée was held in the Church Hall to offer a welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Odgers.

London: Mansford-street.—Among the "Minister's Notes" which the Rev. John Ellis contributes to the February Calendar and Monthly Messenger of his church, we find the following:—"It should be encouraging to the young men to know that their Sunday afternoon class will be conducted by Oxford students during the next term. They have already had the pleasure of meeting Mr. F. Hankinson, Mr. H. Dawtry, B.A., and Mr. A. Golland, M.A. These gentlemen have thoroughly enjoyed their visits to Mansford-street, and are creating enthusiasm amongst their fellow-students. Their successors will give special attention to the Young Men's Class. Dr. György, a Hungarian, will be with us during February, and will speak to the class on the history and religious development of his own countrymen. This contact with the life of Manchester College, Oxford, should be a most valuable mental stimulus to our young men, and I hope they will take full advantage o their opportunity." f

London: Stratford.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Monday, Feb. 8, Dr. Herbert Smith in the chair, supported by the Revs. Henry Gow, H. Woods Perris, T. E. M. Edwards, W. H. Rose, and J. H. Wicksteed, Messrs. E. F. Grundy, T. Elliot, and others. The report stated that, notwithstanding several losses, there was the same number of members on the books as last year, viz., twenty-five, and that three more had expressed a desire to join. The morning attendance averaged thirty, including a fair proportion of adults, and the evening forty to fifty. Particulars were also given as to Sunday-school, Young People's Guild, and the Temperance Guild and Band of Hope. The Young People's Guild (manuscript) Magazine was still being published monthly. The financial statement showed that an accumulated debt of £15 had been cleared off by a sale of work, and that a balance remained in hand. Some decorative repairs were urgently needed. Grateful thanks were tendered to the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards and W. H. Rose, Mr. T. Elliot (who was delivering a course of eight sermons on "Unitarian Christianity"), and others for their valuable services, and also to the London District Unitarian Society and the Provincial Assembly for their help. Dr. Herbert Smith, in moving the adoption of the report, spoke encouragingly of the work which was being carried on, and referred to the impetus it would receive, if, after being fourteen years without a settled minister, one could be placed in sole charge of the church. Addresses were also given by the Rev. Henry Gow, Mr. Grundy, the Revs. H. Woods Perris, W. H. Rose, and others.

Park-lane (near Wigan).—The Ancient Chapel (built in 1697) was reopened on Saturday and Sunday, the 6th and 7th insts., after undergoing extensive repairs. The walls of the building have been raised, the chapel has been re-roofed, the old school attached to the chapel has been replaced by a commodious vestibule and vestry; and, altogether, whilst the ancient appearance of the structure has been preserved as much as possible, it nevertheless seems new. On Saturday afternoon a crowded congregation assembled, and were led in their devotions by the Rev. A. W. Fox, of Todmorden. The Rev. A. Gordon preached a most appropriate and eloquent sermon from the words "My Father worketh even until now, and I work" (John v. 17), in the course of which he noticed the various changes of thought which had characterised the congregation at different periods of their existence; and in conclusion appealed to his hearers to remember that their work was not done yet; it lay in the future. After tea, a public meeting was held, when the Rev. J. E. Stead, resident minister (who presided), the Revs. A. Gordon and A. Fox, delivered addresses, which were much appreciated. Mr. Fox caused some amusement by reminding his audience of his early life spent in their midst; his father, the Rev. George Fox, having been minister there for over a quarter of a century. On Sunday, the 7th, the devotional service in the morning was conducted by the Rev. J. E. Stead, and the sermon was preached by Rev. A. W. Fox, who also conducted the whole of the afternoon service. On Sunday, the 14th, the annual distribution of prizes took place, when thirty girls and thirty-five boys were rewarded for unbroken attendance during the previous year. The prizes were distributed by Dr. Winstanley. Mr. J. T. Bate received a gold albert for fourteen years' regular attendance. The special feature this year, however, was the phenomenal attendance of Mr. W. Shaw, who has completed twenty-five years of unbroken attendance at Park-lane Sunday-school. The scholars and teachers felt some special recognition was called for, and therefore subscribed for a splendid gold pendant, which Dr. Winstanley presented to Mr. Shaw. Mr. Gorton, the superintendent, also made a presentation of an enlarged photograph of himself in a massive gold frame, which he thought would be most acceptable to Mr. Shaw, who had been for many years in his (Mr. Gorton's) class. Mr. and Mrs. Stead also contributed their share in the form of an oil painting, by Mr. Stead, of the old chapel and schools, so faithfully attended by W. Shaw. It was a unique experience in the history of Park-lane chapel and Sunday-school.

Pontypridd.—A very successful social tea, followed by a miscellaneous entertainment, was held at the Lesser Town Hall on Thursday, Feb. 11, when about 70 sat at the tables, and the musical programme which followed, including a rendering of W. T. Stead's "Cinderella" by children of the Sunday-school, was much enjoyed.

Ringwood.—Miss Spencer, of Southampton, gave a very interesting lecture in the schoolroom of St. Thomas' Chapel, on the 11th inst., on "Recollections of a Tour in Hungary," illustrated with lantern views. The audience included several members of other churches, who were thus afforded an opportunity of learning the estimation in which the Unitarian Church is held in Hungary, as one of the State religions, with a Bishop.

Southport (Welcome Meeting).—On Monday evening, February 10, a soirée was held in the schoolroom of the Portland-street Church to welcome the new minister, the Rev. Frederick B. Mott, and Mrs. Mott. Mr. A. S. Thew, Chairman of the Council, presided, and on behalf of the congregation offered a very cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Mott. For the last twenty years, he said, they had been singularly fortunate in having a minister of most devotional character and warm sympathy, a man who had led a beautiful life amongst them, and he was delighted to think that in Mr. Mott, who brought with him across the Atlantic an excellent record of work done, they would have a worthy successor to Mr. Wellbeloved. Mr. C. E. Hudson and Dr. Harris joined in the welcome, and were followed by the Rev. John Chater (Congregational minister), who said that though he could not claim to represent any particular church, he thought he represented that modern spirit of charity and toleration which was gaining ground in all Christian churches. The charity he meant was not a make-believe charity that shut its eyes to the differences of faith and policy that they held, and made what he called flimsy and useless compromise; but the true, manly charity that, recognising and being intensely loyal to the essential truths that each held, still recognised the spiritual brotherhood that was held by all persons in all churches that were seeking the cause of God and righteousness in this world. He spoke as a Nonconformist, and earnestly insisted on the present need for fidelity to their great principles of liberty of conscience and hatred of oppression and injustice. He had worked with two former ministers of that church, and assured Mr. Mott of kindly co-operation on the part of the Nonconformist churches of the town in all movements for the welfare of the people. The Revs. H. D. Roberts and H. W. Hawkes, on behalf of the District Association, and the Liverpool churches and ministers, joined cordially in the welcome; and Mr. H. B. Jaggar, secretary of the congregation, also spoke, and read a letter of good wishes from Mrs. Wellbeloved, who said that if Mr. and Mrs. Mott were supported by the congregation as loyally as she and her husband had been they need have no fear as to the prosperity of the Church. The Rev. F. B. Mott gratefully acknowledged the welcome tendered to him and Mrs. Mott from so many sides. He spoke of his Unitarian and Nonconformist ancestors in the old heroic days, and of the great future that awaited their strong affirmative faith. A musical programme followed the speeches, and a very pleasant evening was brought to a close.

AN article by Mr. H. W. Lucy in the current number of Cornhill, on "Some Empty Chairs," furnishes some pleasant reminiscences of the late Sir John Robinson. One passage will be of special interest to our readers. Having referred to Sir John's early appointment as sub-editor of a Wiltshire weekly, Mr. Lucy continues:—

> Thence he migrated to a similar position on the ENQUIRER, organ of the Unitarian community, which he joined as a boy. Work on the ENQUIRER was not sufficient to engage the full time of a strenuous youth. Robinson managed to obtain some connection with Douglas Jerrold's weekly, and secured an appointment as London letter writer for an American journal.

When THE INQUIRER was first established there was a discussion in the household of its first editor, as Mr. Hodgson Pratt told us, on the occasion of our sixtieth anniversary, in July, 1902, whether the name of the new journal should be spelled with an "I" or an "E." Some occult reverberation of that battle must have confused Mr. Lucy's pen, for E did not win the day. It has been INQUIRER from the first.

REFERRING to our report last week of Mr. Gordon's Centenary address on "Dr. Priestley among his Friends," a correspondent writes to say that "the origin of the name of the Lunar Society, mentioned in page 101, was their custom of meeting on the evening of the Full Moon; for the practical reason that roads were not at that time lighted artificially, and the residences of some of the members were situated at some distance outside Birmingham. Two of the members' names need correction of spelling—Boulton and Keir. The former was the partner of Watt in the famous establishment of Boulton and Watt, Soho Foundry, Birmingham, so celebrated in the history of the stationary steam engine. In column 3 of page 101 John Hutton is presumably a misprint for William Hutton."

WANTED: Missing numbers of the INQUIRER for 1902—March 1, May 31, June 7, and November 29.

SUSTENTATION FUND.—FOR THE AUGMENTATION OF MINISTERS' STIPENDS.

At the Annual General Meeting of Contributors, held in Dr. Williams's Library, London, at 12.30 p.m., on Wednesday, the 10th February, 1904, WM. LONG, Esq., in the chair, the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL proposed, and it was carried in silence—

"That the Annual Meeting of the Contributors to the Ministers' Stipend Sustentation Fund have received the information of the decease of their President, Alderman Rawson, J.P., with the deepest sense of the irreparable loss it has inflicted on the Fund. The warm interest Mr. Rawson took in the well-being of the Congregations, which form the National Triennial Conference, led to the laborious and exhaustive inquiry on which he based the convincing Paper which he laid before its first gathering in Liverpool in the year 1882. By it he earned the permanent gratitude both of Congregations and Ministers, frequently and warmly expressed, as it resulted in the foundation of the Fund which has done such benefit to both. With never-failing sympathy and zeal he has, since its establishment, devoted his rare business abilities, his exceptional accuracy and generous spirit to the service of the Fund as one of its Managers and Secretaries, and has been called by God to his reward, guiding its councils even to the end of his days as its President.

"The meeting records its gratitude with reverent affection. Its members will always remember the many years of faithful toil which Mr. Rawson has devoted to the accomplishment of the object for which their Society was founded by him, at the same time bearing in mind the unnumbered ways in which he has consecrated his prolonged and honoured years by the constant application of his pure and simple Christian faith and love to the development of earnest and sincere religion in public and in private life.

"In communicating this resolution to Mrs. Rawson and his daughters, they respectfully offer their heartfelt sympathy with them in their bereavement, and pray that the remembrance of his long years of public service and his tender and loving spirit in his home will, together with the widespread recognition of his worth, help them to submit with trustful faith to the bereavement which our Heavenly Father has caused them to endure."

The Annual Report and Balance-sheet were then presented, and the following Resolutions adopted by the Meeting :—

"That the Report and Accounts, as now read, be adopted and printed for circulation among the Contributors and Friends of the Fund.

"That the retiring Managers, Rev. S. A. Steinthal and Mr. A. W. Worthington, whose term of office has expired, having been nominated, and the requisite number of voting papers having been produced, be and are hereby re-elected as Managers of the Fund.

"That a retiring Manager, Rev. Thomas Thomas, having declined re-election, Rev. Wm. James, B.A., J.P., of Llandyssul, a Contributor to the Fund, having been duly nominated, and the requisite number of voting papers having been produced, be and is hereby elected a Manager of the Fund.

"That the Rev. S. A. Steinthal be elected President for the year 1904.

"That the cordial thanks of the Contributors be given to Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke for his services as Honorary Treasurer during the past year, and that he be re-appointed to the office for the coming year.

"That Mr. A. W. Worthington and Mr. Frank Preston be heartily thanked for their labours as Secretaries, and re-elected as Honorary Secretaries for the year 1904.

"That the services of Mr. Edwin W. Marshall, as Honorary Auditor, be gratefully acknowledged, and that he be requested to accept the office for the year 1904.

"That the Contributors heartily thank the Trustees of Dr. Williams's Library, who have generously granted the use of rooms for the Meetings of the Fund during the past year.

"That the thanks of the Meeting be given to the Chairman for his services in the Chair."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

"UNIVERSAL Bible Sunday, March 6, 1904." This announcement meets us at every turn now, and it has recalled the pithy saying of the late Master of Balliol, that "all Christians have at least two things in common. They have the Bible, and they have Sunday."

IN the Sunday at Home for February there is a finely illustrated article on the the "Centenary of the British and Foreign Bible Society," by F. Klickmann. The same writer contributed an article in the Windsor Magazine in one of the early numbers of last year, also full of excellent ilustrations. These are well worth perusal, and the illustrations are certainly valuable for teaching purposes, if for nothing else.

ON Saturday next a very important election takes place, fraught with significance not only for London but for the country at large. The London County Council, which a short time ago was accused of "megalomania" by the late Lord Salisbury, has now, through the action of Lord Salisbury's party, to assume a greater rôle than ever before. It is, indeed, a curious result of the vacillating and ill-considered education policy pursued by Mr. Balfour, that the public body which was advised by his predecessor to commit suicide, and which has never failed to receive opprobrious treatment from a section of the Conservative journals, is now to add to its already vast duties the difficult and burdensome task of acting as the Education Authority for the metropolis.

IT is undoubtedly owing to this development that the efforts being put forth on both sides are on a scale unprecedented. But before we look at that side of the struggle we must remember that it is not merely a School Board that is to be elected. The administration of the laws of local government in matters pertaining to health and housing, for example, demands the services of men of practical experience, and this is but a part of the great work already in the hands of the Council. The improvement of the means of communication which is so imperatively demanded as a remedy for over-crowding, and particularly the management of the tramways, cannot be regarded lightly; and it is a remarkable proof of the confidence of the London electorate in the men and the policy hitherto in power, that although the parliamentary representation is overwhelmingly Conservative, the Council, as a result of its excellent work in these and other directions, has continued to have a Progressive majority.

WE trust this good tradition will not be destroyed this year, though a very determined attack is being made by the "Conservative and Unionist candidates," as those who used to be "Moderates" now style themselves. The attempt to get wind into their sails by thus importing matters of Imperial policy into the struggle deserves to fail, and, we think, will fail. It will assuredly do so if the Progressives and their friends are alive to their opportunities. For was there ever a time when the "Conservatives and Unionists'" colours were more ragged and stained than to-day! If these men, who should be really aspiring not to rule the Empire but to keep London sweet and wholesome to live in, think they gain advantage by hoisting the flag on which they have just added to a crowd of previous dark blots the peculiarly offensive one of Chinese slavery in South Africa, they must have a queer idea of the electors!

WE are confident that if the Progressives only use their chances with ordinary skill their opponents will be as thoroughly beaten as ever, and this in spite of the violent struggles of the "Church" party, which has entered this field, as everyone foresaw, to the serious danger of confusing the issues and impeding the public service. To the credit of some few clergymen, such as the Rev. A. W. Jephson and the Bishop of Stepney, it cannot be laid to the Church as a whole that it is flinging its influence deliberately on to the side that has consistently opposed the policy of greater advantages for the working classes, temperance reform, and general progress. But the kind of thing that is going on is illustrated by the fact that vicars are addressing their congregations from the chancel under orders from the Church authorities, calling upon voters to support the anti-Progressive candidates. Of course, this all arises from the fear entertained lest in some way the Church schools should be injured unless denominationalists are in a majority on the Council. We cannot blame our friends the enemy for looking to their own interests, but all who take broader views, and who desire above all to see justice done to the whole community, not only in the matter of education, but in all others in the power of the Council, will spare no toil to defeat these dictatory priests. London surely has a mind of its own, and will show it next Saturday.

THE prospects of peace in the Near East grow steadily darker. The Bulgarian Government continues to show extraordinary self-control, declaring its absolute reliance on the determination of the Powers both to protect the Principality from Turkish aggression and to secure the execution of the Macedonian reforms. The Porte, on the other hand, continues to make preparations of a nature, and on a scale, which can only mean war in Bulgaria as soon as a convenient pretext can be found, while at the same time seizing every opportunity for obstructing the reforms demanded by the Powers. Quite apart from last week's impudent announcement that "Mussulman religious law makes no provision for the appointment of Christians to command Mussulmans," and that therefore Mustapha Pasha will command the gendarmerie, and not General di Giorgis, accounts are daily to hand of fresh persecutions, producing fresh streams of refugees into Bulgaria. Amnesty for rebels, real and pretended, is withheld, and the work of repatriation of refugees is at a standstill, since amnesty and the abandonment of persecution are, of course, essential preliminaries if the people are to be induced to return. Add to all this the increasing exorbitance of taxation, and you have a state of things which must inevitably produce a fresh outbreak of insurrection when the "snows melt."

MEANWHILE the Albanians, always ready to oblige in such matters at a hint from Yildez, are engaged in a vigorous "revolt" against the pretended imposition of the reforms; and this the Porte will doubtless represent as proof of the impossibility of carrying them through. Of course, it is the pre-occupation of Russia in the Far East which emboldens the Sultan thus to defy the demands of the Powers, and it is clearly the duty of the Western democracies to make up for that preoccupation by the increased vigour of their own diplomacy.

A DETERMINED attempt is being made in the House of Commons to induce the Imperial Parliament to resist the insolent usurpation by the Transvaal Executive, with the countenance of the Home Government, of the right to annul the fundamental principles on which our rule is based. On Monday night the adjournment was moved "for the purpose of calling attention to the promulgation of the Ordinance providing for the introduction of indentured Chinese labour into the Transvaal before the Ordinance and its regulations had been discussed by the House of Commons in their complete and operative form." And the motion was only defeated by a majority of 56. Two small points were gained in the debate. The Colonial Secretary now announces that the "indentured" Chinaman will be "at liberty to break his contract if the nature of his work is disagreeable to him." And he adds that he has taken powers "to prevent the transfer of contracts without the consent of the labourers." Neither of these stipulations is in the Ordinance as now promulgated, but they are to be contained in the Regulations to be made for the carrying out of its provisions.

THE Colonial Secretary refuses to give the House an opportunity to discuss these Regulations before they come into operation. He asks the House to be satisfied with his promise that the Ordinance, though "promulgated," will not come into force till he is satisfied that the regulations "fulfil the pledges which he has given to the House." Any suggestion that this is an unsatisfactory substitute for the direct overhauling of Ordinance and Regulations by Parliament itself is treated by the Colonial Secretary as a personal slight upon his honour. This is preposterous and absurd. Mr. Lyttelton is neither omnipotent nor omniscient. Throughout the ages and throughout the world experience has taught that there is nothing more difficult than to secure that when one man has been given authority over the liberty of his fellow that authority shall be used with justice and mercy. In view of the terrible responsibility he is incurring in sanctioning the importation of these hordes of helpless aliens, Mr. Lyttelton, of all people in the world, should court and invite all the help that Parliament can give him, in assuring the minimum of injustice to these people. If he and the Government wish that the sincerity of their desires and intentions in this matter should be accepted this is the least they can do—submit the whole scheme in all its details to the close and jealous scrutiny of the House of Commons.

BUT details are details, after all, and it is the principle that is the vital matter in this controversy. While Dr. Macnamara's demand is useful and necessary, it is the whole scheme of the Ordinance, and not this or that detail of its provisions, against which we have to fight. Unrestricted Chinese immigration is, for good or bad reasons, intolerable to white Colonists, and Chinese immigration, accompanied by restrictions on the liberty of the individual other than those ordinarily imposed in civilised communities for the prevention of crime, is intolerable to a free Empire. Defenders of the Ordinance have ventured to compare the "indenturing" of these Chinamen with the indentures of a British handicraft apprentice. Sir Thomas Brooke-Hitching, Conservative candidate for the Elland Division of Yorkshire, had the assurance to declare the other day that there was no distinction "other than some minor differences," dependent upon nationality, between the case of the indentured Chinaman and his own when he served as a printer's apprentice.

YET this is how the provisions of the Ordinance have, without exaggeration, been summarised:—

The imported labourers, during the years they reside in the Colonies, will be physically and morally quarantined. They will be closely impounded in their own settlement, absolutely segregated from the rest of the population; never allowed to go out except with the permission of their employer, for whom, and for whom only, they must work until he assigns to another his interest in the animated machinery he has imported [this Mr. Lyttelton now promises shall not be done without the labourer's consent], and compelled, under the heaviest penalties, to render an account of all their movements on demand.

Add to this the following further facts:—

Chinese who leave their employer may be arrested and brought back by force; and any white man succouring a runaway Chinaman commits a crime.

—and you have a state of things which it would be difficult for the most expert casuist to distinguish from absolute slavery—down even to the iniquitous Fugitive Slave Law which brought such intolerable infamy to the North in the days before the American Civil War. Of what practical value is the theoretical right to break his indentures—under a heavy fine—or to object to transference to a new owner, which Mr. Lyttelton promises, likely to be to the Chinaman in such a state of servitude as these conditions imply? The whole system is an abomination, and must be repudiated, lock, stock, and barrel.

THE January number of the Theologisch Tijdschrift contains an interesting article by Professor F. Pijper, of Leiden, on "Women Students in Theology." Women are already found at the Universities among the students in Law and Medicine, then why not, Professor Pijper asks, also in Theology? He then sketches the field of theological study to show how eminently fitted it is to the disposition and capacity of women, and quotes More's "Utopia" and its suggestions of true liberalism in religion and of women priests, as on the side of his plea. Among the liberals in Holland women are already specially appointed as religious teachers, recognised after due examination by the representatives of the Protestantenbond, but the pastoral office has not yet been opened to them. Professor Pijper refers to the women ministers in America, and might have gone further in his statement, for there are there a number of women in regular and sole charge of congregations, and since he wrote, as we announced last week, Miss von Petzold has been appointed in this country minister of the Leicester Free Christian Church. Professor Pijper does not expect the Reformed Church of Holland soon to take so radical a step, but thinks that the Mennonites may lead the way, and he earnestly commends the study of theology at the universities to the enlightened women of his country.

SIR LESLIE STEPHEN, who had been for some time in failing health, passed away on Monday morning, at his residence, 22, Hyde Park-gate, in his seventy-second year. He was a Londoner by birth, the son of Sir James Stephen, of the Colonial Office, and latterly Regius Professor of History at Cambridge. His mother was a daughter of the Rev. John Venn, of Clapham, and Leslie Stephen was brought up in the atmosphere of piety characteristic of the Clapham sect. Its hold upon him does not appear to have been strong, for while he took orders without any difficulty on entering upon his tutorial fellowship at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, he relinquished them a few years later with only a sense of relief, and went his way as a man of letters, little troubled, it would seem, by the deeper questions of human destiny. A first visit to America brought him Lowell's friendship, and in 1871, after having written for some time for the Saturday Review and other papers and magazines, he succeeded Thackeray as editor of Cornhill. This post he resigned in 1882, to take up the great work of editing the "Dictionary of National Biography." After seven years of that arduous labour he left the editing to Mr. Sidney Lee, but continued as one of the chief contributors to the end.

SIR LESLIE STEPHEN'S great gift was as a biographer and literary critic. He wrote the first of the "English Men of Letters" series, on Dr. Johnson, and other volumes on Pope and Swift, and latterly on George Eliot. Another on Hobbes is not yet published. His "Hours in a Library" and "Studies of a Biographer" gather up many delightful essays, while his "History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century," published in 1876, and "English Utilitarians," published in 1900, are more substantial works. In another field was "The Science of Ethics," published in 1882. A new edition of his "Agnostic's Apology" (of which a sixpenny reprint has just been issued) was recently reviewed in these columns. Sir Leslie succeeded Tennyson as president of the London Library, and was also president of the London Union of Ethical Societies.

CRIME and punishment grow out of one stem. Punishment is a fruit that, unsuspected, ripens within the flower of the pleasure that concealed it. Emerson.

"GOD AND MY NEIGHBOUR."

II.—"NUNQUAM'S" AGNOSTICISM.

AMONG the inexpensive fashions of the day prominence must be assigned to the profession of agnostic views. Certainly no method involving less effort of dealing with the root problem of religion could be devised, than that of declaring it to be insoluble, the existence of God a matter past finding out. Such an attitude has the appearance of engaging modesty; it has the further advantage of conferring upon those who adopt it some sort of intellectual distinction—a claim to kinship with minds of the calibre of Spencer and Huxley; and it escapes the odium incurred by the robust and full-bodied secularism of the seventies and eighties.

As a matter of fact, agnosticism of the popular type has no title to considering itself as representative of the Spencerian philosophy, its connection with which rests mainly upon a verbal misunderstanding, arising out of Spencer's use of the word "unknowable." The average Agnostic applies that term to the question of the existence of the Deity; Spencer uses it only of the attributes of that power behind phenomena which he said "we are obliged to recognise," and of which he tells us that it is "without limits in space and without beginning or end in time"; in other words, infinite and eternal. When he speaks of that Power as "unknown and unknowable" he means that it transcends human knowledge and conception, i.e., he employs the term "unknowable," with doubtful justification, in the sense of "incomprehensible," which is exactly what religion has to say about God. But between this philosophical agnosticism and that of the "man in the street" there is a wide gulf fixed.

"Nunquam," to whom we turn after this preliminary excursus, is, it need scarcely be said, not an agnostic in the Spencerian sense. His agnosticism is of the popular species which declares, "I do not pretend to say whether there is, or is not, a God" (p. 122). And, as usual, it is the personality of God, and matters allied therewith, that constitute his chief speculative difficulties: "I cannot believe that God is a personal God, who intervenes in human affairs. I cannot see in science, nor in experience, nor in history, any signs of such a God, nor of such intervention." (P. 10.) That is quite a plain and straightforward declaration, to which there attaches only one single disadvantage, from "Nunquam's" point of view, viz., that elsewhere in his book he has committed himself to a statement involving conclusions fatal to his agnostic position—and it is, I would beg readers to bear in mind, "Nunquam's" agnosticism, rather than agnosticism in general, that I am examining. The statement I am referring to occurs on p. 45, where, after enumerating some of the more elementary facts of astronomy, he remarks: "You will say that all this speaks of a Creator. I shall not contradict you." He even goes on to combat with much heat the notion—which is not entertained by anyone—that "such a Creator" is to be credited with mental or moral shortcomings,

Be this latter as it may, we have here the admission of "Nunquam" that he does not think it unreasonable to infer from the visible world the existence of a Creator, an admission based, if partly on the mere bigness of the universe, partly also on the pervading fact of law—and implicitly, if not explicitly, on a perception of the equally pervading fact of purpose, adaptation of means to ends, which a law-governed world inevitably suggests. When he therefore asks, "What kind of Creator must He be who has created such a universe as this?" we will remind him that, according to the philosopher of evolution, we are within our rights in describing this creative principle as power, as infinite, as eternal; we are, according to Darwin himself, compelled to ascribe to that Power intelligent directive purpose*—a position recently reiterated by Lord Kelvin. Now purpose implies will, and intelligence implies consciousness. And since I have never known intelligence, purpose, consciousness, will, save as the expression of personality; since, indeed, I do not even know what personality is, save as it expresses itself in terms of will, intelligence, purpose, and the like manifestations; I shall at once proceed to predicate of this Creator, whose existence "Nunquam" does not deny, that He is personal. Indeed, I confess myself unable to imagine what "Nunquam" means when he says that he cannot believe in a personal God, unless his notion of personality is that of a finite, corporeal, localisable individual. But that is not the proper definition of personality; and the utmost we can say is that the Divine Personality transcends all human knowledge and conception—which is true, but does not make God other or less than personal.

There is, however, yet another line of thought which at once suggests itself when when we consider the question "How shall we think of God?" a course of reasoning which, though well known generally, has been presented with special clearness and force by Dr. M. J. Savage, in his little book, "Four Great Questions." It arises from the principle which lies at the basis of all reasoning, scientific or speculative, viz., that nothing is ever evolved that was not first involved; that something never came out of nothing; that there can be nothing in an effect that was not first in its cause. If thought exists in us, if consciousness exists in us, if intelligence exists in us, the effects, then, by every law of sound reasoning, these faculties must exist, or something corresponding to them in kind, however much transcending them in degree, must exist, in God, the Cause. Nay, though "Nunquam" tells us that "in face of a knowledge of life and the world" we "cannot reasonably believe" in God as a loving, Heavenly Father, there is this same question of logic to be considered: If love exists in the world, exists as an appreciable factor in human nature, whence did it come? "It evolved": out of what? E nihilo nihil fit; the cause must have been, or there must have been a cause, at least adequate to produce the effect. There is no getting away from this universal law of thought; from an unmoral, unloving First Cause there could not have evolved a race possessing moral instincts or the faculty of unselfish love in however slight a degree. This law, whose validity no one claiming the title of evolutionist can doubt for a moment, simply compels us to think—if only we think hard enough—of the Creator, just because He is the Ultimate Cause, as at least equal to purpose, equal to will, equal to love, and therefore, as we have already seen, equal to personality. It is not thought, but looseness of thought—the slipshod, surface thinking so characteristic of popular agnosticism, that is borne witness to by the fashionable parrot-cry about "not being able to believe in a personal God." That is just what men cannot help believing if they will take the preliminary trouble of reflecting what personality is, and then brace themselves up to the mental effort requisite for the application of a recognised principle to a particular issue.

Readers of the Hibbert Journal will perhaps scarcely need to be reminded that this same principle was applied in the same way about a year ago by one of the most eminent modern men of science, Sir Oliver Lodge, the Principal of Birmingham University, who, speaking of "the intelligence, the will, the emotions, the individuality or personality of which we ourselves are immediately conscious," says: "Shall we possess these things, and God not possess them? . . . Let no worthy human attribute be denied to the Deity."

It is the same high authority who has answered in advance "Nunquam's" expression of unbelief in a God who "intervenes in human affairs." Of course all depends upon what we mean by intervention. If we mean such a thing as Providence catching a falling saint and holding him suspended in mid-air, we shall probably look for such acts in vain. If we mean, however, the raising up at decisive junctures of the world's history of men and women of genius, not to be accounted for simply as products of evolution—a Paul, a Francis, a Luther, a Catherine Booth—and placing them where they were most needed, then it seems to me that the evidence for this kind of Divine intervention is startlingly plentiful. Generally, no doubt, when people talk of God intervening in human affairs they mean some interference with the laws of nature, when the latter are supposed not to be working satisfactorily. So, says Sir Oliver Lodge, might an onlooker, gazing on some mechanical looms, at first wonder why the manager does not step down from time to time to set matters to rights; then conclude that "there is no head manager at all—this thing has always been running," and only on further reflection discover that the guidance and control are really continuous, and not intermittent. "May we not be looking at the working of the Manager all the time, and at nothing else? Why should

* "The impossibility of conceiving that this grand and wondrous universe, with our conscious selves, arose through chance, seems to me the chief argument for the existence of God." From a letter of Darwin's, dated April, 1873. Cf. also Haeckel, "The Riddle of the Universe," p. 93: "The idea of design has a very great significance and application in the organic world. We do undeniably perceive a purpose in the structure and in the life of an organism. The plant and the animal seem to be controlled by a definite design in the combination of their several parts, etc."

He step down, and interfere with Himself?" And he advises us, speaking as a man of science, "to look for the action of the Deity, if at all, then always; not in the past alone, nor only in the future, but equally in the present. . . . We can see Him now if we look; if we cannot see, it is only that our eyes are shut. 'Closer' is He than breathing; nearer than hands and feet'—poetry, yes, but also science, the real trend and meaning of science, whether of orthodox 'science' or not."

To conclude what, I am well aware, is no more—within the limits of space assigned to these papers, could be no more—than a series of hints, which the reader must follow up for himself. A theistic interpretation of the universe, including our conscious selves, appears to offer less difficulties to the understanding, appears to account better for the facts than any other. Even from the premises laid down by Spencer such a conclusion seems to follow, and Fiske drew it, though Spencer himself did not, while the moment we admit a Creator at all, as "Nunquam" does, a theistic interpretation—belief in a personal and conscious God—becomes inevitable. Logically considered, the foundations of "Nunquam's" agnosticism are nil.

There remains, of course, the problem of evil, physical and moral, painted by "Nunquam" in such lurid colours, to be faced, and an answer to be found to the insistent questionings of that age-old sphinx. As the alleged difficulties connected with the personality of God furnish the intellectual, so the real ones arising from the existence and the persistence of evil supply the moral grounds for scepticism. To examine these will be the task of the next of these articles.

FEBRUARY TWITTERS.

A CHILD-SONG.

THE willow-wren is back again,
The tit sings in the tree,
The dormouse stretches in his den
And wonders what can be!
And out he creeps, and loud he cheeps,
So glad is everything,
When over winter's shoulder peeps
The sweet maid Spring.

The elm is drest in russet crest,
And rubies tip the lime;
The wind is blowing from the west
To bring the budding time;
The willow white is silken bright,
The alder-tassels swing,
And nearer, nearer, dances light
The sweet maid Spring.

Come, happy maid, in flow'rs array'd,
Come dance along the lea;
Come, bring the sunshine and the shade,
And bring a song to me;
Come, bring a song, and dance along,
Till all shall dance and sing
And laugh, the merry May among,
With sweet maid Spring.

LITERATURE.

STUDIES IN HELL.*

MR. DODS has shown much diligence in the collection of visions of the world beyond the grave, but his title curiously perpetuates an error which he himself wishes to combat. He tells us, very truly, that Dante's greatness does not consist in the originality of the idea of describing the future world, or even in the material details of his pictures. "It is Dante's manner that demands our praise, his ennobling treatment of material which in other hands was often vulgar, often meaningless, and often merely grotesque." Yet his title implies that Mr. Dods still finds "Dante's forerunners" rather in the authors of the Apocalypse of Peter or the journey of St. Brandan, than in the Troubadours and the Italian Lyrists on the one hand, or Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas on the other. Indeed, of all the works considered in this volume, Vergil's sixth Aeneid is perhaps the only one that gives its writer any better title to be called a "forerunner of Dante" than Pope has to be called a "forerunner of Walt Whitman" because he declared that "the proper study of mankind is man." But of course this does not affect the value of the book. It is by far the most convenient and the most complete collection of future-world visions and pilgrimages with which we are acquainted, and the principle of selection is well conceived and firmly held, though I think the brief but very amusing and typical visit to the infernal regions contained in Lucian's "True History" should have found a place by the side of his "Memippus." The notes and comments added by Mr. Dods often produce a strange effect. He is generally dealing with matter very remote from the plane of our ordinary judgments, and as a rule he leaves us happily enough in our new atmosphere; but from time to time he jerks us back into our own world by suddenly reminding us that something he is relating is "absurd" or "unsatisfactory to the moral sense." And we are still more startled to find the Scriptural references to the descent of Christ into hell (introduced in their proper place in a true historic spirit) suddenly treated as defining "one of the main tenets of our belief" (p. 89). The Latin citations are not always accurately printed, and in a bibliographical note concerning the vision of Wettin, Mr. Dods has manufactured a nominative plural before which Dr. Thomas Kipling's celebrated ablative "paginibus" might hide its diminished head.

In one of the visions recorded by Mr. Dods, Abraham sees on a table a book, "the thickness of it six cubits and the breadth of it ten cubits." I am painfully reminded of this book by Mr. Carroll's volume (of some 500 pages on the "Inferno" alone), and can only hope, for Abraham's sake, either that he was not called upon to review the portentous volume of his vision, or that he was a less conscientious reviewer than your present contributor. Well, there are two main conceptions of the future life: one, that it is a continuation of the present life, in which people do and are (perhaps in a ghostly and attenuated way) what they did and were on earth; and the other, that it is a scene of retribution, in which people get their deserts, or perhaps (as in the case of Dives and Lazarus) their compensations. It was the genius of Dante to perceive that these two conceptions, when profoundly realised, are, in fact, identical. If the man who has made the evil choice really gets the thing he chose, he realises at once the continuation and the retribution of his choice, for he has chosen hell. It is this conception that gives the august sense of inevitableness and impersonality that supports us through all the horrors of the Inferno, and makes us feel that we are in a region not of vindictive hate, but of inexorable fact. On this background Dante's imagination freely plays. The ring of a Scriptural phrase, a popular tradition, or even a false etymology, may suggest details which are often without specific allegorical appropriateness, but are never foreign to the ground tone created by the ethical sense of the meaning of sin and punishment. Now, though Mr. Carroll perceives this fundamental characteristic of Dante's Inferno, he complicates it with a theory of his own that the actual physical passions are perpetuated in hell, though the absence of the physical organs condemns them to perpetual baffling. This horrible conception has been held before, and is, I believe, a serious article in many people's creed; but it is, as worked out by Mr. Carroll, alien from Dante's scheme, and in many cases it seems to me to rob it of all dignity. And, again, the minuteness with which Mr. Carroll endeavours to carry his interpretations into every detail destroys the effect. The reader had far better surrender himself to the atmosphere of the Inferno than exercise his ingenuity in solving a number of riddles, which I am convinced (in the vast majority of cases) Dante never set. But tastes differ, and it is possible that some readers of Dante may find satisfaction in this volume. It is not only that people want different things but they take them in different forms, and possibly Mr. Carroll may have his public like others. Though not exceptionally inaccurate, he is not always to be trusted. For example, there is a loose paraphrase on page 71 from a passage from Thomas Aquinas, marked in single inverted commas, with a reference to the original in the note. It declares that children who died unbaptized, and are incapable of enjoying the vision of God, no more grieve for its loss "than a bird does that it is not an emperor or a king." Our readers, perhaps, will be interested in the subject, and may like to know what Thomas Aquinas really says. He does not dogmatise, but gives a variety of opinions which he thinks unacceptable, the fixed point being a dictum of Augustine's that the suffering or punishment of those who (like children) died unbaptized through no fault of their own, will be the mildest of all. Thomas himself inclines to the view that they will rejoice in the exercise of all the natural faculties of unfallen man, but will not enjoy the vision of God which constitutes the bliss of the redeemed. They will be quite aware that they are deprived of this blessedness, but they will also know why; and they will acquiesce without repining, "just as no wise man is afflicted at not being able to fly like a bird, or at not being a king or an emperor (sicut nullus sapiens homo affligitur de hoc quod non potest volare sicut avis, vel quia non est rex vel imperator): which is quite a different thing from what Mr. Carroll has made of it.

Leaving Mr. Dods and Mr. Carroll, but pursuing a subject germane to both their books, we may note that the arguments used by Aquinas seem to cover the case of the virtuous heathen, as he himself is perhaps aware, though he applies them only to infants; and in this connection it is interesting to note that, according to the Netherland version of the legend of St. Brandan, the heathen dead, even though criminals, have lighter punishments than Christians. St. Brandan, as he was starting on his voyage, discovered a huge head, without a body, upon the shore. He gave it power to speak, and learned that it belonged to a gigantic pirate who had formerly infested those parts. He had been a pagan, and was now suffering in hell for his crimes. St. Brandan asked whether he should pray for his restoration to life, in order that he might convert him to Christianity (it being an established point that no soul could repent in hell), but the cautious giant asked whether, if he accepted the offer, he would ever die again; and on being informed that he would, he respectfully declined the offer; for he said that he felt sure that if he were alive again he should fall into his old ways, and he had noticed that sinful Christians had much severer punishment than sinful heathens, so he had rather bear things as they were. It is a somewhat grim commentary on the "glad tidings of great joy that shall be to all nations." Prudent heathen, it appears, would rather not "double their stake" in this matter.

GIPSY SMITH: HIS LIFE AND WORK.*

THIS volume belongs, as its title-page indicates, to the nineteenth thousand of the work's issue. If a cordial reception justifies a book's existence, this is clearly not the utterance of a prophet without honour in his own country. Few things are more remarkable just at this time than the outburst in all directions of a fervent and aggressive evangelical propaganda. To many it is fraught with a sense of the imminent fulfilments of all sorts of mystic passages in the Books of Daniel and Revelation. To others with a juster sense of proportion it is no more than an interesting, somewhat puzzling, and rather encouraging feature in the religious life of the opening century. Some of our contemporaries, such as the Life of Faith and The Christian, see the impending desolation of natural science, and the melancholy demolition of the higher criticism, in the balderdash of an A. T. Pierson, or solemn absurdities of a Dr. Torrey.

For ourselves, all this outcry against truth seems but an equivalent of the proverbial storm in a teacup, though we can well believe such a storm may appear nothing less than Olympic to the flies who have fallen into the tea.

It grieves us to take up such an attitude towards work which has in it the potentialities, nay, the evidences, of much useful service. Why, then, the necessity? We do not doubt that a true man speaking out of the lessons of his own experience must have a lesson of significance to impart to his fellows, whatever the theological forms which his language may assume in the utterance of his "message." The difficulty is that these "evangelists" are not content to preach a simple Christ to simple men. They inextricably interweave their spiritual exhortations with frequent excursions into controverted questions of science, history, and literature for which they have prepared themselves by no adequate mental discipline and instruction. Not only will a preacher claim that he finds it easier to "be good" on the strength of his belief that after all a whale did swallow Jonah; but he labels as "infidels" all who labour to disconnect the permanent from the temporary elements of Bible teaching.

St. Paul himself did not make a more direct claim to "inspiration" than some of these speakers. But since, if pressed, they would probably grant that Balaam's ass was unequivocally inspired, we need not discuss the claim at any length. We only raise the issue at all here because in this book we have the delightful and rare refreshment of a popular "evangelical" Evangelist, known and loved in two hemispheres, and the more loved everywhere the better known, who makes it a principle of his practice to "stick to his last." In his own experience he has found the strengthening and refreshing of his soul in a certain interpretation of life, his relations with God and man, and the hopes which make man what he is at his best by their inspiring suggestiveness of the better yet to be revealed: "Be ye imitators of me, even as I also am of Christ." That verse summarises an attitude all can understand, and all Christians sympathise with; and it may be said to epitomise the life-work and significance of Gipsy Smith.

We are glad this book has been written. The wise may opine a man "makes a fool of himself" who pours out so naïvely upon paper all the little pettinesses which make up a character, save for the uniqueness of its special gift at few, if any, places outgoing the limitations of the commonplace. But these things have their price, and Gipsy Smith is too strong a man not to weather a little laughter of the wise; while the wiser rejoice to be in possession of a document so self-revealing and thus so helpful in estimating a singular type of personality. For it is a type, and not merely an individual that is here so graphically illustrated. Popularity has its risks; but carried beyond a certain point, or experienced for any length of time, it must be indeed a paltry character that is not rather deepened and strengthened by a sense of responsibility and opportunity and insufficiency than dizzied, inflated, or over-balanced by the applause of a few thousands of fellow creatures.

The man who has come to the cry, "Lord, what is man that Thou are mindful of him?" has come also to be very little mindful of man himself, save as a poor creature whom it is his laborious duty to persuade to walk more worthily of his possibilities and high calling. He has scarcely time to listen to the plaudits of the "saved" from anxiety to be ever back again amongst the struggles of the drowning. So much in general.

For Gipsy Smith himself, he is a genuine son of the van; and not the least interesting portion of his book is his description of his people, their character and habits. We feel that he ought to know what he is writing about here; but we are not altogether convinced that his picture is so trustworthy as that of outsiders such as George Borrow, who have known more than one or two tribes or camps, and approached the study with a better equipment of critical apparatus.

The description of the conversion of Gipsy Smith and his family is one of the most fantastic episodes we are acquainted with in the annals of religious experience. We miss all sense of that overwhelming moral responsibility which made Jeremiah despair of incapacity, reduced Amos to trembling, and so often brings the true prophet to abhor himself and repent in dust and ashes. In place of "so often" we had at first written "always everywhere"; but the wind bloweth where it listeth, and so is every one that is born of the spirit. Losing his mother in early childhood, young Smith was shrewd enough to turn even this trial to an advertisement for pegs and tin-ware; and it helped him to the heart and purses of many a kindly villager. Yet it jars on the reader that such a fact should be facetiously related, together with much that otherwise might pass for genuine feeling for so great a loss. And the question must assert itself:—A nature that could so trade in youth upon the pathos of its sorrows, can it be above a bid for applause when the filial sentiment is made so much of in letterpress and illustration throughout this book? There is something to be discounted from the ingenuousness of the narrative. How much?

What can we make of the following? The italics are ours:—

> The most memorable incident of my work in Whitechapel was the conversion of my sister Tilly at one of my own meetings. . . I have already said that I came to Christ myself partly because I felt I was keeping Tilly from him. I was immediately above her in age, and the members of our family had been converted in order of age. It was while I was singing one of my simple gospel songs that my dear sister was won for the Lord.

What is commonly meant by "conviction" can have little to do with a resolve based upon the knowledge that "it's Tilly's turn next, and I'm blocking the way!"

We shall look in vain in this volume for any evidences of "spirituality" of the type recognisable in a Paul, Augustine, Wesley, or Martineau. Does this mean that there is nothing "spiritual" in such a life, such a book, such a teaching? Does it not rather mean that our recognition of the spiritual must transcend its wonted limitations? If a man has the witness of many hundreds of his fellows that to his influence it is due that they have learnt to "climb on stepping-stones of their dead selves to higher things," is not this a sort of "spirituality" that our age needs, and may not the almost ludicrous "confessions" of Gipsy Smith worthily take rank on our shelves with those of Augustine or the letters of Madame Guion, or George Müller's biography?

No man's account of himself, no other man's account of any man, explains him. Force of character, personal influence, direction of thought and effort; these are to be measured by the lives of those a man is in contact with, not by any analysis of his own. No one can look much into the work of an "evangelical mission" without observing the inadequacy of the conventional antithesis between "spiritual" and "secular." Allow only that "sin" is a social disease; and then, considered as a "sin doctor," how valuable in a community must be such a personage as Gipsy Smith? Theological experts may call him a "quack," but his "cures" are his sufficient evidence of qualification.

OBITUARY.

JOSEPH THOMAS PRESTON.

THE death of Mr. J. T. Preston removes from our midst a personality long familiar at the various gatherings of Unitarians in London. He was the oldest member of a family widely known and highly respected by Unitarians. For upwards of fifty years he was closely identified with the work of our churches and societies, and he never wavered in his allegiance. A keen and shrewd observer of men and affairs, had it not been for his deafness, he might have become an able and effective public speaker. Those who heard him deliver the brief address at the recent welcome meeting to the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, at Unity Church, could not fail to perceive that he possessed the capacity of expressing himself with power and earnestness He was content, however, to exert his influence in quiet and unassuming ways; and by his presence as well as by his purse to show his sympathy with good work.

Mr. J. T. Preston was born in the Strand, nearly opposite the present Exeter Hall, on May 21, 1819. He was the second son of Henry John Preston and his wife, Sarah Susannah, who was the eldest child of Joseph Chamberlain, of Milk-street, Cheapside. His father was a member of a firm of wholesale druggists and manufacturing chemists in the City—Messrs. Hodgkinson, Preston, and King. Through his mother he was related to the families of the Nettlefolds and Chamberlains. One of her sisters married Mr. John S. Nettlefold, senr., another married Mr. J. Chamberlain, father of the former Colonial Secretary, grandfather of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. At an early age he was sent to a preparatory school in Colebrook-row; he afterwards attended a school at Islington, kept by the minister of the old Jewin-street Chapel and by the Rev. John Scott Porter, of Carter-lane Chapel. Among his fellow-pupils were Mr. N. Porter, afterwards minister at Carrickfergus; Mr. John Classon, of Dublin; Mr. Wm. and Mr. J. C. Lawrence. When Mr. Scott Porter removed to Belfast, he was transferred to the new University of London School in Gower-street. Mr. Preston entered his father's business, and in time became senior partner in the firm, retiring nine years ago. He was one of the original members of the Pharmaceutical Society.

On May 10, 1843, he married Miss Jane Classon, second daughter of a well-known citizen of Dublin, sister to Mrs. Drummond, wife of the Principal of Manchester College. Many of our readers will remember the celebration of the golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Preston in 1893. After a long, happy, and united life came the shock of separation four years later. Five sons and two daughters survive their parents, one child having died in infancy. Mrs. Bartram, Mr. Percy Preston, and Mr. Frank Preston are well known in Unitarian circles as worthy upholders of the family tradition, active participators in the work of our various organisations.

Carter-lane Chapel, in the City of London, was the first scene of Mr. Preston's interest and labours as a Unitarian layman. When it became necessary for the congregation to migrate to a more residential neighbourhood, Mr. Preston was one of the founders of Unity Church, Islington, and his attachment to the congregation that worshipped there was deep and lifelong. He held the office of treasurer for a great many years, in succession to the late Sir James Clarke Lawrence. He was one of a small group of earnest young laymen who formed the London District Unitarian Society, and he cherished always a warm regard for this Society and its operations. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association found in him a convinced and strenuous supporter. He held the office of President in 1894-5, and had not increasing deafness stood in the way, it would have given him intense pleasure to have attended representative gatherings of Unitarians in all parts of the country.

A succession of young men and women preparing for the profession of elementary teachers had reason to be grateful for the admirable services rendered by Mr. Preston as secretary of the Woods Trust since 1864. On the Presbyterian Board he also gave largely of his thought and time to its work from 1866 onwards. In 1840 he was elected to the Livery of the Worshipful Company of Carpenters. He took an active interest in its affairs, especially in the educational work, occupying in turn the various offices, becoming a member of the Court in 1870, and Master in 1873. Mr. Preston was the Father of the Company, and he lived to see two of his own sons occupy the position of Master.

Like so many leading Unitarians, Mr. Preston was a strong and earnest Liberal until the introduction of the Irish Home Rule Bill induced him to enter the camp of the Liberal Unionists, following his cousin, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. In youth and early manhood he was an ardent supporter of the Anti-Corn Law League; but in regard to the Fiscal controversy now raging he kept an open mind, and was disposed to think that there might be room for careful and judicious inquiry. There was nothing extreme in his opinions on political or social questions.

His last illness was not prolonged. On Feb. 2 he contracted a cold which developed into bronchitis and pneumonia; and though he succeeded in shaking off the disease, his strength was too impaired for recovery, and he succumbed to failure of the heart on Feb. 19.

A funeral service, previous to cremation, was held at Unity Church, Islington, on Tuesday last. The Rev. E. Savell Hicks conducted part of the service, the Rev. Dr. Drummond, brother-in-law of the deceased, delivering a brief and touching address, in which he said:—

"Mr. Preston was one of those men whom you entirely trust—simple, unostentatious, one whose judgment, you are sure, will be influenced by no base or selfish motive, manifesting through quiet and unassuming rectitude the faith which ruled in his heart. If he was not widely known as a prominent public man he was honoured, not only as a leading member of the congregation formerly meeting in the old chapel in Carter-lane, and then in the newer church, to which he was attached through the whole of his long life, but also as a staunch supporter of every movement for the propagation of the religion which he loved so well. It is only fitting that his memory should be reverently cherished here, where the higher interests of his life so largely centred, and where his services were so abundantly and generously rendered; and though we must now think of him as encompassed with that universal light and love, where our human distinctions that spring from our imperfect knowledge disappear, it would be unjust to his own deepest convictions not to refer to the special form of religion which constituted so large an element in his life. Unitarianism was his Gospel of light, most rational in its thought, largest in its charity, most tolerant of another's creed, most insistent on a good life, nearest to the mind of Christ, most luminous with the love of God. It generated within himself that strong and simple piety, which shrank from all parade, and manifested itself in dutiful and consistent living. Kind and affectionate in all his private relations, he brought to the routine of business the high honour and integrity which made business a Divine calling, and commanded the respect of all who were associated with him. It is such men, who live in quiet faithfulness and unpretentiously put virtue before gain and splendour, who sweeten human society and exalt the character of a nation. In the holy and subduing presence of death who would wish to have gained the whole world and lost his soul? Who is not thankful that his friend has avoided all crooked ways, and never sought for wealth or power save in submission to the will of God?"

There was a large and representative gathering of relatives and friends at the funeral service, including the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe; the President of the Sunday School Association, Miss M. Pritchard, and many London Unitarian ministers and laymen.

MR. GEORGE MILLER, OF BEDFORD.

THE Bedford congregation has suffered great loss by the death of Mr. George Miller, its treasurer and secretary, at the venerable age of eighty-four. On Sunday evening, February 7, Mr. Miller was in his accustomed seat, and entered into the service with his usual earnestness. He joined in the singing with great heartiness. The closing hymn was "Father! beneath thy sheltering wing," and Mr. Miller's voice was distinctly heard in the words, "In life, in death, supremely blest," and in the second verse also, "And death is good, that makes us know the Life Divine that all things sways." It was his triumphal song—his last before his triumph, for ere next Sunday dawned he had passed through the gateway, his earthly career being completed. He had no fear of sudden death, he felt confident of the Love and Mercy and Justice which had been his joy on earth. It was a shock to his large family and friends; it came as heaven's own blessing to our venerable friend. What the congregation will do without him cannot be foreseen. From the first service in 1872, until his last Sunday on earth, he never missed attending, when not away from home, or on those rare occasions when he was unwell. He was an enthusiast for liberty of every kind, whether his interests were invited for Poland or Hungary, for the negroes in the States, or the Boer in Africa. Conventionalism and cant were his abhorrence; but honest seeking after truth always won his heart. It must be nearly half a century since he and one or two friends weighed orthodoxy in the balance, and found it wanting, and then he and they set out in quest of something better. They found it in the simpler and more exalted faith to which he was so loyal for the rest of his life. At our Triennial and other conferences he was often seen, and thus he had many friends up and down the land. His largely attended funeral on February 18, conducted by his devoted friend, Rowland Hill, bore witness to the esteem his sterling character evoked. His two sons and four daughters may indeed be proud of his noble memory.

AT Nottingham Guild Hall, last Saturday morning, some hundred Passive Resisters were brought up before the magistrates for non-payment of a portion of the rate. The Town Clerk, who prosecuted, said that among the gentlemen appearing before the Bench were some of Nottingham's best citizens. The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, minister of the High Pavement Chapel, as our readers will remember, is among the Nottingham Passive Resisters. On Saturday the Rev. H. V. Mills was also up before the magistrates at Kendal.

CORRECTION.—A correspondent writes to say that last week's note on p. 116, with reference to the Bishop of Manchester's onslaught on the P.S.A. movement, was in error in attributing to the Dean of Manchester the letter, which was really written by his son, the Rev. Kenneth Maclure, of St. Albans, Canon Knox Little's old church.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE TEN VIRGINS.

(ST. MATTHEW XXV. 1—13.)

LET us read again the story of the ten virgins. You see, the oil, which the five foolish girls forgot, was needed for them to go to a wedding, so by not having enough oil they lost an opportunity of sharing the great joy of their friends. Jesus here teaches us that neglect to be prepared results in losing opportunities, and that an opportunity once lost is lost for ever. The oil in the parable means fitness to do or be at the right time whatever God requires.

I will tell you about a boy-friend of mine, who longed to do big things to help people. His parents were always busy doing good in the neighbouring villages, and far beyond their own county, so Geoffrey heard more than most children about the ways in which people need helping to lead healthy, useful, happy lives. When he was a man, he hoped to be a Member of Parliament like his grandfather, and the men whom he had heard on a memorable visit to the House of Commons. Among the people whom his parents knew, Mr. Gladstone was the biggest hero, and he meant to try and be as wise and unselfish as Mr. Gladstone. On the day when that great statesman was buried—a day remembered by Geoffrey and his sister for their first experience of their house with the blinds down, and for the numbers of people wearing black—I overheard Geoffrey say to the coachman, to whom he often confided his patriotic wishes, "Oh! and I do want a big funeral like Mr. Gladstone."

"Well, Master Geoffrey, you'll have a deal of lessons and hard work of all sorts afore you even get into the House, let alone have a big funeral such as Mr. Gladstone's. And some of us works hard all our lives, and never gets famous. But it's all right if we does our duty accordin' to our opportunities."

The best of Geoff. was that, though full of dreams of great deeds, he seldom let slip the small chances of being good and kind in among the regular round of play and lessons, reading story-books, riding, gardening, and looking after the animals. For example, his drives were generally to see his friends in all the cottages, especially if there were an invalid to be cheered. In his childish way he tried to love his neighbour as himself, even in such simple matters as touching his cap to the stone-breakers on the road, or remembering the cottage babies' names and birthdays (thus mightily pleasing the mothers).

How do I know this? Well, love always calls forth love, and there came a time when Geoff. fell ill, and was missed from the world, first outside the house and then of his sick-room. Farm labourers would walk far out of their way home after their day's work to get news of "the little chap." I know "the old ladies of the workhouse" wept when he gave up going to chatter and sing to them. Then, when he was missed from the sick-room, there was a funeral, not a "big one like Mr. Gladstone's," but a very quiet laying to rest, close to his beautiful home; yet an uncommon one, for a boy eleven and a half years old, since blinds were down in every house and cottage thereabouts, and among the many wreaths was one sent with the love of all his poorest neighbours.

The other day I visited one of Geoff.'s cottage friends. His portrait hung over the kitchen chimney-piece. "I put it where I can always see it," said the woman. "He was always thinking of others, never letting his own self come to the top, and it does me good to look at him." Another mother not long ago said:—"Yes, we shall always remember him. He was always the real gentleman, gentle and thoughtful for all his merry ways, and the poorer we was the more he loved us, so we thought. Why, my little Wesley kisses his photo. every night last thing afore bed. When the children is troublesome, I just say, 'Look at Master Geoffrey's picture; try and be like him,' and they'll stop at once."

Was not that being fit to help his country according to his opportunities? That sort of fitness can be got by every child. It is just being as good and kind as you can, especially among people weaker or less fortunate than yourself.

But how many ways there are of preparing to use our lives well! Fortunately, we begin as soon as we are born. Every hour, day, and year spent in healthy, well-directed, happy work and play is helping the growth of our bodies, minds, and spirits in serviceable powers and habits. Moreover, as we grow older, we get not only fitness for every-day opportunities, but a store from which to draw for any occasion needing extra strength of body or character. We then have store-flasks of oil as well as the oil in our lamps.

But notice that the wise virgins could not give even their store of oil to the foolish ones. "Oh! how selfish," you say. No, there was no selfishness. Fitness for opportunities is something which you cannot give to another. A drill master cannot fit a lazy boy with strong muscles. He can only show an exercise by example and provide the dumb-bells. The boy must gain strength of muscle, or muscular fitness, by his own exertion. Your teacher cannot lend you his brain, if you are idle or stupid. He can help you in many ways over a new or difficult piece of thinking, but you must do the thinking, and when done it is so much fitness to understand the next bit of hard thinking, till your mind becomes manageable and full of thought-power. The example of Jesus, the love and example of good parents and companions, encourages and shames you into being good, but it is your own resisting of evil that makes the goodness within you grow.

By your own exertions, yes. "Watch, therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour." Lastly, by God's help. "Go to them that sell," go to God, your Heavenly Father, the Provider of all that makes life worth living. Seek His help in prayer. Elsewhere Jesus says, "Watch and pray," three simple words. You can easily remember them, children, and then think over how they will help you to be prepared every day and at any moment for whatever God wants you to do and to be.

THE NEED OF TO-DAY.

THE last of our modern prophets who has lived into the twentieth century—he was eighty-seven last Tuesday—has been induced to break the silence of his retirement in the country, and give his weighty reply to the query, "What is the greatest need of to-day?" It is a reply which commands our notice and compels us to pause. "The longer I live," he says, "the more do I realise the need for simplicity. The whole world is confounded by the Babel of complexity. : : : : I find this fault with theology, as distinct from religion: it has confused the issues. It has introduced complexity. I find it in society. There is so much dissipation of national energy, no clear vision of right and wrong, I look across our English world and see clearly and distinctly the two vices which, more than anything else, are obstructing the wheels of progress; drinking and gambling. They are apparent to the least observant of men. : . : But if this is so patent, if this is the general agreement, why is there no concentration of national energy on the subject? . : : : What has happened to the world that the issues of right and wrong have become so confused? It is, I think, the wholesale and the undignified scamper away from simplicity."

It is not only Mr. G. F. WATTS who is thus raising the cry for a return to simplicity. President ROOSEVELT has been publicly commending a little book entitled "The Simple Life," and wishing that it might be read by everyone in the land.* The "Gospel of Simplicity," and "The Ssmplification of Society" are no longer plausible phrases, but potent, urgent ideals. The indications are many that an increasing number of people to-day are growing impatient, or weary, with the complexity and the artificiality, the confusion and the tension, which accompany so tenaciously the life of town and city.

How deep this craving for simplicity may be, how passionate its revolt! And how rashly, alas! it may rush into extremes, and further complicate our difficulties, unless guided by knowledge and a wise view of the case. To set cattle ranching and prairie farming above a university education is not to simplify the problem; to glorify manual labour at the expense of intellectual culture is not to simplify character; to immure oneself in a sisterhood is not to simplify the world. If the simplification of life generally is to be regarded seriously, not only as a desire or a theory, but as a practical possibility, it can only come through a higher conception and a deeper conviction of life's larger, truer meaning. It will not come by railing at civilisation or by denouncing machinery, money, luxury, and society indiscriminately, for all these are for good or harm, according as we use, or misuse, them. It will not come by imagining that we can turn our backs upon progress, or pull up the past and start afresh, or stop the clock and call a halt in the world's onward march. Neither will it come, this needed simplification, as the result of this or that outward specific. We are hit with disappointment when the "Plea for a Simpler Life" turns out but an edict for simpler diet, and "The Gospel of Simplicity" proclaims as its message a return to country life and handicraft. Must we not, at the very outset, take this plain fact into account? We shall never make life simpler in any worthy way whatsoever by making it poorer and meagre, narrowing its range of experience, dwarfing its interests, deadening its refinements, lessening its mental thirst for literature, science and the arts, or the knowledge of human affairs. On the very contrary, is not the only real plea on which we can appeal for simplicity, that it will make life altogether fuller and richer, healthier and happier, both in mind and body; freer in its every movement of either work or play, safer from the danger of monotony and satiety, because the possessor of an inner secret and spring of joy.

How are we to restore, or secure, this truer simplicity of life to-day in face of its ever-gathering complexity? What kind of simpler living is really possible for a man amidst the elaborate and intricate environment of modern thought and effort? These questions begin to answer themselves from the moment when there is real simplicity in the mind and heart. A simple heart will make its own environment, nay, will keep its simplicity in the very midst of formality or display, whereas a simple surrounding will only bore and fret the man who has no answering simplicity in his own disposition. Covet the simple spirit: is not that our first requirement? Keep in manhood the spirit of a child, the fresh, spontaneous, guileless self, believing and believed, disinterested, and not self-centred. If we covet that truly, we then come to see more clearly how this simplicity, as of children, enters the kingdom of heaven, and lies at the very heart of religion. Yes, despite all our incessant discussing and explaining, religion rests on the apprehension of a few simple facts. GOD in our life. Love in the heart. What more do we want? JESUS brushed aside ritual and tradition and set in their place two broad, plain truths. When he said, "Seek ye first the kingdom of heaven," leaving lesser things to be added in their place, he meant seek firstly that which is central, eternal, essential, not accessory—and thus announced the whole gospel of simplicity.

But if we live for and by this inward simplicity, other things must feel the change and fall into place. We may or may not alter our outward manner or sphere, but complexity will more and more disappear and our horizon grow more clear. Simplicity of thought will help to a true moral judgment and a single-eyed sight of the right. Simplicity of speech will enable us to practise the Quaker's text, for our yea and our nay will be without ambiguity. Simplicity of intercourse will shame away the puppet dignity, the pompous formality, and the ostentatious display which rob home and society and humanity of their most genuine and engaging quality. Simple needs and simple pleasures will render unnecessary the artificial excitements and stimulants of a jaded satiety. If we would simplify our surroundings, we must first simplify ourselves. If we have scampered away from simplicity only to fall into confusion and complexity, it is because society is at heart unhealthy. Someone has said quaintly, "GOD is so healthy." If we would simplify the world, we must find our simplicity in GOD.

F. K. F.

JUSTICE IN EDUCATION.

UNDER this title Dr. SANDAY has published what he describes as "A Word for Peace."* He must be thanked for his courage. In times of bitter resentment on one side and obvious fears on the other, he does not "despair of the republic." And his pamphlet is all the more useful because it is not a mere piece of kindly sentiment. He argues forcibly, and evidently does his opponents the compliment of believing they will respect a foe who states his case with definiteness and determination even in the hour of proposing a truce.

His address, we must observe, is chiefly directed to the Nonconformists; and this is quite natural. It is they who have been most prominent in the vain struggle to preserve the School Board system, and who are now to the fore in "passive resistance." At the same time Dr. SANDAY, we think, might have done well to remember that the question of education is not one for the churches alone, or even specially. They may, and indeed do, show most zeal in the controversies that arise from time to time in connection with the subject; and it is undeniable that in the past their zeal has been abundantly fruitful in the provision of schools. The symptoms of waning enthusiasm have been evident of late, yet Dr. SANDAY is absolutely justified in the emphasis he places on the school as an adjunct to the parish church. He says:—

* Longmans & Co. (1s. net.)

The Church school is an institution that has struck its roots deep into the affections of Churchmen. The life of the parish would be very incomplete without it. It is not Church alone, but Church and school.

And he goes on to speak of the happy co-working of "parson and schoolmaster" in many a parish, and describes with commendable pride the ideal cherished by the typical English Churchman:—

The English parson is the friend of his people, and enters into their homely joys and sorrows. And the schoolmaster is often cast into the same mould, and his children take from him an air that holds a happy mean between servility and brusqueness, and that is not without its own simple humanity and rustic culture.

He who turns curtly away from a picture so affectionately drawn must be a little blind as well as churlish. That to the cherishing of such ideals England owes much is undoubted, and if the Romanist priest were also to come forward with his own sketches of a still more paternal rule and even a more obedient flock, we should be unable to deny that in certain places and at certain times the methods described have been both acceptable and beneficial.

But, anxious as we are to preserve a mind sensitive to the attractions of a system so benevolently conceived and so often administered with intelligence and self-denying diligence, it really must be pointed out that, whether for good or for evil, those ideals are ceasing to retain the power they once had. There is, we admit, none the less room for a spiritual guide in every village; rather if heaven would vouchsafe an Abbot SAMSON to put things straight and keep them so, there is hardly a parish in the land but would be the better for his presence. The fact is, however, that either because Abbot SAMSONS have been so rare, or because they have done their work so well in turning babes of grace into aspiring men, the people want less to be governed for their good than to govern themselves with whatever result. Dr. SANDAY will believe that we mean no discourtesy when we own to a greater sympathy with the people than with the parson.

The problem of the schools naturally takes on a different aspect according to the difference in our sympathies and prepossessions. To Dr. SANDAY, with his warm affection for his own Church, the inevitable ambition is that its influence should be maintained and extended. He sees no serious ground for dissatisfaction with the provisions embodied in the recently-passed Education Acts. Why should anybody complain? The Church has provided school buildings, the value of which may be taken as a contribution fully equal to the cost of the special denominational religious teaching which will be given in them. The rest of the cost should be at least as cheerfully paid by the ratepayer as in the case of the present Board-schools. It is true that in order to control both the religious and secular work of the denominational school a denominational majority of managers is provided. It is also true that the head-mastership may not be thrown open to men of other denominations, But Dr. SANDAY can see no way to dispense with these safeguards: nor do we, so long as the aim is to preserve Church schools and not citizen schools. So far we agree with him. But then he desires to preserve Church schools, and we do not, for various reasons—not the least being that their continued existence is a constant obstruction to the development of a truly national system, free from favour, privilege, and exclusiveness.

We regret that Dr. SANDAY found it necessary to his argument to suggest—it comes to that—that "the very imperfect Christianisation of our great cities" is due to the School Board system. He thinks, pardonably enough, that if in 1870 the State had come liberally to the assistance of the religious bodies, "on the secular side of education" things might have been much better. We note, again, the introduction of this notion that all the State is asked for is assistance on "the secular side of education"—but now and always, the implication is, as Dr. SANDAY would admit, that the secular education can only be given properly through the approved denominational channel, so that this renewed emphasis is a little futile. But without discussing the pertinent question whether the street Arabs who come out of the schoolrooms of St. Philip's or St. John's are much different as to behaviour from their playfellows from the Board-schools, it may be useful to remind ourselves what the facts as to religious education have been, and for a few weeks or months still are to be in the Board-schools of London.

The Syllabus of Bible Instruction for last year prescribes that—

In the schools provided by the Board the Bible shall be read, and there shall be given such explanations and such instruction therefrom in the principles of the Christian Religion and of Morality as are suited to the capacities of children.

And as a "General Instruction" it is laid down that "the teachers are desired to make the lessons as practical as possible, and not to give attention to unnecessary details." Now, we can imagine a zealous Catholic, whether Anglican or other, putting in a demurrer that things looked upon as unnecessary by the average teacher might prove to be of great importance in his judgment. But it is well known that dignitaries high in the Church have praised the thoroughness of the Scripture teaching in these schools, and a glance at the Syllabus shows how comprehensive it is at least intended to be. Thus Standard I. is to "learn the Lord's Prayer and Psalm xxiii., simple stories from the Book of Genesis, and the leading facts in the life of our LORD told in simple language." The next standard adds the Ten Commandments, the Beatitudes, and lessons from the life of MOSES. Standard III. adds another passage from St. Matthew and another Psalm, lessons from Samuel, and six leading parables. And so the list expands, taking on fresh Scripture material at each stage, while carefully retaining and repeating the work of previous stages, till, in Standard VII. and ex-VII. the scholars have professedly compassed the salient portions from the Pentateuch generally, certain of the historical books, some chapters of Isaiah, the Sermon on the Mount, the Gospels of St. Luke and St. John, the Acts of the Apostles, and a selection from 1 Corinthians. Whether all this is well learned is a point dubitable, despite the warm commendations of inspectors. All depends on our notion of what Scripture knowledge should be. But, at any rate, this system need not shrink from comparison with that of any parish school in the land. If Dr. SANDAY says, as we can well imagine him saying, that even if well-learned, this Scripture teaching is not enough, the Church's formularies should be added: we can only reply that all this goes to show how difficult it is to decide what and where Christian teaching is, and how impossible it is for our legislature to guarantee it. He would say the true religion is in the hands of the Church, the ordinary Nonconformist would say it is in the hands of the Bible teacher, we should rather seek it in good men, in or out of the Church, with or without the Bible. Our ideal may be uncongenial to many, but no peace is likely till it is generally adopted.

On one point we should like to have seen a word by Dr. SANDAY. He thinks the "passive resisters" are unreasonable in not accepting the bargain clenched for the nation by our legislators in taking over the Church's school buildings, and endowing the Church with so much power and privilege in return. He has forgotten that the bargain is one that the people of this country were never asked to sanction; and even were there more cogency in his plea for justice than we think there is, the method of this bargaining has been such that most of us (if recent elections prove anything) feel that justice is badly needed in another direction.

WHAT WOMEN CAN DO.

ALL the world has been ablaze for months about the discovery of radium. The wonderful properties of the new metal, its undying heat and unfading light, arrest the imagination and give an Oriental glamour to the scientific fact. But behind the magnificence of the result of Madame Curie's achievement, and by so much more important as the moral ever outweighs the material, is the story of how the discovery came to be made. It has been in every paper and lectured on in every town, so it need not be repeated here. Two points stand out prominently and enrich the world of thought, aspiration and character far beyond any comparison with the wealth which Madame Curie has created for us in radium.

The first point in the story is the daily self-denial of the Curies, in small things as well as in great, to enable them to buy the costly mineral which was the subject of research. But more marvellous was the self-discipline which laid great knowledge and high skill under contribution to work day by day for years at the bidding of a scientific faith. Ton after ton of pitch blende was gone over laboriously, and minutely examined and analysed, by processes needing the most ceaseless care and thoroughness and the most delicate refinement of manipulation. There were hours of disaster and almost of despair, when hope grew faint and the will revolted against toil and privation for such a speculative end. But the heart was braced again to endurance, the will was bent once more to its task. Madame Curie stands to-day in the front rank of great scientists, and the world is in possession of radium.

This story of a woman's triumph has a message for us. There is a clarion note of encouragement in it for all women everywhere who are working for great impersonal causes. And never was encouragement more needed, at least by the public-spirited women of these islands. The slow and, painful struggle for permission to take up duties in local government for which they are peculiarly fitted, duties which, it may be said, women alone can rightly do, has in many cases gone sorely against them of late. Within the last nine years ten distinct qualifications for public work have been lost to women—and both Liberal and Conservative Governments have been to blame. Two hundred and eight women who were serving their neighbourhoods and their country on vestries and school-boards, and in other spheres of local government, have been, by recent legislation, driven out of public life. The value of their work was emphatically endorsed by the men serving on the same bodies: but that availed nothing. Women without the parliamentary franchise are a negligable quantity, and the bias of somebody drafting a Bill or the inertness of the members of the House of Commons, or any reactionary or obscurantist influence is enough to rob women of beneficient power and the electors of most efficient public servants.

But before that great boon can be conferred on women in these countries, there lies before women in London a duty for which they have the power. The London County Council election comes on Saturday next, and every woman who has a vote in that election should use it as a sacred trust. We may be under great discouragement, and, as against adverse forces, it seems so small a thing to cast a vote. But it is by no means a small thing that a Progressive majority shall be maintained in strength on the London County Council. It is by no means a small thing that great-hearted humanitarian motives shall dominate the Government of London for the next three years. We cannot read the bare summary of the jurisdiction of the London County Council without thinking it a disgrace to our civilisation that women have no place on it. The Council itself is deeply sensible of the omission, and has again and again petitioned Parliament to make women eligible. When one remembers that, in addition to many other and varied duties the London County Council have charge of reformatories, industrial schools, pauper lunatic asylums, the inspection of baby farms, the housing of the poor, the clearing away of insanitary dwellings, looking after public lodging-houses, the licensing and regulating of public places of amusement both as to their safety and morality, the whole range of technical education, and the administration of the Inebriates' Act and the Midwives' Act—we can only wonder that in any country under heaven, in the year of grace 1888, any such power should have been entrusted to any council without special provision to enable women to serve on it.

But when, in addition to all that has been named and a great deal more, the whole vast work of elementary education in London is to be taken over by the Councils, and when upon the Education Committee men and women can only serve by co-option and not by election, it becomes unspeakably important that every iota of influence which women possess should be thrown into the Progressive interest. With it alone lies hope for the toiling myriads of London, for the millions of little children, for the victims of sweating and of slum life.

Let the hour be dark for our own particular enfranchisement, or let it be bright—and there are signs of a dawn—but let every woman who can in any way do it help forward the Progressive cause in London next Saturday. Radium is dull and cold compared with the wealth of human happiness and goodness which hang on the balance of the vote. MARY RALPH.

PROFESSOR RUDOLF EUCKEN.

As is well known all over the world, Germany has been, and is to-day, pre-eminently a land of philosophers. Even the ordinary reader who has not dipped into philosophical literature has over and over again come across such names as Kant, Hegel, Schelling, Fichte, Goethe, Schiller, Schopenhauer, Lotze, and many other illustrious names, of men who have left a deep impress on the philosophic and religious thought of the nineteenth century. The problems which they raised and attempted to solve concerning the Universe, Man, and God, have become the "grounds" upon which all later theories of any value have been built. What the world owes to Germany in the nineteenth century can never be over-estimated. Here at least there has been "Free Trade" between Germany and the other nations of the world, and England, France, and America have derived incalculable benefit from the free trading of these ideas. And we might venture to hope that the free trading of ideas in all the departments of human life will in the future prove to be the means of enabling nations to distinguish the essential from the accidental, the permanent from the transient, and so bring from darkness to light the road on which humanity ought to march, and in its march realising in a fuller measure from age to age the capabilities of its nature and the grandeur of its destiny.

The Germany of to-day is not without illustrious sons to whom the fathers of modern philosophy have handed down the torch of Truth, and in no hand is that torch held higher and firmer than in the hand of Professor Eucken, of the ancient University of Jena. It has been the greatest privilege of my life to have spent in the summer of 1903 four months under the guidance of Dr. Eucken. The difficulty of the language rendered it impossible for me to appreciate to the full the knowledge which Dr. Eucken conveys to his pupils, but I left with new inspiration to work at the great questions of religious philosophy—an inspiration which I, at least, did not know of before. And here let me point out some of the characteristics of Professor Eucken's life and teaching.

How often do we find that immense learning shrivels up the man's heart and emotions. So many scholars seem to have had to barter their hearts and their joys for the accumulation of knowledge and the solution of problems. The link which binds them to society and to all that is human seems to have been broken. But not so with Dr. Eucken. However great he is as a scholar, he is greater still as a man. All his learning has its source and its home not in any close-fitted compartment of the mind which is not allowed to flow out except on special occasions, but in the depth of his spirit—the spirit which knows all, and is greater than all it knows. Here is a man whose teaching—yea, even the deep things of philosophy—points out that all must find its centre in a man's spirit, and transform every aspect to the same nature as itself. There is, according to Dr. Eucken, no such thing—at least there ought not to be—as a one-sided true development. Everything must enter into the life in order to be lost, and so found anew in the spiritual nature of man; and for its complete realisation must be worked out in the life. Dr. Eucken teaches that there is a spiritual element in man, but that this comes into actuality not mainly and not alone by the growth of reason or ideas apprehended as bare facts, but by a kind of energy as well, in which the whole man struggles to get out of the smallness of his own self, and so unites himself with the Absolute—with God. What is the reason of the weakness of human life? Why is not more accomplished? Why does not what is actual to us correspond more to what is ideal? How can the "Ought to be" become the "Is"? Life cannot ascend with the mere increase in the accumulation of facts. Its fulness and completeness can never take place, its strength can never come out unless we believe that there is something of greater worth and significance in our lives than the mere apprehension of the material facts of existence, or the presence of ideas in a fleeting kind of way in our minds. We need these things, but we need more. We need light, but we need warmth as well. How can light and warmth be united in the life? Professor Eucken in his great books shows that these can be united only by the recognition of a Power other than our own which gradually filters into the life, through life placing itself on the side of the spiritual reality of the universe and of man. This may be only a postulate at the start, but it works with such power that it turns by experience and conquest into a reality—the greatest of all realities, and indeed the only true reality—God. The grounds of religion, the evidence of religion, the certainty of God, are then something which is gained in the experiences of life. A new energy appears from crediting and acting upon our postulate. The postulate attains a certainty because the whole meaning and conquest of life become more and more in accordance with it. Religion thus, according to Dr. Eucken, is a fundamental fact of our nature, and is independent entirely of any historical event or dogma. It is the recognition of an inward and not an outward event—a recognition that within us and within the universe there is a spiritual reality, and it is only by placing ourselves on the side of the Absolute that our nature can grow, and man can become what he is destined to become. The Absolute is not mainly in the things, but above the things we come in contact with. So man's spirit rises above outward change and time.

This is the teaching which Professor Eucken brings before students from all parts of the world in his class-room in the ancient University of Jena. Space does not permit me to give more than the barest outline of his teaching. But no one can give an impression of the Professor's teaching who has not heard him. His large class-room is crowded, and although he belongs to the philosophical faculty, he draws together a number of students from the theological and other faculties. Here university teaching is made a thing of joy and power. To listen to the eloquence and fire of this great leader of religious philosophy is indeed an inspiration, and turns philosophy from being the dry conclusions of one-sided and curious men to be the very bread of life, without which it cannot be said that any man knows what it is to live.

Professor Eucken has spent most of his teaching years in Jena, and no tempting offers from other universities have succeeded in drawing him from the beautiful old town—the town of Hegel and Fichte, Schiller and Goethe.

Dr. Eucken was born in the year 1846, and appears at the meridian of his strength. His great works are known to students of philosophy all over the world. It is to be hoped that England will not be long before translations of his great books on philosophy and religion will be available, for in days of fragments and facts there is greatly needed in the Western World a constructive system of religious philosophy, which will recognise the spiritual reality of man's nature, and the union of that nature with what is akin to itself in the universe and in God. Thus will man be able to stand erect, and be convinced that within himself a divine element is gradually unfolding through struggle and conquest over all lower elements, and enabling him to perceive "the light that never was on sea or land." When humanity reaches this level, no teacher of the twentieth century will be recognised as having done more to bring it about than Professor Eucken of Jena.

W. TUDOR JONES.

TEMPERANCE REFORM.

THE PARK CAFÉ, LIVERPOOL.

THE reproach is often, and with reason, hurled against temperance reformers that they do so little by way of counter-attraction to lure working-men from the gin-palaces. Many years ago, the attempt was made in Liverpool by the formation of the British Workman Public House Company. It started well, but the charms of a 10 per cent. dividend proved too strong for the reformers, and the multiplied houses are now, in too many instances, by no means attractive, nor is the food in all cases above reproach. I have partaken of vile tea and stale confectionery more than once, and have heard many complaints. The Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Society resolved some months ago to do practical work in this direction, as narrated in your columns, and time enough has elapsed to give some brief account of its enterprise.

Where, for many years, a shabby brick bakery stood at the street-corner nearest the Domestic Mission, Mill-street, there now stands a bright and artistically decorated café. If the outside may be so described much more the inside, which is as tastefully and handsomely modelled and fitted as are the better class Clerks' Cafés, which are so popular and successful in business quarters. Mahogany screens, marble-topped tables, bentwood chairs, electric lights, æsthetic fireplaces, plate-glass windows, and quiet floor covering combine to give an air of refinement and comfort, while civil attendants and a cheerful manager keep up the tone.

I lunched the other day amidst this comfort, in company with a few black-coated clerks or men of business, and a few roughly-clad genuine working-men; not that the former are not also workers, as I myself have been until of late; but working-men in the conventional use of the term.

My lunch was good, well cooked, and neatly served, and sevenpence provided more than I could eat. When over, I went round the building. A smoke and reading-room, cosy, but not nearly big enough for future developments, lavatories, a handsome staircase, leading to a beautiful top room, in which two billiard and sundry draught tables will be shortly placed; and, downstairs, clean and commodious kitchen accommodation: such is the Park Café.

Now as to its success or otherwise. Since its opening in October the manager told me the business had nearly doubled. This is a trifle beyond the mark. Half as much again is nearer, but the progress is there, steady and satisfactory. I have glanced over the weekly accounts, showing takings, expenses, profit, &c., and they hold out promise of greater things. The last completed month, it was estimated, would leave a good margin of clear gain, after providing for the strictly limited interest on debentures.

The customers, as when I lunched at the Café, are divided into two classes. A growing number of clerks, collectors, shopmen, and others of small means, but of a social grade above labour, find here, close at hand, a thoroughly comfortable meal at small cost, and in pleasant surroundings. Some even find it pays them to take tram from a distance, and many take a longish walk to reach it. If the premises allowed of a first-class room at slightly higher charges, it would probably meet a real want, but, meanwhile, no one suffers from shoulder-rubbing with fellow workers in fustian.

The other section is, of course, that most distinctly catered for. The brewers and publicans have found it to their interest to serve cheap meals in their houses, with a tacit understanding that drink is consumed. They have brilliant lighting and showy decoration, and it is a real temptation to the tired worker, which the too often dull and unattractive B.W. houses do not half counteract. As the brewers' houses count on getting their profits out of the drink they sell, they can afford to give food, coarse but abundant, at cost price. This is the real difficulty facing temperance houses, which have, at least, to meet rent, lighting, firing, waiting, and management out of margin on food and temperance beverages, which cannot yield the profits which beer and spirits make. It is a case of quantity versus quality to some extent. There is, however, I firmly believe, a growing sentiment in favour of temperance houses if they compete in brightness, cleanliness, and cheapness with the drink-shops; and this will be fostered by such attractive resorts as the Park Café.

It may be of interest to add that the prices for food, &c., are all-round lower than those at the 10 per cent. dividend earning B.W.'s. No margarine, no foreign meat (good as that is), no long-stewed tea: halfpenny slices of bread and butter, halfpenny cups of tea, &c., penny plates of hot soup, penny puddings, &c.—surely cheapness can go no further, while comfort abounds.

When the upstairs recreation-room is completed, a draught club, already formed, will find quarters, and the billiard tables will, it is expected, swell profits.

Above all, there has been no air of patronage or ostentatious philanthropy about the place. It is managed on business principles, as a self-supporting enterprise, to pay fair interest; while the profits will go to the extension of similar counter-attractions to the ubiquitous and insidious foes of the well-being of society in our city and land.

"ATTENDANCES AT OUR LONDON CHURCHES."

SIR,—It is rather bewildering when a discussion started under one title is led or forced into a discussion under quite another title, as is the case with the discussion started in your columns under the concrete heading "Attendances at our London Churches," by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, but now being carried on under the abstract title of "Rationalism and Devotion," with the still more general title given by Mr. Thompson, "Religious Faith and Church Attendance." There is a touch of logical evolution even in this, since, while Mr. Wicksteed made the whole question of attendance at our London churches turn upon the "crucial question, with us, of worship," Mr. Lummis held that Mr. Wicksteed had thus raised the whole subject of "Rationalism and Devotion" in their mutual relationships, which is beyond dispute, only we must not therefore either mix our subjects or cease to take care in what sense we use our several terms.

Taking the bad attendance at our London churches for granted, and assuming, with only too much reason, that the same sad things are equally true of all our churches as a rule, all your correspondents seem p etty well agreed that the root of the indicated evil of our distinctive church attendance is the far deeper question of the character of our distinctive church worship; but, while personally I think they are all, in the main, right thus far, yet it should never be forgotten that though the worship, such as it is, may mar the attendance, none the less may the shocking lack in the attendance itself tend to inevitable death in the worship. Moreover, I think it is more than possible for us to sink into undue self-depreciation on this question of the inherent character of our public worship and of what is inseparable from it. My own experience in this matter, as in many others, I think, has been somewhat peculiar, and has certainly not gone to show that the worship in our churches is inevitably or uniformly cold, lifeless, and powerless, but may be, and often is, quite the contrary. Thirty years ago, when, having lost one faith, I was seeking another, during part of the interval I attended the services at Dukinfield Chapel, the minister there at the time being the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, the greatly esteemed father of the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, whose letters have led to this discussion. I had been often told how cold, powerless, and dead the worship in all such places was; but, strange to say, the one thing that impressed me more than any other was the warmth, the deep life, the real inward power of the worship, more especially of the prayers of the minister. Though, indeed, it was at a time when what is called "Rationalism," in this connection, had reduced my theology, after over five years of doubt of all sorts, to a mere note of interrogation, yet I am sure I never felt God nearer, or more truly worshipped God, than in that chapel at that time. A little later on, during the same sceptical interval, I had the same experience of the nearness of God and of the reality of worship under the ministry of the Rev. Silas Farrington, at Upper Brook-street Church, Manchester, and that, too, at the very time when Mr. Farrington himself was lamenting something like what your correspondents are lamenting now. Since those far-off days I have not had much chance of judging of the worship of our churches in general, excepting by report, never an adequate basis of judgment; but what I have actually seen and known, both within and without my own church, has not been either wholly bad or wholly good, but mixed, as I fear is the experience of all everywhere, in regard to true worship. On the whole, therefore, I think that those of our friends who talk and write of the coldness, the powerlessness, and the deadness of our public worship should duly qualify their words, whether they set down the worship they so describe as the effect, or both as the cause and the effect, of the poor attendances at our churches which we all profess to lament.

Meanwhile, I am quite certain that, in so far as the failure in our worship itself, as distinct from the attendance upon it, really exists, the remedy is not to be found in the direction indicated by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, if, indeed, one does not quite mistake his meaning, which I do not find by any means clear. If Mr. Wicksteed really does mean, as Mr. Lummis says, that we are "to abandon theology for physics," in order to cure the evils that mar our worship, I cannot doubt that the remedy would prove impossible of adoption, or, if so possible, then worse than the disease. If, on the other hand, Mr. Capleton is right in taking Mr. Wicksteed to mean that the remedy is to come to us "by interpreting Nature through the poetic faculty," I can just as little doubt that the remedy would be about as wise as seeking the moonlight in order to get better illumination than can be got from the sunlight, like the proverbial old woman who said she preferred the moonlight to the sunlight, because the moon shone in the darkness, whilst the sun shone only in the daylight! Certain it is that Wordsworth, from whom Mr. Wicksteed gets, as many others of us have so long done, so many beautiful and inspiring things, would never have seen the forms, heard the voices, or felt the spirit which, to him, as to all the truest poets and prophets, were inseparable from Nature, had it not been for "the vision and the faculty divine" with which he was endowed beforehand. The whole secret of his communion with Nature lay in the fact that it was essentially fellowship between the spirit within him and the kindred spirit in Nature, made real, deep, and infinite, by the "poet-soul," the eternal spirit from whom all things come and on whom all things depend! Separating Nature from Human Nature, or either, or both, from God, we lose all that Wordsworth found in Nature, all that is really distinctive in man, and all that moves, moulds, and inspires in God.

Where the full remedy for the lamented evil does wholly lie it is not easy to say in a brief space, though I think it is something that affects not our worship only, but all the higher and purer life of mankind as well. It is worth, however, the earnest consideration of all our people, whether, without any such tremendous theological or anti-theological revolution as that suggested by Mr. Wicksteed, they could not enormou ly improve our actual worship by actually joining in it with at least decent regularity, and in actually available numbers. I think, too, it would help us if we were just to open our spiritual eyes in the actual spiritual present far better than looking for something which, like what Mr. Wicksteed suggests, must be at least two hundred years distant. I hope I duly appreciate the nineteenth century, but to suppose there is anything in it that demands a reconstruction, or rather a destruction, of the whole theological basis of religious worship is to lose all sense of proportion, perspective, and harmony in the order of the years. Let ministers, who have now actually "to conduct the worship" of the present prepare themselves for it as diligently as they prepare for the sermon, and let the people, who are expected to join in the worship, also prepare themselves for it, and then the remedy for the alleged and lamented defects of our worship will be found on essentially the old lines and in the old paths, though no new line can be absolutely forbidden, or any new path remain untrodden.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION BAZAAR.

SIR,—Readers of THE INQUIRER may have noticed in last week's issue the "Provincial Letter" by the Rev. W. C. Hall. This letter describes the needs of the East Cheshire Christian Union and the effort that is being made to meet them. And in the last paragraph—very modestly and tentatively—is expressed the hope that London friends may be persuaded to help. There are many friends, like myself, who are closely connected with the Northern counties, and many other warm-hearted people, who will surely gladly join in furnishing a stall to represent the goodwill of London at the bazaar next November. May I say that some months ago, my brother, who is treasurer of the Union, begged me to do what I could to provide a "London Stall"? and already some of us at Hampstead are at work, and I hope more will join in. We shall feel greatly encouraged if any friends from any of our London congregations, who can promise either donations or useful articles for sale, will send their names either to Mrs. E. H. Morton, 23, Buckland-crescent, Hampstead; Mrs. Julian Winser, 23, Dalehamgardens, Hampstead; or to me in response to this letter. FRANCES ODGERS.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION AND UNITARIAN WORKERS' UNION.

SIR,—Our many friends and supporters will be glad to hear that a very gratifying tribute has been made to the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union by the late Mrs. Yelland, of Sidmouth, who has left a legacy of £50 to this society.

The expression of sympathy and the substantial help given are extremely encouraging to the Central Postal Mission Committee and this gift will enable them to carry out some useful work which has necessarily been deferred through lack of funds.

May I take this opportunity of reminding friends and subscribers that I am glad to receive subscriptions as early in the year as possible, which should be sent to my private address, "Alaska," York-road, Sutton, Surrey.

ETHEL C. LAKE,
Hon. Treasurer Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union.

OTHER CORRESPONDENCE.

UNDER the heading "Free Education, Free Trade, Free Labour," the Rev. John Davies, of Bridport, writes:—

"Civil and Religious Liberty," sometimes amended as "Civil and Religious Equality," used to be the standard toast at the public dinners of the Unitarian and Free Christian Associations, and I suppose it is so still. We old Unitarians were brought up with that sentiment ringing in our ears, so that it has become an integral part of our mental constitutions, and any violation of it cuts us to the quick. The Unionist Government, past and present, has violated it in its Education Acts, its fiscal policy, and its thinly veiled Chinese slavery in the Transvaal. It is therefore to be hoped that, for the sake of consistency, no Unitarian will henceforth support such a reactionary Unionist Government, but will take the same place as the former Unitarians occupied, viz., the front line of battle for "Civil and Religious Liberty."

Mr. H. C. Charbonnier writes from Bristol on the subject of Butterfly-catching, with reference to a letter from Miss Theodora Mills on a recent Children's Column:—"As one who is devoted to Nature teaching, I should like to say that your correspondent's statements are quite unjustifiable, though probably meant in a most humane spirit. . . . The wish to 'chase the painted butterfly' is innate in children, as in kittens, and therefore not wrong in itself; it needs thoughtful guidance only. Sport, so-called, coursing a hare for instance, is done for the love of the coursing, and is hateful and cruel. But the securing an insect to enable the child to know that insect, is unfortunately necessary, but not necessarily more cruel than picking a flower; and once an accurate knowledge of a species is gained, the insects are not captured, but their appearance recorded, and in this and in observing the insect's ways and habits children's powers of observation are invaluable, besides the habit being of the utmost use in training the child's mind."

ULSTER UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting was held on Monday evening, Feb. 15, in the Central Hall, Belfast. There was a large attendance. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. William Napier, of Clough. The meeting opened with hymn and prayer offered by the Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND.

The Rev. J. A. KELLY, hon. secretary, read the annual report, which said that in the period under review the work of the Association had been well maintained. The depository had been supplied with many new books, and large numbers had been specially ordered for subscribers.

The Rev. GEORGE J. SLIPPER (assistant secretary), in the absence of the hon. treasurer (Mr. Hugh B. Hunter), submitted the annual report, which showed a balance due the treasurer of £15 8s. 10d.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and statement of accounts, said those who had established that Association were justified by the result. It was stated that the report of the Committee was the twenty-eighth annual one. That was quite correct as regards the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association, but they might go back and say it was the seventy-second annual report, because the Association had had a continuity—with only a slight breach—during all those years. The nature and cause of that breach they would rather allow to remain in oblivion. Past controversies and asperities had died a natural death, and there was no clear reason why there should not be toleration amongst them. They had all one object in view, and that was to proclaim, according to time and opportunity and ability, the great principles set forth in the foundation of that society. Having replied to the assertion of the Bishop of Liverpool that Unitarians were living "in a state of spiritual darkness," the Chairman, in conclusion, said it was their bounden duty to let the public know their principles. They were not thirsting to make converts, but they desired that all should have an opportunity of knowing their belief. They believed that Unitarian Christianity satisfied their spiritual wants; it was a religion to live by, and one that prepared them to die in peace with their Maker.

The Rev. THOMAS DUNKERLEY, in seconding the report, said the work that that society sought to do was a work that could not be apparent in all circumstances. It was a work quietly moving when it was doing its best. They were often told that their Unitarian theology consisted of negations. Well, the negations were of those things which hid the light and love of heaven, which would otherwise be self-revealed.

The report and statement of accounts were adopted.

Mr. JOHN ROGERS moved—"That this meeting welcomes the presence of the Rev. Henry Williamson in Belfast, and returns to him its warm thanks for his able and impressive sermons in aid of the Association." He referred to the splendid fight which Mr. Williamson had made in Dundee for Unitarianism. Dr. Torrey had stated that Unitarianism was doing the work of the devil; but a greater man than the Bishop of Liverpool or Dr. Torrey had said—"By their fruits ye shall know them."

The Rev. ALEXANDER ASHWORTH seconded the resolution, which was passed.

The Rev. HENRY WILLIAMSON, in the course of his reply, said that in Scotland a large proportion of the young ministers were teaching something which was largely like Unitarianism. The admissions made every day showed that the teaching of the Unitarian scholars in regard to the Bible was sound. Presbyterian ministers sometimes told him that they were further advanced than he was. They were not, however, quite far enough advanced to come and stand beside him. He did not believe that Calvinism was really at home in Scotland. The 23rd Psalm represented the religion of Scotland, while the Shorter Catechism perhaps represented its theology. Sectarianism, he believed, was standing in the way of the general improvement of society. There was no disposition to do good for goodness sake. Unitarians, he thought, were not open to reproach in that direction, and along this line a great work was going to be opened for them.

The Rev. J. A. KELLY moved a resolution reaffirming the principles and objects of the Association. Their foundation, he said, was broad, liberal, Scriptural, and practical withal, and on it they were persuaded might be built temples and palaces of faith as varied and as infinitely grand as any reasonable age might require or the freest liberty demand.

The Rev. G. V. CROOK (Newry) seconded the resolution, which was passed unanimously.

Votes of thanks to the First Church and to the chair, followed by hymn and prayer, brought the meeting to a close.

CARMARTHEN PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE.—The Rev. Philemon Moore, B.A., has accepted the invitation of the Presbyterian Board to return to the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, as Professor of Semitic Languages and Hellenistic Greek, on the retirement of the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, M.A., who goes to Bolton. Since his earlier occupation of the chair Professor Moore has been engaged in extended Semitic studies at Strassburg. He enters on his new duties, we understand, at Easter.

A SIN without its punishment is as impossible, as complete a contradiction in terms, as a cause without an effect.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bolton (Bank-street).—On Thursday, February 18, Mr. Harold Coventry, of Liverpool, gave a lecture to the Bank-street Temperance Society on "Temperance Public Houses: a Liverpool Experiment," telling of the effort of the Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Society in establishing the public-house, opened on October 21, as to which a descriptive article will be found in our present issue. Mr. Edgar M. Taylor was in the chair, and a cordial vote of thanks to Mr. Coventry was passed.

Dover.—On Tuesday, Feb. 16, Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S.. gave a lecture at the Adrian-street Chapel on the Carpathian Mountains, showing some unique slides from photographs of the salt mines, specially taken for the lecturer by order of the Hungarian Government.

Framlingham and Bedfield.—On Monday evening at the former and Tuesday evening at the latter place, Mr. Lot Whitworth, lecturer of the Suffolk Temperance Council, delivered lectures, with limelight illustrations, entitled "Searchlights on the Drink Traffic."

Horsham.—On Tuesday, Feb. 16, the Rev. Edgar Daplyn lectured at the Free Christian Church on "Dante Gabriel Rossetti." At the last quarterly meeting of the Horsham Museum Society, at the same place, Mr. J. Lewis, F.S.A., gave a lecture on "Old Sussex Ironwork."

Liverpool Postal Mission.—The annual meeting was held in the Hope-street Church Hall, on Saturday, Feb. 20, when, by the invitation of Miss Bowring, about 60 met for tea, as a pleasant preliminary to the business of the afternoon. A larger gathering had been anticipated, but a very wet day, no doubt, accounted for the small size of the meeting. The Rev. H. D. Roberts occupied the chair. The report showed a steady increase in the correspondence, which had grown too large for the present staff of workers to do satisfactorily, and more help was asked for, to keep pace with the work. The Co-operative News had been more successful than any other paper, but the most hopeful sign was the large increase in the number of old readers. The accounts show a reduced debit balance; there is no doubt that with more money and more helpers, the work might be very largely extended. Miss E. K. McConnell read some interesting extracts from letters, which show how much help has been given, and how thoroughly it is appreciated by the readers and correspondents. Rev. Charles Harvey-Cook, of Warrington, suggested that to each inquirer a leaflet or small book of a purely devotional character might be sent, and so help the applicants to feel that even in the midst of their doubts, and the giving up of old faiths, which they can no longer think are true, there are always the undying realities of religion to hold fast to, and that these remain, whatever a man's belief may be. Rev. J. Collins Odgers bore testimony to the help given to inquirers by Postal Mission workers, and Rev. R. A. Armstrong spoke of the need for more workers, appealing to those who could help to do so. He heartily approved of Mr. Harvey-Cook's suggestion, which he hoped would be carried out, and suggested Mr. Tarrant's little books as very suitable and helpful. A vote of thanks to Miss Bowring and the chairman closed the proceedings.

Liverpool (Ullet-road).—On Thursday, February 18, a congregational soirée was held in the Church Hall to welcome the Rev. J. Collins Odgers and Mrs. Odgers. There was a large attendance of members of the congregation and of friends from sister churches in the Liverpool district. Among the visitors were the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, J. L. Haigh, J. Crossley, J. C. Hirst, R. P. Farley, Lloyd-Jones, F. B. Mott, J. M. Mills, and H. D. Roberts. After an hour spent in social intercourse, Mr. Philip Holt, Chairman of the Church Council, took the chair. In congratulating the congregation on the settlement of Mr. Odgers as their minister, and giving a hearty welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Odgers, he remarked that as a religious body they were widely separated from the religious communities by which they were surrounded. The principle on which they united, and many of their opinions, were not accepted by others. In tracing their spiritual ancestry they went back to the expulsion of Nonconformists in 1662. The clergy who refused to conform were, as a rule, not out of sympathy with the theology to which their assent was demanded; but they objected to bind themselves by the formal acceptance of statements of faith which would prevent the reception of truth that might subsequently appear. From them modern Unitarians inherited their freedom in religion, and to their freedom they owe their theology. Comparatively isolated as they were, he was convinced there were large numbers of persons who had been compelled to relinquish orthodox convictions, and to whom they had a special message. A minister among them occupied a position of great responsibility; but, on the other hand, a congregation had great responsibilities to their minister. If they invited him to a difficult work they should give him hearty and loyal support, and, in particular, they should attend as regularly as possible the public worship in which they had asked him to be their leader. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong spoke on behalf of the neighbouring ministers and ministers' wives, and in their name tendered warm welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Odgers. He knew that it was very wrong for a minister to form any wish concerning the man to be chosen to fill a vacant pulpit in his vicinity. Nevertheless, when the Ullet-road pulpit became vacant he wished most earnestly that one man might be selected—the very man to whom they were then giving welcome. Mr. Odgers and he were friends of many years' standing; indeed, their friendship went back to the time when he was a senior and Mr. Odgers a junior student at Manchester College. The classic days of their churches in Liverpool were the days when Mr. Martineau was minister at Paradise-street, and later at Hope-street, and Mr. Thom at Renshaw-street. Those two great men were bound together by the closest and most sympathetic friendship, and their work and influence owed something to their personal relations. The conditions had changed; the men were very different; yet he ventured to hope that it was a fact of auspicious augury that the successors to the two pulpits were again most intimate friends. Mr. Odgers gratefully acknowledged the welcome extended to him and Mrs. Odgers. He was glad indeed to find himself associated once more with his old fellow-student, Mr. Armstrong, as the pastor of a kindred congregation in that city, and joined heartily with him in the wish that the bonds of brotherhood and co-operation connecting all their churches in that neighbourhood might be drawn closer together in the coming years. He referred to certain links of connection which had existed between himself and previous ministers of Renshaw-street and Ullet-road. Nearly forty years ago his elder brother had been one of their assistant ministers. Of Mr. Thom he had a clear recollection, and recalled a pleasant afternoon spent with him at Greenbank twenty-five years ago. He spoke also of Mr. Channing, Mr. Beard, Mr. Jacks, and Dr. Klein. Among the great and lasting benefits which he had received from Mr. Beard, he said, was the exhortation to learn to preach without a MS., and to trust to the living word of God in their hearts And now those links of connection had been drawn tighter; he had been most kindly welcomed as their pastor, and was looking forward to the future with much hopefulness. He had lately been reading a very useful and suggestive little book written by an American clergyman, entitled "Quiet Hints to Growing Preachers." He hoped that he might still grow in power as a preacher; and therefore he was not above taking a hint or two from that book. There was in it an excellent chapter on "Starts Good and Bad." The writer advised no minister at the beginning of his work to publish a programme of all that he hoped to accomplish, for in a few months' time the outcome of his labours would be sure to look insignificant indeed, as compared with the initial prophecy; further, he advised no minister to despise or to belittle any activity, or institution already in existence in connection with his church, for he might be sure that those who had been upon the spot for years past would know far better than he the nature of the soil and the kind of plant that would best flourish there. It was, however, the paramount duty of the beginner in making his start to see that he obeyed Christ's command, "Feed My sheep." Progress could only be made, success could only be reaped, when those who listened to a preacher from Sunday to Sunday felt that they were nourished intellectually, morally, and spiritually. If the pasturage were meagre the shepherd would soon find himself without a flock. Now he came before them that night with no programme or scheme of what he intended to accomplish; certainly he would seek to cherish and not to supersede the various institutions which had grown up under the shadow of their church; but his special desire would be that he might be able to feed his flock and never to send them empty away. Mr. Odgers alluded to the fact that there were churches of almost all denominations in their immediate vicinity, but not one of them could boast of a similar inheritance of religious freedom. After noticing a few of the wonderful and unforeseen results which had proceeded from that great principle of religious liberty, he concluded by thanking all present for the most kind and cordial welcome which had been given him, and by expressing the hope that in the coming days the Divine blessing might rest upon his labours.

London: Central Postal Mission.—On Tuesday evening a conference, moderately attended, was held at Essex Hall, when Mr. T. J. Hardy, B.A., read a paper on "The Newer Religious Thought and Practical Life," followed by a brief discussion. Dr. Herbert Smith was to have presided, but engagements in connection with the County Council election prevented him from being present, and his place was taken by Mr. C. A. Ginever, of Stepney. Mr. Hardy's paper was an eloquent and very earnest plea for the religious conception of life, based on present experience, liberated from the bondage of old dogmatic conceptions. Only love, he said, can redeem the world; and the new thought of God was as "the all-pervading will to love." The great fact which modern thought brought home to them was of unity in the universe, by virtue of the one living energy, of which religion rightly spoke as conscious energy, the conscious energy of Love. Consciousness of the great truth could only be attained by simplicity, the patient desire for a pure and guileless life. "Blessed are the simple in heart, for they shall see God," was, he thought, a legitimate rendering of the beatitude of Jesus. In simplicity of heart and sincerity, they found the secret of the true vision, which was not merely the result of intellectual faculty, but a perception on the part of the whole character. From that vision followed communion with the Divine, and a practical faith in the triumph of the good. So looking to life not bounded by death, they learnt to judge more truly of the physical conditions of life, and of the nature of the evils from which they suffered. Life was encircled by law, and the spiritual was supreme over the material. Mutual service was the gist of moral life, and all selfishness was sin. So regarded, every detail of life gained divine significance, home and work were both purified and ennobled, and their religion, which was life, was freed from the taint both of worldliness and other-worldliness.

London: Hackney.—The annual meeting of the New Gravel Pit congregation was held on the 17th inst., the treasurer, Mr. A. J. Collier, in the chair. In submitting the report and accounts, he said the expenditure was much the same as in previous years, and he hoped the deficit would soon be made good. There had been a small increase in membership. He referred with great regret to the resignation of the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor. The committee had in vain urged Mr. Bloor to reconsider it, and they could only wish him and Mrs. Bloor prosperity and happiness in their work at Reading. A resolution embodying the feeling of the congregation, and thanking Mr. Bloor for his services, was subsequently unanimously passed. Mr. Collier announced that, owing to probable removal from the neighbourhood, he must resign the treasurership, which he had held for seven years and Mr. C. W. Cornish, who had been secretary, since 1880, also resigned, owing to the distance of his residence from the church. Mr. F. D. Bowles was appointed treasurer, and Mr. G. H. Clennell secretary, and the retiring officers were cordially thanked for their services. Thanks were also tendered to the organist and choir, and reference made to the steps taken to strengthen and improve the choir.

London: Islington.—At the meeting of the Unity Church Literary Society on Thursday, March 18, a lecture was given by Mr. S. T. Rodger, on "Macbeth." There was a good attendance, and the lecture was much appreciated, a vote of thanks being passed on the motion of the Rev. E. Savell Hicks. At the next meeting of the Society the Rev. Edgar Daplyn is to lecture on Coleridge.

Norwich.—The services at the Octagon last Sunday were conducted by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, and there were large congregations morning and evening. The Norwich Mercury of Feb. 24 devotes nearly a column to a report of the sermons. In the morning Mr. Hopps preached on the subject of the Temptation, from the words, "Man shall not live by bread alone," &c., and dwelt on the prevalence of a sordid worldliness in present day life. The warning of the narrative was needed in national no less than in personal life. "The devil at the present day was taking the nations of the world into an exceeding high mountain and showing them the kingdoms of the earth and the glory thereof, and the result was that most nations were trying to live by bread alone. 'All these things will I give thee if thou wilt fall down and worship me.' But nations could not live by extension of territory alone or money alone." The subject of the evening sermon was, "What then is it to be a Christian?"

Scarborough.—A well attended and successful tea and congregational meeting was held on Shrove Tuesday. The Revs. Frederic Allen and F. Heming Vaughan were present, and gave helpful addresses. Mr. Vaughan mentioned Tolstoy as a powerful ally to the cause of Unitarian Christianity by the power of his thought and the depth of his religious life. Mr. Allen was present on behalf of the publication department of the B. and F. U. A. and the S. S. A., and a generous gift by Mr. Morton to the Sunday-school enabled the teachers to make considerable additions to the Sunday-school library. Following the addresses was a useful and interesting discussion on the form of service used, and certain modifications were suggested. The speeches were pleasantly interspersed with music and recitations.

Whitchurch.—On Wednesday, February 17, the annual tea and business meeting of the Church of St. Saviour was held in the recently renovated schoolroom. Notwithstanding the deep snow the attendance was satisfactory. After tea the usual business was transacted, and a hearty vote of thanks were accorded Miss Lewis and Miss Dodd for their voluntary services during the year, and also to the Rev. C. D. Badland for the good work done not only for the church but in the town generally, especially in the cause of Temperance. Business over, the rest of the evenihg was spent in games of various kind. On the following evening the scholars had their treat in the schoolroom, when a thoroughly enjoyable time was spent by teachers and scholars alike.

MR. G. H. PERRIS, editor of Concord, the organ of the International Peace and Arbitration Association, and formerly connected with the Speaker, has been appointed secretary of the Cobden Club, in succession to Mr. Harold Cox. Mr. Perris, who is the eldest son of the Rev. H. W. Perris, of Forest Gate, is well known as a very capable writer and lecturer, an earnest advocate of peace, and an enlightened liberalism. He has written on Tolstoy, "The Eastern Crisis and British Policy," "The Protectionist Peril," "Trade, Empire, and Armaments," "The Hague Conference," &c. We congratulate Mr. Perris on his new appointment.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Centenary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, as to which more is said in our leading article, falls on Monday, March 7, but the celebrations begin to-day with a mass meeting for Young People in the Albert Hall, and to-morrow at noon the King and Queen are to attend a special service at St. Paul's, when the Archbishop of Canterbury is to preach. At Washington President Roosevelt is also to attend a special centenary service.

AMONGST the many excellent means taken by the British and Foreign Bible Society to make its work widely known, are its popular illustrated reports. The one for 1902-3 is full of information and splendid illustrations. It is entitled "The Conquests of the Bible." This report, together with that for 1900-1, entitled "Behold a Sower," also excellently illustrated, will repay the small outlay (of 1s. each to non-subscribers) a thousandfold for its genuine worth in the presentment of its theme both by word and picture. They seem to us to form a real aid to Bible study, and would be invaluable to Sunday-school teachers, who frequently lack just such telling illustrations of men and manners, climes and customs. There is something quite charming in such illustrations as that of "A Street in Antioch," "A Water-carrier in Palestine," "Ruins of the Tower of Babel," "A Syrian Side Street—Aleppo," and endless others.

AMONGST other good things that one may cull from the pages of the "Report," testifying that reports are not necessarily dry, and need never be taken as read until read, are such mottoes and maxims as these :—

Captains and conquerors leave a little dust,
And kings a dubious legend of their reign,
The swords of Cæsar they are less than rust,
The Bible doth remain.

"One measure of rice was sown; but one hundred measures have been reaped."—Malagasi Proverb.

The chief proof, after all, that the Bible is good food is the eating of it: the healing efficacy of the medicine, when it is used, is a demonstration that it is good.—General Gordon.

ONE of the original motives of the Bible Society was to make the Bible as cheap and common as possible in our country. The following prices may be said to speak for themselves :—In 1804 an octavo English Bible, small pica, cost 12s.; in 1904 it is sold for 2s.; in 1804 a nonpareil school Bible cost 4s. 6d., in 1904 it is sold for 10d.; in 1804 a brevier school New Testament cost 1s. 8d., in 1904 it can be had for 4d. Testaments can be had for a penny each, and separate Gospels for a halfpenny.

As regards the Revised Version the University Press has already done great things in the issue of cheap editions, but now with this Centenary comes an added triumph, for the Bible Society takes the matter up, and will devote its world-wide powers to the dissemination of the Revised as well as the Authorised Version. Four special editions are issued by the University Press for the Bible Society, in connection with the Centenary: a large Bible in bold small pica type for 2s., which will be a great luxury to many readers, a smaller book in nonpareil, 16mo., for 10d., and another in the same type, with revised references and maps, bound in roan, 2s. 6d. But what we chiefly rejoice over is the brevier 16mo. New Testament for 4d. This will be a great boon in Sunday-schools, where many teachers must have had compunction in making the children read from much smaller type.

SOME of our readers know that Dr. Edward Everett Hale is the first Unitarian chaplain of the United States Senate. They may have vague impressions respecting Dr. Hale's persistent and consistent labours on behalf of social reform, by virtue of which, there can be no doubt, he has attained to the high eminence of the chaplaincy. But since it is the duty of every man to reduce the penumbra of vagueness in his knowledge as quickly as possible, we commend to notice Dr. Hale's pages, entitled "Good News," that appear regularly in the Christian Register (Boston). These pages do not, indeed, tell all that the veteran social prophet has done, or all that he means to do; but they are luminous with the spirit that is in him—a spirit of public service that is sadly lacking on both sides of the Atlantic.

HERE, for instance, is the County County election taking place. The issues involved are vast. The mere money concerned exceeds the revenue of many a state. The number of persons whose health and convenience, not to say whose well-being and very life are at stake, is equal to the population of whole colonies, and exceeds that of Ireland. The children of school-age, who are now to be brought directly under the care of the Council, alone number about a million. A contest for places in the government of so important a portion of the British Empire would undoubtedly be regarded with great interest if it lay anywhere but at the very centre. Our journalists, however, with their fine instinct for what will pay with the public, are mostly content to allot to this subject a good deal less space in their columns, and, we should say, much less money, than the tour of Mr. Warner's cricket team.

NOW Dr. Hale never wearies of warning his countrymen against the perils incurred by a nation, ostensibly self-governed, that will not take the trouble to govern itself: To judge by what we hear of the character and doings of the men who, in the absence of a widespread popular interest, run the political machinery of the States, his warnings are but too well justified. At present we in this country suffer from only the minor evils of such a system as applied to Parliamentary matters; but with the example of Grimsby and Dover immediately before us, it must be confessed that some of our municipalities at least are quite ready to take a leaf out of the book of Tammany. If the larger cities are on the whole free from the taint of bribery and corruption, it is due, not to the absence of would-be corruptors, bent first of all and all the time on the furtherance of their own special interests, but to the vigilance of a comparative few, who are zealous for the public good. London has but too much reason to be ashamed of the Metropolitan Board of Works, which, as an indirectly elected body, escaped, unhappily, the fierce light that ought to beat upon all governing bodies.

THE London County Council, upon which the Progressives have been in power from the first, has held its head proudly above the slightest suspicion of corrupt practice; and that in itself is a great gain in these days, when even Cabinets, apparently, do not shrink from making shocking bargains with the capitalists of the Rand. The Progressives, in their fifteen years of power, have had enormous works in hand, and doubtless in some points they have made mistakes, but compared with the success attained, their degree of failure has been venial. We believe that now, as hitherto, the majority of those Londoners who take any interest in public affairs are on their side. They believe in the men, and they support the policy. But how large is this majority of public-spirited citizens? How far will the efforts of the "interests," and especially the educational reactionaries, stir up an unthinking vote on the other side? These points will be settled for us to-day. We can only urge at the last moment that it is the duty of every voter to vote. Women, by a vagary of our half-hearted franchise system, may here at least make their influence felt. We hope that London will show itself thoroughly in earnest, and that it will elect a Council of men pledged to the Progressive policy of efficient public service, intelligent and impartial administration of the Education Acts, temperance reform, the improvement of the condition of the poor, and a true civic unity.

THE Bishop of Stepney, after commending the good works of the Progressives in past Councils, has finally given his best blessing to the Moderates in the present contest, despite the bad traditions of their party as obstructives and friends of the publican. The reason why he supports them is clearly to be found in his confidence that if there is any favour to Church schools possible in the administration of the Education Acts, the Moderates, true to their party instincts, will show it; while the Progressives merely promise to administer the Acts with impartiality, and for the good of the community as a whole. Some outcry has been heard concerning the intrusion of the Bishops into this contest; but it does not lie in the power of the supporters of the Free Church Council to protest without obvious inconsistency. We have no serious fears respecting the power of the priest in London: the great bulk of the people are either too independent or too indifferent to be greatly swayed by an episcopal manifesto. No doubt the clerical party has worked very hard, however, and the difference will probably be marked in the polls. So much the more reason for activity on the part of those whose aims are against sectarianism in every shape; and meanwhile, we cannot help thinking, so much the more risk to the Church itself, in thus ranging itself against the forces that make for a healthier and purer London.

THE House of Commons came to close quarters on Monday with the question of the ruinous competition in armaments which led the Tsar five years ago to summon his great Convention at The Hague. Little resulted at The Hague—so far, at least, as this particular question is concerned—and little resulted in the House of Commons beyond the reduced Government majority, which seems now to have become a normal characteristic of the debates. Nevertheless, it is hard to believe that the day when some international agreement will be arrived at, at least with regard to naval shipbuilding, is as far away as the facts seem at first to suggest. It is true that since the Tsar's Eirenicon the dockyard orders of the great naval Powers have been even larger than before, but the very acceleration of the pace of the competition should surely of itself act as an additional incentive to an attempt to agree upon the imposition of a limit.

THE amendment to the Navy estimates rejected on Monday was to the effect that, in view of the heavy burdens of our national expenditure, the Government should enter into communication with the great naval Powers in order to ascertain whether they would be prepared to diminish their programme of shipbuilding, and to adjust upon some permanent basis their relative naval strength. The reply was the usual one on these occasions. Our Navy only existed for defence; the vastness of our mercantile marine, the distance of our colonies, and our own dependence on sea-borne supplies for the necessities of life made it of vital importance that our Navy should be of overwhelming strength, and foreign nations ought not to look to us to take the initiative in a matter of this kind. And it was added that this country was, nevertheless, prepared to consider any proposition from any foreign country for reducing naval armaments that might be made to it. The rejoinder of the other Powers, however, is obvious. While Britain, already possessing a navy more than equal to those of any two of her opponents, continues from year to year to build ever more and more ships, they are bound, they say, to strain every nerve to provide against the menace it presents to them, and they declare that if anyone is to propose a truce the initiative plainly lies with the Power which has secured and is maintaining so overwhelming a lead in the race.

To ourselves, we confess, the arguments in favour of Great Britain taking the first step in the matter seem irrefutable when once it is agreed that some action by someone is desirable. And that action is desirable is surely beyond all argument. Through all the years that this race has been proceeding in its modern form no material change in the balance of naval power—at least as between ourselves and the rest of the world—has been secured by any of the Governments that have engaged in it. Increase has been met by increase, and either side has used the increase made by the other as the justification to its own people, and to the world at large, for the increase with which it follows it up. Each enlargement, on whichever side, has at the same time been an answer to a previous enlargement on the other side, and the challenge and excuse for another enlargement in response to it. Each side believes that its own increase will restore the status quo, and that the increase with which the other side responds destroys it. Everyone is convinced of the futility of the whole proceeding, but each holds everyone else to blame but himself.

WE recognise to the full the difficulties in the way of any arrangement, even when the first step has been taken and a definite proposal for the abandonment of competition made. Different Powers place different values on the several classes of boats which constitute a modern navy, and make different allowances in their computation of their strength for depreciation through the supersession of old methods of construction by new. This is not the place in which to discuss possible expedients for overcoming these difficulties; Suffice it that there are competent authorities who believe that, given a sincere desire to do so on the part of those taking part in the conference, such expedients could be found. It is true that the Tsar made the attempt to secure agreement and failed. But his proposals were far vaster than that now under consideration, giving the first place to the limitation of military rather than of naval armaments. Moreover, as we have already suggested, the experience of the five years which have since elapsed must have done much to increase the public conviction of the necessity of the step, and to supply fresh impetus for the task of overcoming the difficulties in the way. We are glad to believe, from the Opposition speeches in Monday's debate, that a new Government will take an early opportunity of bringing this question before the Powers on Britain's behalf. If they fail they fail, but it will be something to know that Britain has at least made the attempt to stem this barbarous and insane competition which is sapping the strength of the nations.

THE announcement of the coming retirement of Sir William Harcourt from the House of Commons has been received with wide regret by all sections and parties in public life. Sir William has been a vigorous fighter, not afraid of giving and receiving hard blows, but he has stood in a peculiar degree since Mr. Gladstone's death for the old world chivalry of political life inside and outside the House of Commons, and with him Parliament will largely lose touch with traditions of great value. But the loss to the cause of progress which his retirement will involve is still greater. Since the memorable struggle over the Budget of 1894, his reform of the Death Duties has come to be regarded by all parties as a memorable service to national finance, in spite of the helpless extravagance which in subsequent years has robbed the country of so large a part of the benefits which would otherwise have accrued from it. Many had hoped to see him inaugurate a yet greater reform—the taxation of land values—but that is not to be. Happily his retirement bids fair to coincide with the signal defeat of that spirit of vainglory and aggression which has wrought such incalculable mischief in the near past, and whose power of further ill he has himself worked so hard to destroy.

THE proposed change in the constitution of the Honour Theology School at Oxford, the effect of which is to admit others besides priests of the Church of England to examine in that school, came before Congregation on Tuesday. (Congregation is the Assembly of resident Masters of Arts, and there is an appeal from its decisions to Convocation, which consists of all Masters of Arts whose names are still on the books.) The Master of University College, who submitted the motion, relied upon a sound philalethian principle. It was, he said, an improper and illogical thing that any of the great schools should be hampered by being denominational. The work of the University was to advance learning, not to advance creeds. Professor Ince, on the other side, said the question was not whether they were to have an undenominational school, but whether they were to have a Christian school—a school of Christian thought. If by Christianity is meant the acceptance of a creed, this is a true contention, for the effect of the new statute is to remove all dogmatic restrictions, so that candidates may be examined simply in what they know, not in what they believe. The preamble was carried by a majority of 50: Placet 123, Non-placet 73. But it will, no doubt, be taken forward to Convocation, and very possibly defeated in that body.

ONE result of the long dispute between Lord Penrhyn and his quarrymen was the formation of the North Wales Quarries, Limited, which held its first half-yearly meeting at the Co-operative Wholesale Society's meeting-room, in Manchester, last Saturday. Of the £30,000 capital asked for, about £25,000 has been subscribed; £13,466 of this amount being contributed by co-operative societies, and £3.800 by trades unions. The company has acquired three properties in North Wales—Pantdreiniog Quarry, Moel Faban Quarry, and Tan-y-Bwlch Quarry. The first five months' working shows a small profit, and a fair dividend is expected in the future, as the quarries are now working in a satisfactory manner. Mr. Richard Bell, M.P., the chairman of directors, remarked on the importance of this new departure in the industrial world, the venture having been undertaken conjointly by trades unionists and co-operators.

THE students at New College (London) have been debating the question:—That Congregationalism fails to attract the working classes. Those of us who are able to remember the free, irresponsible mood of our own debating society days know how fearless we were; we never failed to say quite all we meant, and the fact that our conclusion was a pessimistic one was far from daunting us. This may be the best mood for arriving at the truth. Older men might have hesitated to affirm so disconcerting a thought, even if they suspected it to be a true one. The students were more courageous, and their scepticism may well be a most important part of their equipment for future ministerial work. The case for the affirmative was supported by statistics, and the figures were interpreted by Mr. J. M. Jones, B.A., who tersely summed up the matter in the reflection that our Church ideally was most democratic, but actually most autocratic. No church had a right to be individualistic.

THE movement for uniting the minor bodies of Methodists seems to be making steady progress. There is no general disposition to rush matters, and none to abandon effort. Fraternal meetings of representatives of the three denominations which seem most closely allied (Free Methodists, New Connexion, Bible Christian) have taken place at Newcastle, Sheffield, and Manchester. Difficulties have been discussed, plans suggested, financial calculations made, objections listened to, with the general result of a growing conviction that, although a date cannot yet be fixed, though details cannot yet be decided, though sticklers for consistency cannot yet be re-assured, the three, at least, will by and by become one. At one of the meetings the Rev. G. Parker (Methodist New Connexion) stated that 90 per cent. of their quarterly meetings answered the questions recently presented to them on the subject with the word "Yes."

READERS of THE INQUIRER will perhaps remember M. Paul Sabatier's appeal for funds with which to provide school breakfasts for the poor children of Assisi. They may be interested to hear that the "Refezione Scolastica marche admirablement" and surpasses all his hopes. Teachers and children breakfast together, M. Sabatier says, in a recent letter to Mr. H. B. Binns, and he adds, "Jamais service de Se. Cène religieuse ne m'a autant édifié que cette simple communion laïque."

WE recently chronicled the rapid growth of the adult school movement in Leicestershire and elsewhere. The York Union now reports the establishment of eight new schools in the old Cathedral city in the last fourteen months. Four of these are furnished with social club-rooms, bringing the number of such clubs in York and its suburbs up to six. A meeting on Valentine's day was attended by about 1,000 scholars, and the school attendance on the preceding Sunday reached 1,200. This is nearly three times the average York attendance recorded in 1902. We believe that this rapid increase in the York schools is largely due to the effort made in the last two years to enlist the active help of men and women of various religious bodies. The population of the city is about 80,000, so that even in York there is still elbow-room for the adult school movement.

WE have turned with the greatest interest over the pages of the January number of the Japanese magazine the Rikugo-Zasshi, grateful for the consideration which has printed a table of contents in English. One of the leading articles is a "National Conviction," and there is a lecture on "Christ's Teachings in Accordance with Ideal." Of the "Report of Unity Hall," which also appears in this number, Mr. T. Yoshimoto, who is at present studying at Manchester College, Oxford, has been good enough to furnish us with an interpretation. It is a record of current events at Unity Hall, the headquarters of the Unitarians of Japan, during the months of December and January last. Among the subjects of addresses given we find on Dec. 20 "Christ as Peace Advocate," and in the evening "The Division of Labour in Religion" and "The Relations between the Powers." The Christmas meeting was held on the evening of Dec. 24, when the hall was beautifully decorated, and there were many entertainments, such as singing, story-telling, fancy dress processions, &c. On Jan. 10 the addresses were on "The reading of books is one thing and the reading of letters is another thing," and in the evening, "The Way Every Man should Follow."

OF Mr. Travers Herford's masterly work on "Christianity in Talmud and Midrash," now published by Messrs. Williams & Norgate, we hope before long to offer to our readers a full review. It bears the following inscription:—

To the memory of ABRAHAM KUENEN, sometime Professor of Theology in the University of Leiden, this book is gratefully dedicated by one of his old students.

Mr. Herford's book, for the first time, collects all the passages from the Rabbinical literature of the first four Christian centuries (so far as diligent search over an enormous field could avail to that end), in which there is any reference to Jesus or to the origin and early history of Christianity. Of all such passages a translation is given, with commentary added. "I wish to write," Mr. Herford says, "solely from the point of view of historical scholarship, with no bias towards either of the two great religions whose representatives are mentioned in the passages dealt with." And he concludes:—

As a Christian, who has for several years found his chief and absorbing intellectual interest in the study of the Rabbinical literature—so far as other and more pressing claims on his time would allow—I offer this book as a contribution to Christian scholarship, and I trust that the great Jewish scholars, whose works have been of so much help to me, will not frown on my small incursion into their domain.

We may be satisfied that a work of permanent value and of high scholarship is thus completed, and must congratulate Mr. Herford on the achievement of so great a task.

IN the British Friend for February there is a résumé of Anatole France's able introduction to the speeches of the French Premier on the Educational crisis. M. France traces the evolution of French political affairs from the Dreyfus trial to the suppression of the unauthorised Congregations, and describes the parts of Waldeck-Rousseau and Emile Combes. The object of the latter is to free French education from all sectarian influence, in order that it may become worthy of the guardianship of the sons and daughters of France. We too have our Educational crisis, and cannot but sympathise with those who are fighting the same battle across the Channel.

"God and My Neighbour."

III.—Is God Loving?

"We make a serious mistake," says a recent thoughtful writer,* "if we suppose that unbelief comes about in the majority of cases as the result of intellectual difficulties." It is in the region of the emotions that denial most frequently has its origin; it is the existence of evil which makes men doubt a good and loving God. Intellectually weak, as we have seen it to be, the strength of popular agnosticism lies in its emotional appeal, its emphasis on the apparent contradiction between a God defined as Love and a world exhibiting suffering and sorrow in myriad variety. Not whether He is, but whether He is good, is seriously questioned; and it is in view of such phenomena as war, famine, pestilence, cancer, and the rest that "Nunquam" pronounces the Christian view of God as a heavenly Father to be "a very lofty, poetical, and gratifying conception, but . . . not true."

It must be confessed that the despairing pessimism which prompts this summary verdict would have been more convincing were it not balanced by the author's personal confession: "I have had a really good time on the whole. . . . I have found life agreeable and amusing, and I'm glad I came. . . . I think somebody or something has been very good to allow me to come in, and see the fun, and stay so long" (p. 125); but no doubt he was equally sincere in penning his diatribe against life in general, and in pronouncing his own life "agreeable," and the Power that gave him it "very good." We may also, being concerned not merely with a problem as such, but with "Nunquam's" view of that problem, remind him of another utterance of his—the questions which he asks and answers, with the admiration for the grandeur of the visible universe strong upon him: "Do you believe that the God who imagined and created such a universe could be petty, base, cruel, revengeful, and capable of error?" "Do you think He is the kind of Creator to make blunders and commit crimes?" "I do not believe it" (pp. 45, 46). In those words "Nunquam" has stated summarily the believer's position; and one can but regret that, having thus in one part of his book pronounced God incapable of "blunders and crimes," he should presently debit Him with the sum-total of all the blunders and crimes that are committed under the sun, ordaining the evil which He could, and therefore ought to have prevented, and permitting all manner of pain, when by the mere exercise of His almighty will He could—and, if He were indeed loving, would—have excluded it from the world.

I can, of course, attempt to glance only at one or two aspects of this complex question, and that hurriedly, in the present paper; but I must premise to what I have to say, that it is a priori unlikely that we should be able to answer that question "unto perfection." It is, to say the least, inherently probable that some of the designs of an Infinite Intelligence should transcend our comprehension. Even the average chess-player does not pretend to understand—and therefore abstains from criticising—every move of one of the giants of the game. Enough if we can see hints of meanings here and there, observe a beneficent tendency in the working of the whole—such as Aristotle already discerned when he said that nature is constantly aiming at something better, dark puzzles notwithstanding.

"Nunquam's" contention—it is really his whole case—that God could have made the world perfect because He is omnipotent, rests on a very common misunderstanding of what omnipotence means. Omnipotence does not mean, nor does it include, a power to do what is, per se, absurd or self-contradictory: it cannot make two straight lines enclose a space or parts that are greater than the whole they compose; it cannot make a finite mind or object to be at the same time infinite. Now perfection naturally belongs to, is predicable of, the Infinite alone: all that is finite, all that is in part, is for that reason imperfect, and could not be otherwise, because "finite perfection" is a self-contradiction, and therefore outside the scope of omnipotence to bring to pass. Now one of the forms of imperfection inseparable from finite, sentient beings is their liability to pain; and imperfection being the condition of all finite existence, such beings could not have been created sentient, yet not liable to pain. Of course, God might have refrained from creating us altogether; but that is not quite the question at issue, and even "Nunquam," with all his sense of the shortcomings of this world, is "glad he came."

Moreover, sentiency itself is a faculty exemplifying what is true of every faculty, viz., it is of its essence that it should be capable of being exercised in opposite directions. Just as we could not be sensitive to degrees of heat without being equally sensitive to degrees of cold, so there could not be a faculty for experiencing pleasure without a corresponding faculty for feeling pain. There is nothing fanciful or arbitrary about that—nothing that God ordained, "just choosing so," or that omnipotence could have helped, any more than the fact that the sum of the interior angles of a triangle is equal to two right angles. Pleasure and pain belong to each other as the reverse and obverse of the same thing, viz., sentiency; we could not be exempt from feeling the one except on condition that we did not feel the other; and hence to wish that we had been created incapable of feeling pain is as though we wished "to do away with the light for the sake of getting rid of the shadows." What most people mean when they lay accusing emphasis upon the facts of suffering, is that they think God ought to have created them capable of experiencing agreeable sensations only, which is absurd, because essentially impossible, and had it been, per impossibile, granted, would have meant the most unbearable monotony and satiety. Let it be clearly understood that the only possible alternatives are complete insensibility and susceptibility to every kind of sensation; and "Nunquam's" indignant question as to why God permitted pain, will be seen to rest, as we said, upon a simple misunderstanding. I need not, perhaps, add that what is true of sensations is true of emotions as well; that a capacity for joy implied a capacity for grief, a capacity for elation one for dejection, and so through the whole register. And apart from these genuine impossibilities for which "Nunquam" seems to ask, it is of course a mere commonplace of experience that pain is by no means always, and under all circumstances, an evil. In a very large proportion of cases it is simply a warning, an intimation that a law has been broken, a danger signal flashed along the nerve to the brain—"This way no thoroughfare." Pain is God's great educational method, telling us what things not to do, or how not to do them: it is in this sense a token of Divine love rather than of indifference, and even "Nunquam" will probably admit that as a punishment for wrong-doing, as a factor in man's education, discipline, and consequent progress, it constitutes no argument against the Creator's Fatherly affection, since an earthly parent's affection has so frequently to be shown in similar modes. Let us further remember that another enormous proportion of the pain and suffering of the world is curable, is inflicted by men upon each other through selfishness, ignorance, or the deliberate choice of evil instead of good; and that just by the misery resulting from these things we are learning, however slowly, to do better, and to emerge from our ignorance and wickedness to the level of a true humanity.

Next to the negative value of suffering, physical and mental, in correcting bad tendencies, we must briefly advert to its positive value in creating good ones. Merited affliction may, and frequently does, prove an invaluable agency in the eradication of evil: suffering unmerited—hardship, sorrow, sickness—has again and again acted as the most potent intellectual, moral, and spiritual stimulus. When Dumas asked Reboul, "What made you a poet?" the answer was, "Suffering." Darwin attributed to his indifferent health the amount of work he had been able to accomplish. "We will not complain," said Carlyle, "of Dante's miseries; had all gone right with him, Florence would have had another prosperous lord mayor but the world would have lost the 'Divina Commedia.'" Another poet, of our own age and tongue, suffers a stunning and terrible bereavement, and the result is "In Memoriam." Parallel instances in the lives of private individuals must be innumerable.

To sorrow as the teacher of pity and gentleness, sorrow the leveller and reconciler, I can here merely allude; we cannot look without or within but to confess that even as Christ himself, so we, his brethren, are made "perfect through suffering," and could not be so perfected in any other way. Altogether the thinker who reasons from suffering against the love of God makes a double mistake, due mainly perhaps to the fact that he so frequently envisages the phenomena in question from without, and delivers his judgment upon them a priori. While he, the observer, is moved by what he observes of pain and wrong to deny the goodness of God, it is worth noticing that those who as workers and helpers move constantly amidst the saddest scenes, neither despair nor deny, but with a stout heart and cheerful faith "give themselves to their ministering." And however much we might be apt to assume that unmerited pain must make the bearer resent the seeming injustice of God, the evidence simply points the other way. Explain it as you will, it is the fact that "nothing exercises so extraordinary an influence in making men love God as the suffering of great pain at his hands. : : : The fact as it is, is that goodness is evolved from pain more richly than from any other source. This is what Dr. Martineau says: 'The truest piety is to be learned only in the school of suffering; and, strange to say, its usual characteristic is in a certain brightness and restfulness of spirit. : : : It is the observer that whimpers, while the victim sings: 'Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him.'" ("God and the Soul," p. 162.)

Yet while, as we have seen, liability to pain and suffering of every kind could not, by omnipotence itself, have been spared to finite and sentient beings—while they may, and do often prove beneficent agents of the Divine Love—no one pretends that there is not a vast mass of misery which no explanation the human mind can devise, touches at all. We have seen why it cannot be otherwise. Every heart vibrates to one particular note more readily than to others: but most of us, when we think of tiny children in want, and worse than want, little ones cradled in squalor and vice and drink, will feel that the mystery is very dark. In the presence of such inexplicable, undeserved, and seemingly purposeless suffering, we shall not at any rate be wholly without sympathy for those to whom these terrible facts blot out the vision of Divine goodness, however much we may deem them mistaken; but we shall rightly remember that the world's greatest and saintliest, as sensitive and compassionate and gifted with deeper insight than ourselves, have seen all that we see of the world's woe, and yet triumphantly declared their unshaken faith in a loving God. And I shall not, perhaps, be misunderstood when I illustrate what seems to me the wisest attitude to adopt, by recalling the story of Socrates, who, with exquisite modesty, said of the philosophy of Parmenides, that he admired it so far as he had understood it, and felt sure that had he understood all, he would have admired all.

But behind all questions of physical evil—of which we have, if not exclusively, yet predominantly spoken in this article—stands the problem of moral evil, of what religion calls "sin." "Nunquam" denies that man can sin against God; he declares that man has no more freedom than a machine, and ascribes the whole responsibility for man's wrong-doing to his Maker. To the examination of this plea we shall turn next week.

LITERATURE.

DR. DRUMMOND ON THE FOURTH GOSPEL.*

I.—THE CHARACTER OF THE GOSPEL.

IT is one of the many difficulties which beset the imperfectly intelligent life, that men, and women too, are often under the necessity of arriving at a conclusion, and acting upon it, although fully aware that they are not capable of ascertaining or appreciating the evidence which can be adduced, whether for or against it. "Eh, but you should have heard the other side, James," said a venerable friend of mine on the bench to a brother magistrate, who, having arrived late, and heard only the defendant's statement of the case, expressed himself fully satisfied that the charge was unfounded. The caution is so obvious, that it would seem almost foolish were it not that it is the common tendency of us all to decide on the hearing of one side, and that generally stated with avowed partiality.

But what can the simple or the busy man do? Whether it is Tariff Reform or the Fourth Gospel which is brought forward, how very few can pretend to master the controversy? And yet every citizen and every Christian is under the obligation to have a definite opinion on these subjects, and his sentiments, if not his acts, will be determined by that opinion.

For the ordinary man or woman, the only issue is—to rely upon certain broad facts, more or less undisputed, the bearing of which an intelligent person is able to determine for himself: and to confirm his own modest decision by the authority of competent judges; for competence in a judge these two things being chiefly requisite, that he should be complete master of all the facts and arguments in the case, and that he should be as free as is possible to human nature from prejudice or partiality.

Hence the obligation which we—i.e., not theological students only, but all interested in Christianity, whether as an historical phenomenon or a living religion—are under to Dr. Drummond for this admirable work: a work full worthy of the place which it will take in that shelf of books which the great world owes to the little Dissenting academy which, with its few students, is now established at Oxford, maintaining the high tradition of a theological school where freedom is accorded to learner and to teacher alike.

Dr. Drummond has made bold "to indicate the weak points in the arguments of revered teachers"; and his example encourages me to criticise one of whom it would be more becoming of me, if only so it could be, to learn as a disciple. And first I note that, while possessed of the most complete knowledge of the case, and of all the arguments on either side, he does not pretend to be free from at least "an unconscious bias," a bias which inspires the eloquent remarks with which he introduces his subject. It is with a mind overawed by "the sublimity of its thought, the width and spirituality of its conception of religion, the depth of its moral insight, and the tragic pathos of its story," and "with a desire to penetrate its inmost meaning and become more thoroughly imbued with its kindling power," that he enters upon the critic's task. And he undertakes the investigation of the authenticity and truthfulness of a book of which his spiritual experience is that "with its tender and unearthly beauty, with its rapt vision of the life in God, and its promise of a comforter to abide with us for ever, it invites us to rest in peace and lose ourselves in dreams of blessedness and love" (p. 2). Now, while it is altogether to the credit of a judge, who is called upon to decide in the case of one whom he reveres and loves, that he listens patiently and attentively to witnesses and counsel, and tries his best to sum up with absolute impartiality, at the same time it is not humanly possible but that his judgment should be influenced by his avowed estimate of the character of the person concerned. And one cannot but ask—suppose Dr. Drummond had not been a man of so Johannine a spiritual nature (if I may be allowed the expression); if his affinities were rather with the literal Mark or the argumentative Paul or the visionary seer of the Apocalypse, would he, with the evidence before him, have decided as he has done?

And yet it must be admitted that the character of the Gospel is itself evidence, and that of the highest kind. If I could agree to the first two pages of this examination, I should be inclined, so far as I was personally concerned, to close the inquiry. If the Gospel is indeed to all devout readers such a Mount of Transfiguration as that on which the three favoured disciples saw their lord in glory and "became sore afraid," then all argument about it is incongruous. The fact is there, the glory not of earth. The book bears witness to itself, and it can only be for the sake of those who have not the eyes to see that the defence of it is undertaken.

But I am compelled for truth's sake to ask the rude, unfeeling question—is this estimate of the Gospel really justified? Indisputably true that it has "moulded the faith and touched the heart and calmed the sorrows of generations of men," and that on this account alone it deserves to be treated with respect. But as much, and much more, may be said for the Book of Psalms, to which as a whole we could accord no such extravagant praise; nay, we must needs, if called on by inopportune laudation, severely criticise it, as in many portions falling below the standard of even an ordinary Christianity. The high place which the Psalms have obtained in the estimation of Jew and Christian is due, partly to the prevailing belief in their divine origin; partly to sacred associations which each generation adds to the volume of; principally to certain portions, more or fewer, of really high excellence and force of spiritual appeal.

And such is, I believe, the case of this Gospel, this Psalm-book, this book of devotion, of the New Testament. We read it with other eyes than Justin Martyr did —for surely this much must be admitted, that even if he did accept it as among "The Memoirs of the Apostles," he did not attach to it the high value as an authority for the life and teaching of Jesus which it subsequently attained. To us, even to those of us who do not admit what is commonly called the Inspiration of Scripture, it has always been known as a sacred book. Eighteen hundred years of devoutest reading hallow its pages with the glow of human aspiration, hope, and love; while the touching and solemn beauty of certain passages, enhanced as it is by our familiarity with them from childhood, diffuses itself as a glory and fragrance over the whole book, and leads astray the pious judgment to pronounce of it as if all or even the greater part were on the high level of what is best in it.

But if we try to divest ourselves of this presumption in favour of the Gospel in which we have grown up, can it be denied that, stripped of the adventitious merit which cloaks every blot, and smooths over all the rough places, defects and inconsistencies become at once apparent. When I read the Gospel, bearing in mind Dr. Drummond's warm tribute of admiration and of love, I find that I can assent here and there, but for the most part there seems to me—it may be through a defect of spiritual insight—no warrant in the text for this high commendation. On the contrary, I am not unfrequently puzzled, distressed, or revolted, and find a relief in the assurance that I am not reading an authoritative or trustworthy record of the Master's deeds and sayings. The story of the wedding feast at Cana would be thought an unedifying one if it were related of the Buddha. Of the conversation with Nicodemus, Dr. Priestley, who believed the Gospel to be "the dying testimony" of the aged Apostle, remarks that "it has more difficulties in it than any other part of the Gospel history," and the same shrewd observer writes:—"There is great obscurity in all the discourses of Jesus related by John, being probably very imperfectly recollected." But this undeniable obscurity is not confined to the longer discourses or conversations, but is even more apparent in many of the single utterances which Dr. Drummond thinks might well be included among the "brief and concise sayings" which Justin speaks of as distinguishing the teaching of Jesus from that of the Sophists. What, to give but a single instance, can we make of the declaration to Nathaniel, as yet "a babe in Christ," immediately on his confession of belief, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, ye shall see the heavens opened and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man?" The story of the woman of Samaria is admirable in its dramatic truthfulness; but if the sublime intuition, "God is spirit," which proclaims the passing away of the old order and the advent of a new and higher worship, if this awakens our delight and awe, how are we immediately brought down to the level of the most commonplace Jewish prejudices by the unkindly reproof, "Ye worship that which ye know not: we worship that which we know: for salvation is of the Jews"; a reproof which would seem better placed in the mouth of a bigoted Pharisee. Or what, again, would an unprejudiced reader of the sixth chapter say of the discourse in which the Master is represented as insisting that his flesh is "real meat," and his blood "real drink," till "many of his disciples" are driven away by so hard and unwelcome a doctrine? Or would such a reader find in the discourse recorded in the eighth chapter, "to those who had believed in him, who were Jews," i.e., who did not at once renounce their ancestral faith in Moses, any likeness to the good teacher of the other gospels who appropriates to himself the prophet's words, "A bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking wick shall he not quench"? Could we bear, if we were not so long used to it, to be told that he who taught the ignorant crowds of Galilee about their Father in heaven, cast at those who imperfectly believed in him, the bitter taunt: "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father it is your will to do"? Or what can we find of Christ-like or to be admired in the unintelligible saying which follows: "He was a murderer from the beginning : : : : he is a liar, and his father"? And even in the great discourse which is, as it were, the Holy Place of the Gospel, do we not come upon sentences which are merely puzzling or positively painful? "In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so I would have told you." The words are very simple, but I have never been able to discover a reasonable explanation of the second clause. "I pray for them, I pray not for the world." Can we reconcile our better selves, Christ-taught, to the exclusion of mankind from the last prayer of "the Son of Man"?

These are but a few out of many instances which might be adduced in the like kind. They do not diminish at all from whatever literary or spiritual excellence the Gospel may otherwise possess; but if allowed—and I do not see how it is possible" to escape them—they do show that this excellence is not uniform nor "unearthly," and they warrant us in approaching the question of authorship and veracity without that partiality which reverence and admiration imposes even upon the most enlightened critics.

So far I have only touched upon the two introductory pages of Dr. Drummond's learned treatise, but they contain great matter in small space, and are of all the more importance that the author apparently assumes that he will have the consent of all his readers in the attitude which he assumes towards the Gospel he is about to judge. I have declared my own dissent, though I am bound to do so with the fullest deference for the many deservedly revered scholars, my teachers and my superiors, from whom I am forced to differ. ROMAN HAYLING.*

This learned little work is an account of excavations made by Dr. Ely in Hayling Island, and a consideration of the results attained. With regard to the antiquarian learning of the book, it will be sufficient to say that it was accepted by the Examiners for the degree of Doctor of Literature (London) last November. Doctor Talfourd Ely's many friends will rejoice at the well-deserved honour which he has obtained, as a result of six summer holidays spent in digging at Hayling Island. We must leave all antiquarian discussion on this book to specialists. It has been praised, and, we are confident, will continue to be praised, most by those who are especially competent to pronounce upon its value.

For ourselves, we are attracted by the human interest of the book, and by the light it throws upon that great yearly recurring question, how shall I spend my holidays? Holidays are so few; the middle-aged man has at most only twenty or thirty left. They offer a priceless opportunity once a year, not merely of renewing our health, but of getting completely out of our ruts. We can learn things then that there is no time for learning at our work. We can do things for which we have neither spirit nor opportunity at any other time. During those weeks when there is nothing in particular which we are bound to do, when the constraint of circumstances is at any rate very much reduced, we can come into a relation with men or with nature, which is almost impossible amidst the drudgery of daily life. We can indulge the tastes which lie half-dormant in us for the rest of the year; we can be in our small way artists, athletes, discoverers, barbarians, although the world sees nothing of these qualities in us during the eleven months of black-coated respectability, and even we, as we hurry in top-hats to committees through November fogs, are inclined to doubt if we can ever be barbarians again.

To get back to the primitive is what we all more and more long for in our holidays. To live in wild islands, to sail boats or climb mountains, to photograph shy birds and animals in their haunts, to escape modern life, and forget that there is such a thing as starch, either in collars or society, that is surely what every healthy-minded man wants, at least for one month in the year. Dr. Ely has made a new suggestion. He has spent his last six summers excavating Roman remains with his own spade in Hayling Island.

My next vacation [he says, with a touch of sadness] will perhaps be spent elsewhere: and in any case, it may be well at sixty-six years of age to leave spade and pick-axe to younger men. More than one of the neighbouring gentry who visited my excavations, offered to supply me with a staff of labourers, a generous proposal which, while recognising the kindly feeling that prompted it, I declined, on the ground that I preferred doing all the work myself. I shall ever look back with pleasure on long summer days spent amidst the quiet fields, while in front was spread a splendid panorama of the Downs, from Goodwood to Portsdown Hill, bathed in sunlight, or dappled with the passing shadows of the fleecy clouds. The few rustics who approached spoke of my seeking "a crock of gold": the treasure really sought, and gained, was health, strength of body, and the pleasures of the mind.

It is not every one of us who will be so fortunate as Dr. Ely, in obtaining from the owner of the property permission to dig at large, but we might try more often than we do. There are interesting mounds of uncertain date and nature in most localities.

Digging, especially when it is digging up something mysterious, is essentially primitive. It must be far more fascinating than preparing a bed for cabbages. It is gardening with a spice of adventurousness and discovery about it, and with all the small anxieties from slugs and snails left out. We are not likely to obtain permission to keep all we find as Dr. Ely did, and we are not in the least likely to obtain the degree of Doctor of Literature in the London University as a result of our digging.

But even leaving out these adventitious rewards, the mere excavation of buried ruins in wild places is a new and fascinating holiday employment.

We thank Dr. Ely for the suggestion, and we congratulate him most heartily on the high and well-deserved honour which has been given him by his University.

MISS JANET PENROSE WARD has done a great service to English students of the New Testament, who do not read German, by her admirable translation of Jülicher's "Introduction," just published by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. Mrs. Humphry Ward contributes a Prefatory Note to the book thus made accessible to an English public by her daughter's work. Of Dr. Jülicher Mrs. Ward says that he is further from Tübingen than Holtzmann:—

His treatment is "richer in historical points of view"; his tone more natural and varied; while "behind the documents he looks to the men and their relations, takes into account the influence of changing moods and circumstances upon a writer," and relies but sparingly on those fine-drawn arguments based wholly on the detail of vocabulary, or what may be called the psychology of style, which the critic of to-day will only use when he must. His account of the "literature" of the subject is much less full than that of Dr. Holtzmann, but he gains thereby greatly in interest and vivacity for the general reader, while for the student the two books complete each other.

Mrs. Ward earnestly commends Dr. Jülicher's book to those who feel that on the critical and literary questions, with which it deals, our future Christianity really depends, and she concludes:—

For many minds in England, the mere careful study of Dr. Jülicher's chapters on the Gospels, or on the history of the Canon, would be a liberal education. Pain might enter into it; but it would be the pain of growth. Loss might attend it, but beyond the loss, beyond the onset and the struggle of a fast advancing knewledge, there lies a new kingdom of the spirit. The true knowledge of Christ is in no peril: ducit opes animumque ferro.

We hope soon to return to this work in a fuller notice.

IN our search after God and contemplation of Him our wisdom doth consist; in our worship of God, and obedience to Him, our religion doth consist; in both of them our happiness. B. Whichcote.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE TALENTS (ST. MATT. XXV. 14-30).

A TALENT is a Jewish weight of silver worth about £400. So you can reckon how much the man entrusted to his bond-servants. It was enough for each to do really a great deal of business, and the only one with whom the master was disappointed was the idle, self-excusing servant, who did nothing with his £400 but hide it in the ground.

You remember in the story of the bridesmaids Jesus showed the importance of making ourselves fit to do God's will. He now teaches that we should try to gain this fitness, because we are responsible to God. Responsibility means something for which we have to answer. The captain of a cricket team feels responsibility. He has to answer for the trust laid on him by the eleven, in playing his best and using the players to the best advantage in order to win the match honourably or not lose ashamedly. Each player has his special responsibility to all for the success of his side. We are answerable to God for the trust of life and all our possessions. At first we answer through our parents and those set in authority over us, and then as we grow older we begin to hear His voice of conscience, and our responsibility becomes more and more straight from God, and grows in weight and variety.

Money is a responsibility. There are few who do not very early in life have half-pennies and pennies, and learn some of the things you can buy with them. The parable teaches that money, whatever its amount, is entrusted us to use, not hoard. One way of using money is lending for "interest." If you put your pocket-money in your money-box, and then your mother borrows, leaving in the box a coin as payment for the loan, and if you want to spend your savings, she puts them back along with the extra coin, she is returning them with "interest." She is your "banker.." When I was a child mother always gave us extra money when we had put by 10s. Then we might spend on something worth buying. But some of the half-sovereigns went into the Post Office Savings Bank, which gives you sixpence every year for every £1. Now-a-days boys and girls can save pennies by sticking penny stamps on a Post Office paper. When there are twelve stamps on your sheet you give it to the Post Office Savings Bank. Some day when you need the money badly you can get some out with interest added to it, instead of having wasted it, or let it lie idle like that of the unprofitable servant.

Another way of using money is of course spending. The choice between right and wrong, more or less healthy or harmful, comes to us even as tiny children with the first pennies we lay out. Shall I buy sweets, or a penny Book for the Bairns, to paint its pictures? A catapult, or a penn'orth of marbles? A bun for myself, or a penny bunch of violets for mother? Then, lately, boys have got a habit of smoking their pence away. That is very wrong, and very silly too, for it stunts the growth both of body and mind in their growing-up time. One day, when climbing Snowdon, I met two small lads who had just bought a packet of cheap cigarettes. The friend with whom I was walking did not pass the children till he had pocketed the cigarettes (which were soon thrown down a precipice), and bought the youngsters some jolly, rosy apples at an old woman's stall. Fancy wanting to poison breaths of glorious mountain air! It was worse than throwing money away or burying it. A child who cannot resist going into a sweet or cigarette shop, may not be able, when older, to resist going into a drinking-place, and wasting money and health on drink.

It is difficult sometimes to know how much money to spend on ourselves, and how much for other people. It is also hard when there is no choice but to spend on bare necessaries for ourselves, like a poor boy I knew, who had saved some shillings by Christmas, and had decided that, as his father could not buy them for him, he must buy himself some boots. Few like to miss giving Christmas presents to other people. It needs courage "to be just before you are generous," as as the saying is, but fortunately the best kindnesses do not cost money.

If you have enough to lay out on gifts, do you realise, children, what a privilege and responsibility it is, and think carefully how to do the most good? This is how two sisters spent their savings last December. One day one of them said to a friend, "Oh, I wish I had £100. I'd give most to the poor Macedonians, and the rest to some hospital. It would be lovely to give away so much." Her friend agreed that it would be lovely, but also that it was rather silly to worry over impossible ways of keeping Christmas unselfishly. The little girl's heart was full of doing something Christmasy, and soon she made such a delightful plan that her family joined in it with enthusiasm. Within a week there was the merriest of parties for a number of cottage children. It was the only Christmas treat these boys and girls had, and they will talk of it long after the gifts off the lovely surprise Christmas tree are broken. Who gave the presents? Why, the little girls with their saved-up pocket-money. Then a great deal of home art and industry was given to making presents for the relations, on whom their money was usually spent. In God's sight their savings were more than doubled in the using, for He knows all the loving thoughtfulness which contrived for so many people just the right sort of happiness for each of them.

Yes, if you are "faithful over a few things" in the use of pocket-money, you will be fit to be "set over many things," should the day come for serving God with larger possessions. With God, honest earning, wise saving, and right spending are just as important in the matter of small coins as in the bigger money dealings of grown-up people or nations. There never was a time when there was so much haste to make money, no matter how, and hardly a time when there was so much use of it for selfish, unnecessary, or unlasting purposes. Whether we are trusted with five or two talents, or only one, we should all remember that we have to answer to God for our trust, and that He judges of our faithfulness in our trust of money, according as it has helped us in the trust of life. LONDON, MARCH 5, 1904.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY'S CENTENARY.

WE have been growing accustomed in recent years to a remarkable kind of jargon, the dialect, largely, of what is called "megalomania." Some people are said to think in continents, and some are said to think in millions, and all have been recommended to think Imperially. We have no doubt, therefore, that we should be readily pardoned if in this jargonic dialect we were to describe the work of the British and Foreign Bible Society as a process of thinking in worlds or cosmopolitanly. Of old, however, a great apostle advised men simply to think soberly, and we feel sure that the magnificent results to which the Society can point, after a hundred years, are the outcome of simple sobriety of thought and thoughtfulness. For, although, as we contemplate the work of the Bible Society, we not only feel "the thrill of pride," and even the "something of astonishment," that Mr. Balfour spoke of just a year ago, at the inaugural Centenary Meetings held at the Mansion House, yet, as we remember the description of that work by Dr. GORE, the Bishop of Worcester, as "both scientific and generous," we feel that the striking achievement of the Bible Society is largely owing to their attribute of thinking soberly and according to the measure of faith GOD has dealt to them. The achievement of the Bible Society illustrates a statement made by MICHEL NICHOLAS, "C'est un fait aujourd'hui incontesté," he says, "que toutes les grandes idées qui ont contribué à l'éducation de l'humanité ont été, en un certain sens, le produit d'un travail impersonnel, et qu'elles ont été longuement élaborées dans l'ombre et le silence, jusqu'au moment où, atteignant leur perfection, elles ont éclaté au grand jour de de l'histoire." The effect of this impersonal, unaffected, and silent work is now at length being seen universally to be of a truly remarkable nature. And though the remainder of the Society's journey, yet to be achieved, is long and arduous, it seems in some respects a small proportion of the vast stretch already accomplished.

In preparation towards an attempt at completing their truly vast and magnanimous object, the Society began with the new century to take certain preliminary steps, and two years ago began to issue pamphlets at regular intervals in order to supply not merely "a stream of facts," but a veritable flood of facts, figures, and narrations of the work carried on throughout the world, amongst that strange ethnological spectrum of white men and black men, yellow men, red men, and brown men. And if there is any ignorance about the Society's principles, past work and future objects, it cannot be attributed to any inactivity of the Society, nor to any lack of systematic preparation and lavish generosity. All booklets, pamphlets, leaflets, and much other literature have been poured out gratis. It may be doubted whether any other centenary has ever been so carefully and laboriously prepared for, or the counsel of CICERO taken so closely to heart, "In omnibus autem negotiis, priusquam adgrediare, adhibenda est præparatio diligens."

The object of all this effort and of the hopes centred in the universal appeal on Bible Sunday, March 6, is for a greatly increased financial aid. And we feel certain that when a knowledge of the attempt and of the achievement of the British and Foreign Bible Society becomes widely attained, there will be a sense of unfeigned wonder and admiration at the result during one century. And there is little doubt that if "the people of the Book" realise the nature of the past efforts of the Society, there will be a very perceptible and gratifying augmentation of the income of the Society. The Society aspires to raise 250,000 guineas, that more translations may be completed, more colporteurs be added, and more Bible women be employed for the ever increasing work. The Society began by thinking in hundreds, not despising in the raising of even those modest hundreds of its early years, contributions that came in in "Rivulets" and "Drops" and "Crumbs," and "Twigs" and "Blossoms." "Bible Bees" deposited their drops of honey, and "Bible Trees" dropped their fruit in support of the verification of another law of gravitation. When the Society reached its jubilee in 1854, it had learnt to think in thousands, and now, after a hundred years, it dares boldly to think in quarters of millions, having spent many millions of money and reached many more millions of men and women by means of some 180,000,000 of copies of the Scriptures in whole or part. And they preface their plea in the words of one writer (and great has been the company of those that published the news) in a truly persuasive way—if only "the people of the Book" were as logical and sensible as they are sometimes thought to be—"If everyone who possesses a Bible of his own would show his gratitude by some personal gift, this sum could be raised many times over. A quarter of a million guineas! The South African War cost as much as that each day it lasted. The people of the United Kingdom spend twelve times as much every week in strong drink. The smokers of the United Kingdom burn three times as much every fortnight in tobacco. Who can believe that such a sum will be refused by the Christians of this country to the greatest society which they combine to support?"

The Society has the greatest faith in its cause, and never could a more felicitous motto for their appeal have been chosen than the words from Ezekiel xlvii. 9, "Everything shall live whither the river cometh." The Society claims, and surely with some justice, that if the Reformation made our fathers "the people of the Book," the Bible Society, during the last hundred years has made the Bible "the Book of the people," and that in a sense wider than even its founders dreamed of. It is a great national institution, but its benefits are international, and are extended equally to all human beings without distinction or limitation of any kind. "But if the retrospect has its triumphs," urges the Appeal, "the prospect has opportunities of even greater things than these. There are still 450,000,000 people into whose tongues no word of the Bible has ever been translated. And even in the case of nations for which versions have been prepared, only a fraction of the people have yet been supplied with copies." The Society does not mean therefore to rest, as Sir THOMAS BROWNE would say, in an ovation but a triumph of its praises.

With what nobler augury could any enterprise have been undertaken than the determination of the young Society to take as its motto the words: "Let us be the first institution that ever emanated from one of the nations of Europe for the express purpose of doing good to all the rest." The theme of which this was the happy motto was, "The Excellence of the Holy Scriptures. An argument for their more general dispersion at home and abroad." It exists, we are reminded, again and again, for one specific object, to translate the Bible into various languages, probably into all, if that is possible, and to circulate them "without note or comment." As one opens the little map of the world, on MERCATOR'S projection supplied at the end of one of the most interesting of the Society's publications, in which specimens of the 370 languages (now 400) are given, into which the Bible in whole or parts has been rendered, one is amazed as one reflects on the meaning of those blue figures so thickly dotted about, representing the various languages and dialects, and one tries to realise the climes, the peoples, the customs, the accessible or almost inaccessible places, the work of the 850 colporteurs, natives for the most part, and 650 native Bible women, week in week out, year after year; one tries to grasp the patient labours of the several hundred Translators, Revisers and Assistants organised in many committees who have charge of a world-wide task. Fifty different sets of characters are required to print the languages so far acquired.

One has often heard the phrase in the mouth of the wise and prudent about a given time not being the proper time to do this thing or to do that thing. One is forcibly reminded of that phrase on recalling the time when the Bible Society made its first appeal to the public. Was there ever a less propitious time chosen for the launching of such an enterprise? "What a moment," exclaims Mr. WILLIAM CANTON, that graceful poet, to whom the writing of the history of the Bible Society has been intrusted:

> What a moment it was to appeal to the country to assist in founding "the first institution that ever emanated from one nation, for the good of all." The French Army of Invasion was massed along the coast from the Texel to the Seine; England was a vast camp, with 520,000 men under arms; beacons awaited the torch on hill-top and church-tower; carriages stood ready for flight; troops lay down to sleep with their marching orders. Anxious and menaceful, NAPOLEON watched for his "six hours' mastery of the Channel"; calm and prayerful, Mr. HUGHES and his friends proceeded with their deliberations. On March 7, 1804, the British and Foreign Bible Society was established. Through the rest of that year, through ten months of the next, NAPOLEON watched; then his legions streamed away across the Rhine; but from that date onward the Bible Society became one of the instruments with which the Almighty was shaping his destiny."

We are reminded by another writer how unlike was the England of 1804 to the England of 1904. The country had less than half as many inhabitants, and probably not one person in three could read and write. Those were the days of bread-riots and smugglers and footpads, when members of Parliament fought duels with flint-lock pistols and fashionable ladies paid calls in sedan-chairs. Bristol and Liverpool still fattened on the profits of the slave trade. NELSON'S three-deckers were manned by the help of the press-gang. English law recognised no fewer than 223 different capital offences, criminals still stood in the pillory at Charing Cross. These things will recall a thousand others in which the England of 100 years ago was different from the England we know, and any passing shade of pessimism that may darken our hearts as we think of the wave of reaction that has troubled some of us in recent years, may well be quickly dispelled on the slightest comparison of these days with the "good old times" beloved of those who probably would hate them most if they were compelled to endure them.

Space does not permit to dwell on interesting points raised by Mr. BALFOUR in his address a year ago, which touched such questions as the contact of the Bible Society with other "great religions" "cultivated priesthoods," and "systems of metaphysics." His judgment as to the effect of the Higher Criticism upon the destiny of the Bible seems to us valuable to record. He said:—

> The Bible is now, what it has always been to the unlearned, a source of consolation, of hope, of instruction, but it is to the learned—but not probably nearer the Kingdom of Heaven—it is to them augmented in interest and not diminished, a more valuable source of spiritual life now, than it could ever have been in the pre-critical days.

The Bible Society seems to be acting on the sentiment in Landor's "Gebir"—

> For the brave,
> When they no longer doubt, no longer fear.

And doubtless with regard to possible dangers from contact with immemorial Sacred Books of other races, or from the search-light of the Higher Criticism, they would say, with EPICTETUS, that "men are disturbed not by things themselves, but by their opinions or thoughts concerning those things." The Bible itself has nothing to fear.

SAVED AS BY FIRE.

WE called attention in a brief note the other day to the series of lectures delivered under Wesleyan auspices in the Central Hall, Manchester, and afterwards published in cheap form. Many must have read the utterance of Archdeacon Wilson, in this series, with as much astonishment as pleasure. It is a frank abandonment of the old theories of plenary inspiration, and a plea for the Bible on its merits as one of the means by which God makes known His will to us.

No less moderate and rational in tone is Dr. Adeney's treatment of the question, "Can the Gospel History be Trusted?" There is no belabouring of the doubter with hard names. No accusing him of believing some monstrous fallacy, as that a few uneducated fishermen invented a scheme so clever that it deceived the shrewdest critics and the keenest inquirers. There are no big words and bravely inappropriate statements. The questioner is taken back step by step to the earliest manuscripts of the Gospel story, the earliest commentators, the earliest Christian apologists, the earliest witnesses for the four Gospels, the earliest gatherers of Apostolic traditions, and so forth. Needless to say that this leading back to the credibilities of the Gospel story leads back at the very same time to the gaps that give rise to doubt, to the statements that challenge incredulity, to the contradictions that leave the questioner perplexed. In this connection Dr. Adeney's presentation of the case is hardly complete.

> In order to be assured that any history is trustworthy I think we want to know two things about it; we want to know whether the writers were well informed, and we want to know whether they were honest.

The words "well informed" hardly express all that is required on the intellectual side. We want further to know, were they competent to judge and to classify their information? Or were they liable to see signs and wonders where men with wider culture would have seen nothing miraculous or greatly marvellous? Such a question is of first importance in dealing with certain of the Gospel traditions. Yet, without going further than Dr. Adeney has gone, one sees already on the one hand what a great historical reality must underlie the traditions and documents of early Christianity, but also in how many different fashions this great reality may be interpreted, and how absurd it is for those who are interested in the unveiling of the same truth to use the names bigot and unbeliever, or to think and speak in the styles that those names suggest.

Those who compare the essays of Archdeacon Wilson and Dr. Adeney with the evangelical doctrines that our forefathers only a generaton or so ago had to combat will be astonished, not at the claims which evangelical teachers make, but at the claims that are evidently being silently dropped as untenable. One is reminded of a curious saying of the great Apostle: "If any man's work shall be burned he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved; yet so as through fire."

The fire of criticism has destroyed much of the old evangelical teaching. Adam is no more. The fall of man, the wrath and curse of God due to us through original sin; the removal of that curse by the obedience of the second Adam, and by the vicarious efficacy of his death; not only are these practically given over, there is no possible way to restore them. As soon as the story in Genesis becomes merely a significant and beautiful story, and St. Paul's comments thereon the comments of a great man, and not the inspired words of the Holy Ghost, the very materials by which the old doctrines can be built up are lacking.

It is well that they are. It is well that in seeking to turn men from the error of their thoughts and their ways, our wisest teachers seek, with Archdeacon Wilson, to explain the Bible to them only as one way of learning God's will; and with Dr. Adeney to lead them back to the simple stories of the four Gospels, which are not without difficulties and causes of misgiving external and internal, but are still in their own way credible, lovable, life-giving, true. "See," says Dr. Adeney, "See Jesus Christ, terrible to the hypocrite, winsome to little children; see him denouncing wrong and pardoning penitents, see him in tender human brotherhood and in awful divine Majesty, this carpenter from Nazareth, this Prophet of Galilee . . . . see if he is not worthy of our homage, and if he will not respond to our trust." It is a worthy, manly appeal. May it reach the hearts as well as direct the thoughts of many of those who hear it.

PRIESTLEY'S RELIGION.*

By the Rev. J. Worsley Austin.

The fact that Priestley, though breathing his whole life long in the atmosphere of eighteenth century scientific and philosophic thought, retained a fundamentally religious outlook on this universe, marks him off at once as an exceptional mind. The eighteenth century had its constructive and idealistic thinkers, but it was above all others an age in which destructive tendencies were rampant. France set the prevailing fashion and tone, and the doctrines of the encyclopædists, Diderot, D'Alembert, La Mettrie, with all their blighting scepticism and cynicism, spread far and wide, and laid the basis of modern materialism. Priestley in consequence found few wholly congenial spirits among the scientific men and philosophers of his time. The savants of Paris told him that he "was the only person they had ever met with of whose understanding they had any opinion, who professed to believe Christianity." And in general he was looked upon as a man with a queer, incomprehensible religious streak in his nature, by those who admired him for his vast learning and intellectual acumen. The remarkable thing about Priestley was that though he did not remain by any means untouched by all this materialistic sentiment and thought, yet his growing knowledge served only to deepen and strengthen his religion. His continued studies only enriched and adorned it. Religion was the interest that lived in all other interests, giving them their meaning and charm. To the end "he prized it above everything else"; to use his own words, "he was ready to sacrifice everything else to it, he made it always his principal object."

The Note of Joy.

Turning now to this "faith" that was "the master-light of all his seeing," different minds seize at once on different characteristics. To my mind, what appears as most impressive and significant is its clear, ringing note of optimism and joy. In Priestley's religion there was no fear, no doubt, no gloom. It was peace and happiness to him, and that in such rich measure that he wanted to convert the world to it. It was this desire more than any other that made him a controversialist. He had attained a faith that was to him of intrinsic worth, and he wished to bring others to share in his joy. In his preface to the "History of the Corruptions of Christianity," he gives the reason for his attacking these corruptions. It is because "they have almost annihilated all the happy effects which Christianity was eminently calculated to produce." And he continues:—

> I would therefore willingly do anything that may be in my power to make the gospel both properly understood, and also completely reformed in order to its more general propagation, and to its producing its proper effects on the hearts and lives of men; and consequently to its more speedily becoming, what it is destined to be, the greatest blessing to all the nations of the world.

These are the words of a man who is conscious of a great blessing in his own life, who wishes to impart it to others, and takes the means that in his view will bring this about.

The happiness that Priestley found in his faith sometimes gave rise to misinterpretation. The orthodoxy of his day was sombre and solemn to the last degree, and the orthodox hardly knew what to make of this light-heartedness that pervaded the man. It was even put down to lack of seriousness. Says the writer of one edifying little treatise published in 1792, "The Christian religion sits so easy upon him, that he can droll and sport with the greatest objects of it in a manner fearful to repeat." The author simply did not understand Priestley. He did not understand, he was not capable of understanding, the brightness and the joy that his faith brought into Priestley's life.

From Darkness into Light.

This characteristic is significant from the fact that Priestley was born into orthodoxy, and worked his way out of it. He knew the effect the old doctrines had on the mind, for he had experienced it himself. And that he looked upon his change as a release, as an escape from darkness into light, from a religion of gloom into a religion of cheer, from anxiety and heaviness and fear into peace and joy, was something that always mystified and upset the calculations of his opponents.

As a boy and as a youth the religion in which he had been nurtured lay heavily upon his soul. He had been brought up to believe, amongst other things, that some sort of conscious conversion was necessary to salvation, and as the months rolled by, bringing no signs of this new birth, he grew to think that God had withdrawn his love from him, and that he must be numbered with the lost. He seems to have long carried this awful conviction about in his heart. But as he awoke to the larger thought of God, this cloud lifted, and the contrast between his earlier and later condition is nowhere better revealed than in his "Discourse on Habitual Devotion," where he tells of the great peace of mind which comes to all who keep God's law and live a life of righteousness; "the foundation of our joy being the testimony of our consciences that in simplicity and godly sincerity we have had our conversation in the world."

Trust in Reason.

The great change to which this points was really brought about in a very simple way. It came through Priestley's trust in his reason. However much we may agree or disagree with his particular theological position, I presume we of this church to-day all endorse the principle that underlay it. Priestley had grasped the truth of the essential unity of the human mind. That one faculty should affirm what another faculty denied he saw to be impossible. That faith should lead a man one way and reason lead him another he perceived to be an untenable supposition. Why should faith be blind and out of harmony with reason? What was the value of a hope that could give no account of itself? Such could not be true faith and true hope. And so he worked his way towards the new and rational position which, in later years, he expressed in those five words, "Faith is the offspring of reason." Rational theology has outgrown many of the beliefs to which Priestley clung. But rational theology has advanced only because it has been all along true to the principle that Priestley saw and endorsed. Priestley trusted reason completely as a divine faculty. He had no fears that it would prove destructive of the things the human heart held precious. He had no fears for truth. His attitude reminds one of that of Milton expressed in his "Areopagitica," "Let Truth and Falsehood wrestle: who ever knew Truth to be worsted in a free and open encounter!"

Priestley was one who let Truth and Falsehood wrestle, freely, openly, confident of the victory of Truth. The method of inquiry he saw to be indispensable for the acquisition of scientific truth, he saw also to be indispensable for the attainment of worthy religious convictions. To fetter the mind was just as disastrous in the latter case as in the former. Hence, for him, no subject could be by its nature cut off from discussion and inquiry. His intellect ranged freely from the most concrete facts to the most abstract speculations, from physics to theology, and back again to physics, from material elements to the deep things of the spiritual life and of God. He claimed full liberty for himself. He accorded it to others. He demanded access to every realm of thought, and would not be denied.

The Courage of His Faith.

To take up such an attitude required in his day a superlative courage. It requires courage to-day. And the more deeply religious a man is, the greater is the courage demanded. The soul always shrinks from the task of laying bare its holiest faiths and most precious hopes to the cold, searching light of reason. The holier the faith, the more precious the hope, the stronger is the tendency to hold to them uncriticised and unexamined. We may judge from this to what height Priestley's courage rose. For his was a nature essentially and fundamentally devout, to which the verities of religion meant light and life itself.

Priestley showed to his day, and the lesson holds good for our own, that religion has nothing to fear but much to gain from the exercise of reason. It is not a wantonly destructive faculty, but when it destroys it always does so to fulfil; and it is the natural ally of the pieties and sanctities of life.

The writer of the little treatise to which I have referred said, "Dr. Priestley's religion must be described differently from that of other men; all by negatives; for he has taken great pains to show us what is not." And he goes on to complain that Priestley's demand is for discussion, and yet further discussion, all of which is very useless and brings a man nowhere.

His Hold on positive Truth.

But is Priestley's religion to be described merely in negatives? Did this discussion really bring him nowhere? It brought him a profound belief in God,

* From a sermon preached in the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, on Sunday morning, Feb. 7, in connection with the centenary of the death of Dr. Joseph Priestley.

his wisdom and goodness; a deep sense of the reality of human brotherhood; a joyous conviction of human progress, an assurance of life beyond death which nothing could disturb, all of which fostered a happiness and peace of a quality so rich and pure that his worst opponents would probably have envied him had they at all realised it. "The moment," he writes, "that we begin to consider the world not as a fatherless world, but that there is a principle of wisdom and goodness presiding over all, and believe that nothing can come to pass without the knowledge and intention of this infinite goodness and wisdom, our gloom vanishes and daylight bursts upon us."

In discussing the progress of the world in his essay on Government, we find Priestley gazing forward, not into gathering clouds and darkness, but into sunlight that waxes ever clearer and fuller. His language has in it a ring of prophecy; a rare thing with him: "Whatever was the beginning of this world, the end of it will be glorious and paradisaical beyond what our imaginations can conceive; the contemplation of which always makes me happy."

Calm Faith in Immortality.

Living in such a world, conscious of the supreme protecting love ever around and above him, the worst woes of life had for him no terrors, but became part of a divine discipline. Even death had no sting, the grave no victory. I know no expression of calmer, happier confidence in immortality than that which breathes in the latter part of his letter to his old friend Theophilus Lindsey, when dedicating to him his "History of the Corruptions of Christianity." Speaking of his hopes of life to come, he says to Lindsey:—

> Let those views brighten the evening of our lives, that evening which will be enjoyed with more satisfaction in proportion as the day shall have been laboriously and well spent. Let us, then, without reluctance, submit to that temporary rest in the grave, which our wise Creator has thought proper to appoint for all the human race. . . . Anticipating with joy the glorious morning of the resurrection, when we shall meet our Saviour, whose precepts we have obeyed, whose spirit we have breathed, whose religion we have defended, whose cup also we may have in some measure drank of, and whose honours we have asserted, without making them interfere with those of his Father and our Father, of his God and our God, that supreme, that great and awful Being, to whose will he was always most perfectly submissive, and for whose unrivalled prerogative he always showed the most ardent zeal.

Priestley's religion, instead of being a religion of negatives, was in reality the most positive of positive faiths. It was the outcome of liberty and reason, and yet it was thus positive, and to him a faith of such meaning and worth that he was ever ready to do anything for it, to sacrifice everything to it.

Unity of Spirit with him.

I have said that there is much in Priestley's theology that we have outgrown, much that was even vital to him. His conception of Christianity as a revelation uniquely guaranteed, of Christ as a special messenger from God with miraculous credentials, his whole view of Pagan religions and their relationship to Christianity we no longer endorse. We have new views along these and other lines, views founded on information that Priestley did not possess, on considerations with which he was unacquainted. But such differences, instead of alienating us from him, really draw us nearer to him, and emphasise the real unity of spirit that exists between us to-day and the heroic thinker of the eighteenth century. For Priestley would, of course, have been the first to repudiate the suggestion that the theology he expounded was final. He who stood for free inquiry, who pleaded that no obstruction should be thrown in the way of it, who claimed liberty of thought alike for minister and congregation was not so inconsistent as to try to forge fetters himself, or to set the limits of theological development. He knew that coming ages would see fresh acquisitions of truth. And real unity, with a spirit such as his, is to be gained not by blind acquiescence in his various tenets, but by following after truth with the same open mind, the same fearlessness, the same enthusiasm as he ever displayed.

IT is well that the authorities are giving increased attention to the vagrancy problem. It is not merely that bad trade increases the number of vagrants and the present system often converts temporary wanderers into permanent paupers, but also it is now better understood how great is the danger to the community of such a class carrying about with them epidemic diseases and moral infection. The Poor Law Conference, which met last week, and the Council of the Poor Law Unions Association, appointed a joint deputation, which was received by Mr. Walter Long, President of the Local Government Board, at the Guildhall, and urged that there should be further legislation dealing with vagrancy, especially in relation to children. The children who are used by beggars to excite the pity and open the purses of the public, are really the greatest reason for withholding support from the begging class. It is a thoughtless and lazy benevolence which responds to the appeal for pence made by the tramp who drags round children or carries a baby for professional purposes. Those who know little of the subject might with advantage read such a book as "Tramping with Tramps," by Josiah Flynt, to learn what it all means for the children.

The deputation desired legislation which would check the constantly increasing vagrancy of the country, and represented a growing feeling in favour of the establishment of labour colonies, and the desire that a departmental committee should be appointed to examine the whole subject. Mr. Long recognised the importance of the subject, and considered that the matter was connected quite as closely with police, as with poor-law administration. He said that the number of vagrants in the country was about 30,000; but of these only about one-third were pauper-vagrants; hence there was need for careful discrimination. He recognised that the request for an inquiry was one which could not be resisted, and thought that it should be a joint inquiry by the Local Government Board in conjunction with the Home Office and possibly the Prison Commissioners.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION BAZAAR.

SIR,—I wish to assure our London friends of the pleasure with which their support, promised by Mrs. W. Blake Odgers, is anticipated by the Union and its Bazaar Committee. I was able to announce to both—to the one at its annual meeting, to the other at a special meeting—the news which Mrs. Odgers conveyed through your columns last week. It was received with enthusiasm, and has, I have reason to believe, already set the various congregations of the Union to more determined effort. In this district we are still feeling acutely the depression of trade—some congregations have probably passed through the worst part of their trial; others are in the midst of it—but I can testify to a most self-sacrificing endeavour on the part of all to carry forward the bazaar scheme to a creditable issue. The conditions which "hard times" impose are relieved by the generous offices of Mrs. Odgers and those who respond to her appeal on our behalf, who encourage us deeply by the obligation under which they place us. WILLIAM C. HALL.

CHILDREN AND BUTTERFLY CATCHING.

SIR,—With reference to Mr. Charbonnier's remarks on my letter, my point is that any small grains of scientific knowledge gained by children in chasing butterflies is not worth their corresponding loss in reverence for life. Habits of observation could be cultivated equally well without killing the object observed, and, in fact, we know that some of the most important discoveries have been made by naturalists watching living insects at work.

The statement that "the wish to chase the painted butterfly is innate in children, and therefore not wrong in itself," will surprise some, though it must be wearisomely familiar to those who have heard it used as an argument for war and other abominations of modern civilisation. Are we never to emerge from the brute? As some natural impulses spring from the animal part of us, children, savages, and other undeveloped creatures are generally cruel, through sheer lack of imagination; but the instinct to slay is not one which should be encouraged for any real or fancied gain.

Seeing that my sentimental objections are supported by such a man as Ruskin, I do not think they can be regarded as "quite unjustifiable," and I am glad to say that sympathetic comments have reached me on the subject.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE NORTH POLE SHAKEN.

I HAVE been at the North Pole, and have a snap-shot of the man who guards it! He wears the kilt, plays the bagpipes, sings Psalms in Gaelic, and declaims the Shorter Catechism to the gulls. I had a long crack with him, the most of it being a theological argument, during which the pole shook pathetically. He is awfully old and grim, and his hair is a sight to see. It is as red as a Turner sunset, and as towsy as a March mist round the rocky headlands. He tramps regularly many long Scotch miles to the Kirk (the genuine '43 house), and has a portrait of Chalmers on his snuff-box. He makes his own whiskey, and flavours it with the pious peats of the pole-bogs. It gives a peculiar burr to his words, and makes his breath fiery after the seventh drink. He is a weird character, and I was somewhat afraid of him at first, but I got into his graces by giving him some Edinburgh "Sneeshin" with the burning bush on the packet. Then I said "Deuteronomy," and our hands clasped.

My visit to the Northern region was caused by the action of a Cromarty man who guards the Tain Public Library with a Calvinist claymore. When the McQuaker Trustees sent up a parcel of their latest books as a gift, Peter Ross, the doughty champion of the old faith, indignantly banned the present. He flourished his blade three times over it, slapped his sporran, and made for the fire. But on second thoughts he wrote to Mr. Bowie, saying that rather than burn the books he returned them, and forthwith bundled the volumes back.

Of course the rejection so intimated could not be allowed to pass without protest. The library is a public one, and enjoys Mr. Carnegie's generosity to the extent of £1,000.

At Mr. Bowie's request I took the matter in hand, and immediately made the rejection known in the Northern papers and the Scotsman. The exposed rejector threatened me with legal proceedings. My answer was the insertion in five Northern weekly papers and in the Scotsman of an advertisement, offering to send any or all of the books for free reading to those desirous of knowing their contents. No sooner had the offer appeared than requests came pouring in from all quarters.

I have sent out fifty-five parcels of books and pamphlets, most of them to the North. On my list of readers I have ministers, schoolmasters, farmers. professional men, and one agricultural labourer who can read the Bible in Hebrew, Greek and Gaelic. (Manchester College should have an eye to this man.) My correspondents range from Wick to Dumfries. Edinburgh furnished a considerable number, and from Skye I have three.

Meanwhile, several letters on the subject appeared in the Northern papers. An Inverness cleric wrote complimenting the Librarian on his orthodox fidelity in keeping out "the works of the Devil." I followed up the correspondence closely, and it was evident there was a spiritual stir in the snowy North.

Then I determined to look out my furs, and take bearings for the pole. I knew that the temperate theological zone ended at Elgin, and that beyond was the frigid zone, where the Confession of Faith is preserved in ice. Some sympathetic friends warned me that I was in danger of ice-balls, if not of torture among ice-floes, but I was enough of a Northern to face Boreas without fear. I had no Gaelic, but I had the Scottish tongue, and with the revised New Testament in my wallet I set forth.

It was not to be endured that Emerson, Stopford Brooke, John Hamilton Thom, Principal Drummond, and such like, should be refused a place in a public library. No; the heather should burn first and the ice melt! Little did Peter Ross divine what he did when he spat his Celtic wrath on that parcel! The journey was through a cold region. There was snow on the hills several feet deep, but the air was clear and the sun was genial.

My experience in Tain was very cheering. I found the town hotly excited over the rejection of the books. But the rulers were anxious to discount it, and keep down curiosity. They were sorry that an opportunity had been given for an exposition of Unitarian views, and did not wish to appear to countenance my meetings. However, there was a large and representative meeting (180) on the first evening, when I spoke of "The Gospel of Jesus as expressed in his own words." Two women ventured in among the sprinkling of shopkeepers and professional men. The bulk of the audience was formed by the working classes.

I saw by the way they gathered that they were curious, and would give me a quiet hearing. A slight cheer greeted me as I appeared on the platform of the richly decorated hall. My address was attentively listened to, and here and there punctuated with applause. At the close I was questioned for an hour. The queries were of the usual orthodox textual character. It was evident there was a considerable amount of sympathy with my statements, though the general air of the meeting was amazement.

Certainly, never in Tain before had such ideas been heard, and the surprise was manifest. But as the questioning went on many hearers rose to the answers eagerly, and I felt that they received the word with joy. Pamphlets were readily taken, and my stock was soon exhausted.

My second lecture in Tain (Feb. 23), on "The description given by Jesus himself of his relation to God, and his office as Saviour," was listened to by an audience which crowded the floor of the hall (380). I perceived at once that the excitement was high. There were nine women; the rest were men of keen doctrinal temper, and I knew that every word I said would be watched and weighed rigorously. As I spoke there was now and then a murmur of dissent, but also frequent applause. The eager, strained Celtic faces were almost painful to look at, and sometimes I was nearly overcome. But I filled my hour, and at the close a hearty round of applause proved that my words had gone home. Then came the questioning. Ten questioners were ready, Bible in hand, and I had a hot time. With Highland dogedness they kept on for eighty minutes, and it required all my coolness to stand it. Soon it was evident that there was a questioner's party and an answerer's party. The former applauded the queries; the latter cheered my replies. Some of the questions enabled me to make strong statements, and these were caught up, and cheered. I concluded the exhausting proceedings with an expression of hearty thanks for the attention given to my lectures. A parting cheer from the audience concluded (at 10.30) the most remarkable meeting I ever addressed as an advocate of our faith.

I had a chat, during my two days' stay in Tain, with several leading men. They all confessed they were done with Calvinism. In various ways I was made aware of the leavening action of liberalism in theologic thought in the North.

When I got down to Invergordon, and within sight of the "Sisters of Cromarty," I knew I was in Hugh Miller's country, and thought of the wrestling he had to make his geologic discoveries square with his theologic tenets—a struggle which helped to secure the new light there is in the Scottish Church to-day regarding Genesis.

The weather was much against a public meeting. A drizzling rain fell all day, and continued all evening. But forty persons came out, and listened attentively to my lecture. Three or four questioners heckled me in a kindly way. One of them declared that Calvinism was dead in the Northern churches, and that gave me an opportunity for saying that subscription to the Calvinistic standards was still required, and thereby a glaring inconsistency was maintained. The dissolution of Calvinistic belief is a Confession met with everywhere in Scotland, but it is particularly notable found so emphatic in the North.

When in Invergordon I took occasion to sail across to Cromarty, and have a look at Hugh Miller's birthplace. I saw the venerable house, and had a climb over the shoulder of the Southern Sutor. It was sad to see the decay of the town. A large number of the houses are in ruins, and the place seemed almost lifeless. Yet even there I noted a new library in course of erection, the gift of Carnegie. The American dollars are being transformed into literature. By books we are born again.

My second meeting in Invergordon (Feb. 25), was nearly twice as large as the first, and I was assured by an intelligent resident that I had the cream of the intellect of the place there. Certainly they listened attentively, if not sympathetically. At the close questioning was promptly begun, and kept up in a lively way for over an hour. The gentleman who had been the leading questioner both nights proposed a vote of thanks to me. I was about to leave the hall, when a lady met me in the lobby, and said she wished to put some questions to me. I invited her into the hall, and asked the lingerers to follow. There was a rush back. The lady opened fire impetuously, and demanded a direct answer to her question. I saw her excitement, and spoke calmly. The burden of her hysterical utterance was that Unit-arians lowered Jesus. I managed to turn the questioning on her, and asked her what Unitarian writings she had read, &c. She admitted that she had neither read nor heard any Unitarian advocate, but she knew, &c. It was evident she could not be brought to reason, so I yielded her the last word, and ended the encounter. I was informed that she is a farmer's wife, an ardent Evangelical worker, and member of the Free Church. She represented the fanatical feeling of the North, and I am glad I was fortunate in encountering a lively specimen of a species becoming rarer every year. As an offset against her, I had the pleasure of meeting the ploughman I mentioned above, and found in him a sincere student with a rare and marvellous culture obtained by his own solitary study. He informed me that the books I sent had taken him into a new world in which he would probably find the light long sought.

My last lecture for the week was at Dingwall. The day was wet all through, and the rain hindered a meeting. Forty persons gathered in. They listened closely, but only one put any question. Dingwall is the centre of Free-Kirk division, there being seven different sections of Free-Kirkers!

During my tour I circulated over 800 tracts. These, I trust, will act as good seed. I think my visit to the North was well worth the time and money spent upon it. By the protest against the rejection of the books attention was widely and strikingly called to the existence and significance of our denomination. It has been talked about and discussed as it could not otherwise have been, and the names and ideas of our greatest writers have been set in the Northern light. The announcement of my lectures evoked curiosity further, and my appearance was regarded as phenomenal. I feel quite sure that the whole matter has made a deep impression in the North generally. It has enabled me to realise the change in the theological atmosphere of the North. There is virtually a new spiritual climate, in which the old severities cannot live. In that less rigorous air I discern the elements of a Church among the heather, in which are many liberated souls waiting for the triumph of the Religion of Love.

ALEX. WEBSTER.

Aberdeen, March 1, 1904.

To Mr. Webster's vivid narrative it is pleasant to be able to add that the Library Committee at Tain were in no way responsible for the action of their librarian. They first heard of his refusal of the books from the newspaper correspondence on the subject, and promptly repudiated his action. On Jan. 18 the library clerk wrote to Essex Hall to explain that the action of the librarian had been without authority, and the books have since been gratefully accepted for the library. Mr. Webster, however, has gained the opportunity of taking more light to the North, of which he made such admirable use.

IF you only say you have a revelation from God, I must have a revelation from God too, before I can believe you.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

THE annual meeting of this Union was held at Mottram on Saturday, Feb. 20. The annual meetings are held at the various churches in the Union in turn. Not only was it the turn of Mottram to receive the Union, whose last visit was in 1888, but it was felt there would be a special appropriateness in assembling there on account of the recent settlement of the new minister, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, who seems to have been awakening new life and interest in the chapel.

There was a religious service in the afternoon at 3.15 p.m., when the sermon was preached by the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, based upon the text, "The Church of the Living God." It was a true missionary sermon, especially the latter part, the purpose and application of which was well shown by the story of the traveller, who, half-frozen by the cold, gained new life and strength for himself by putting forth all his efforts to revive the almost lifeless form of a fellow-traveller whom he found lying in the snow. True missionary work, like the quality of mercy, "blesses him that gives, as well as him that takes."

Immediately after the service the business meeting took place, the resident minister, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, in the chair. The annual report submitted to the meeting contained the following points:—

"After careful consideration of a request from the Liverpool District Missionary Association that our Union should include within its operations the church at Crewe, which had been closed by the Association since June, 1902, and after having sent a deputation to confer with the congregation on the subject, your committee decided to undertake the work for twelve months, on the condition (among others) that the Association should contribute £50 per annum towards expenses." The report goes on to state that after the chapel and school had been cleaned, painted, and decorated, "seven re-opening services were arranged; and on October 25 the first was conducted by the Rev. C. Harvey-Cook, minister-elect of Warrington. About one hundred persons were present, and everybody was pleased with the result. The second service was equally well attended; but on the subsequent Sundays the numbers gradually decreased to about fifty, at which figure they have remained nearly stationary. . . . Your committee feel that if the work at Crewe is to succeed it will be necessary to settle an efficient minister there as soon as the requisite funds are forthcoming." The report speaks of the special services now being carried on in East Cheshire under the auspices of the B. and F.U.A., and says, "The great work before the Union in 1904 is the successful carrying out of the grand bazaar to raise £5,000. It is a large sum to raise, and, in face of the unfortunate depression in trade, will require the devoted energy of every man and woman among us, as well as the generous assistance of all our friends throughout the country. . . . Most of our churches have now put their shoulders to the wheel, and the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire has organised working parties for the stall which it has promised to give us." The report shows that the Union gave financial aid to the churches at Ashton-under-Lyne, Congleton, Denton, Macclesfield, and Mottram to the extent of £150, in addition to £190 granted by the B. and F.U.A. There is a debt amounting to £157 11s.

In the place of the retiring President, the Rev. W. Harrison, of Stalybridge, Mr. Councillor J. Hall Brooks, of Gee Cross, was unanimously elected President for 1904. An important and valuable addition to the list of Vice-Presidents was Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart. The Treasurer, Mr. W. Hudson; the Hon. Secretary, the Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport; and the Hon. Auditor, Mr. M. C. Rogers, chartered accountant, of Hyde; were all unanimously re-elected.

After tea a public meeting was held in the chapel, when the chair was taken by Mr. Councillor J. Hall Brooks, and addresses were given by the Chairman, the Rev. C. Roper, representing both the B. and F. U. A. and the Manchester District Unitarian Association, the Revs. W. C. Hall, H. E. Dowson, and B. C. Constable. Mr. Roper's address dwelt forcibly on the need and importance of making our religion as widely known as possible. Mr. Hall spoke of the forthcoming bazaar, and Mr. Dowson proposed a vote of thanks to the Mottram congregation and others. The weather was most inclement—wet and foggy; but in spite of this there were 120 persons at the service, 140 to tea, and 130 at the public meeting; and the general feeling was that it had been one of the most hearty and inspiring meetings held for several years past.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Boston.—Last Sunday evening the Rev. Wm. Stoddart, B.A., took as his subject "Yellow Slavery," and made a strong protest against the proposal to introduce Chinese coolies into South Africa under conditions that constituted slavery. He emphasised the fact that there were thousands of unemployed British labourers, and millions of British subjects in India, as well as millions of natives in Africa, who would be willing to work under fair conditions; but the mine owners wanted slaves to provide them with cheap labour, to swell their enormous profits. The same demand for cheap labour led to the slave system of former days, and this system of indentured Chinese coolies would introduce a new set of outlanders, without the rights of citizenship, or even of manhood. A petition to the King was proposed by Ald. W. Bradford, J.P., and seconded by a working man (Mr. Warner), whose son fought in the recent war. This was adopted unanimously.

Bradford (Yorkshire).—On Saturday evening, February 27, the members of the Chapel-lane congregation attended in large numbers to bid farewell to Mr. Byron Boothroyd and his family on their removal from Bradford to Morecambe. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, who presided, spoke in appreciative terms of Mr. Boothroyd's long connection with the chapel, and of his able and faithful services as Sunday-school teacher, trustee, warden, and treasurer of the fund raised for the erection of their new schools. Whatever work he had undertaken for the chapel he had put his whole heart into it. The chairman regarded his departure as a great personal loss, as they had worked together in most complete harmony for very nearly twenty years. Mr. F. R. Pesel, one of the oldest members of the congregation, also bore testimony to the good work done by Mr. Boothroyd, and handed him, on behalf of the congregation, a beautiful silver tray, inscribed: "Presented to Mr. Byron Boothroyd by the Chapel-lane congregation, Bradford, Feb. 27, 1904, in grateful recognition of his long and devoted services to the Unitarian cause." After short addresses by Messrs. W. Thirkill, Walter H. Watson, W. T. Kirk, J. G. Slater, Gathorne Hargreaves, John Hargreaves, H. Garnett, Lewis Badland, and K. Baines, Mr. Boothroyd briefly acknowledged the gift, and spoke in feeling terms of the pleasure it had given him to serve the cause that was so dear to his heart. Mrs. Percy Sladen, of Northbrook Park, has most generously undertaken to have the organ reconstructed at a cost of £500 in memory of the late Mr. John Dawson, who, in his young days, when he lived with his parents at Royds Hall, was a worshipper in the Old Chapel.

Bolton: Bank Street. — A re-union of former Sunday-school teachers and scholars was held on Saturday, February 27, when the principal guests were the Rev. C. C. Coe and Mrs. Coe, of Bournemouth, and formerly of Bolton. About 450 persons sat down to tea, after which a great re-union meeting was held, the schoolroom being filled to overflowing. The chair was taken by Mr. Thomas Harwood, who was accompanied on the platform by his worship the Mayor of Bolton (Councillor John Heywood), the Revs. C. C. Coe and John Evans, Mrs. John Harwood, and others. The secretary read letters regretting their inability to attend from Revs. C. J. Street and Jeffrey Worthington, and other friends at home and abroad. The chairman, whose life-long association with the school and its work especially fitted him to preside over such a meeting, gave an interesting address, in which he recalled many pleasant memories of over a quarter of a century ago. The Rev. C. C. Coe, who was accorded a very hearty welcome, said how pleased Mrs. Coe and he were to again have the opportunity of being amongst their old friends at Bank-street. He was both surprised and delighted to think that they should ask him, as a former teacher in the Sunday-school, to come and address them on such an occasion. He saw around him many new faces, but he saw there also many old ones which revived the tender memories of his more than twenty years' ministry amongst them. After Mr. Coe's touching address "Auld Lang Syne" was sung with much feeling, and interesting addresses were then delivered by the Mayor of Bolton, Mrs. John Harwood, Miss H. Taylor, Miss Bramwell, Mr. J. Carter Hollins, Mr. Miles Gerrard, and Mr. J. Chadderton, all of whom had been either officers or teachers during Mr. Coe's ministry. A musical programme rendered by former members of the school, and an exhibition of lantern slides of portraits of former ministers, superintendents, and workers, together with views of the chapel and school added to the enjoyment of the evening. On Sunday the services in the chapel were conducted by Mr. Coe in the presence of large congregations. The evening service had special reference to the re-union gathering, and it was encouraging to note the large number of old scholars present. On Monday evening Mr. and Mrs. John Harwood held a reception at the Baths Assembly Rooms to give the congregation a further opportunity of meeting Mr. and Mrs. Coe. There was a large attendance, and a most enjoyable evening was spent. The whole series of meetings was a great success, and more than fulfilled the expectations of the Re-union Committee.

Cardiff.—On Monday, February 29, Mr. and Mrs. G. Carslake Thompson invited the members of the congregation and friends to a conversazione in the West Grove schoolroom to welcome the Rev. W. Whitaker and Mrs. Whitaker on their return from their honeymoon. There was a large attendance, and during the evening Miss Linda Childs, in the name of the ladies, made a presentation to Mr. and Mrs. Whitaker, which had been subscribed for by the members of the congregation, and both Mr. and Mrs. Whitaker suitably responded.

Carlisle.—On the invitation of the Rev. and Mrs. Chas. Travers, the members of the congregation assembled at a social gathering to meet the Rev. Frederic Allen, Publications Agent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sunday-school Association. There was a very good attendance, and a most pleasant evening was passed. On Tuesday evening last the Rev. Jas. Harwood was kind enough to lecture on "A Visit to India." There was a good audience, and the lecture was much appreciated.—Mr. Travers, being a "passive resister," has just had his goods seized a second time.

Darlington.—The services at Unity Church were conducted on the last two Sundays by Miss Mellone, daughter of the Rev. W. E. Mellone, of Warrenpoint, with great acceptance. Miss Mellone is willing to take occasional services in our churches.

Dundee.—On Friday evening, February 26, the members of the Unitarian Church held a social meeting on the occasion of the thirty-eighth anniversary of the Rev. H. Williamson's settlement as minister. Mr. Williamson, who presided, gave a short résumé of his experiences as a minister since his settlement in Dundee. The secretary, treasurer, and chairman of the committee also delivered short addresses bearing on the work and prospects of the congregation. The musical part of the meeting was ably sustained by members of the church choir and others connected with the congregation. At the close a resolution was passed acknowledging the services of Mr. Williamson as minister for the long period of thirty-eight years.

Ipswich.—In connection with a special course of services organised by the Eastern Union, the Rev. J. Page Hopps took the services at the Old Meeting on Sunday last, and delivered two brilliant and inspiring sermons. There were large congregations, morning and evening, and many expressions of sympathy and goodly fellowship were offered from strangers present. On Monday evening Mr. Hopps delivered a lecture entitled "The Joys and Sorrows of Evolution," thus concluding a most helpful visit.

Leigh: Lancs.—Having determined to raise an independence fund within the next ten years under the scheme of the N. and E. L. Unitarian Mission, the congregation, after securing promises of subscriptions amounting to over £100, have been working strenuously for a bazaar to add to the fund. On Friday and Saturday, Feb. 26 and 27, the bazaar was held, and was opened on the first day by Mr. Richard Robinson (of Swinton), Mr. W. L. Green (of Lowton) presiding. The weather was very unpropitious, yet a large and representative company assembled, and a successful opening was followed by a brisk and remunerative sale, which, at the close of the proceedings, added £100 to the fund. On Saturday the bazaar was opened by Mr. J. F. L. Brunner (son of Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P.), Mr. Alderman Pennington taking the chair. There was again a large attendance, including the Rev. Dr. Karfoot (Congregationalist), who spoke a few words of cordial and fraternal greeting. At the close of Saturday's sale the fund amounted to the handsome sum of £384, which the workers regard as a satisfactory result of their fourteen months' effort. The members of the church at Leigh are very grateful to friends in various parts of the country, who have so generously responded to their appeal, including the neighbouring congregations at Chowbent, Hindley, and Park-lane, which contributed a valuable parcel of goods for the sale.

Liverpool: Ancient Chapel (Appointment).—The Rev. Charles Craddock, formerly Congregational minister, who preached at the Ancient Chapel during January has accepted a unanimous invitation to the pulpit, in succession to the Rev. W. J. Jupp, and will begin his ministry on March 13.

London: Kentish Town.—On Sunday evening last a special musical service was held in the Free Christian Church. Several friends attended with stringed instruments, and Mr. W. Scrutton presided as usual at the organ. The second service from the "Ten Services" was used, and the canticle "Cantate Domino" was chanted to the first Gregorian tone. The anthem "How lovely are the messengers" was rendered by a full choir with organ and violin accompaniments. The Rev. George Critchley preached an eloquent sermon from the words, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." This was followed by the Mendelssohn solo, "Be thou faithful unto death," and at the close of the service the March from "Athalie" was given by band and organ. It is intended to continue these special choral services on the last Sunday in each month.

Nottingham: High Pavement.—Principal Gordon lectured for the Historical Society on Friday evening, February 26, on the subject of John Locke, who died in 1704, and Joseph Priestley, who died in 1804. The president, Mr. J. C. Warren, was in the chair. Principal Gordon, who was warmly welcomed, said if we we went back 100 years we came upon the anniversary of the death of Joseph Priestley, and if we went back 200 years we came to the anniversary of John Locke, and if we went back 300 years we came to the birthday of Faustus Socinus. The first was known as a chemist, the second as a philosopher, the third as a heretic, but there was something of the heretic about all three, while at the same time there was something of the philosoper about them, although to Joseph Priestley alone could be ascribed anything of the science of chemistry. The influence of the first named was to be seen in the minds of the two others, but the first was admitted to be the greatest of the three. The lecture was listened to with deep attention throughout, and at the close a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Gordon on the motion of the Rev. J. C. Grant, seconded by the Rev. Wm. Lindsay.

Richmond.—The annual meeting of the Ormond-road Free Church was held on Thursday, February 25, Mr. James Marshall (ex-treasurer) in the chair. Members of the committee were elected, and, as officers, Mrs. C. H. Edwards, treasurer, and Mr. H. C. H. Carpenter, secretary. The adoption of the annual report was moved by the chairman, seconded by Sir Roland K. Wilson, and after considerable discussion was agreed to.

Stockport.—On Sunday last, in connection with the special services being held in East Cheshire under the auspices of the B. and F.U.A., the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, preached in the Unitarian Church both morning and evening, when the annual collections were taken for the funds of the East Cheshire Christian Union. On the following Monday a Congregational Soirée was held in the schoolroom, at which Mr. Walters was present, and delivered a very excellent and inspiriting address on "Have we a Mission?" in which he showed conclusively that we have, and urged the importance of prosecuting it with all the zeal and energy at our command. The Rev. C. Roper, of Manchester, was also present, and spoke of the value of Unitarianism as compared with other religions, and the desirability of making it known as widely as possible. The Rev. B. C. Constable also made a short speech, pointing out what a fine opportunity there was for a practical application of Mr. Walters' address in the forthcoming bazaar for the East Cheshire Christian Union. That Union was essentially for "missionary purposes," seeking to spread Unitarian Christianity by establishing churches in new centres; and by working zealously for the bazaar they would be not only showing that we "have a Mission," but also be helping to carry it out. The senior warden, Mr. J. F. Spedding, was in the chair. Glees and a tenor solo were given by the choir. The soirée was well attended, and was a great success.

Wolverhampton.—The services at All Souls' Church on Sunday were conducted by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., who delivered a lantern lecture on Monday evening on a Visit to Transylvania. The lantern was operated by Mr. H. E. Perry. The lecture was thoroughly enjoyed, and at its close all present sang a verse of the "Hungarian National Hymn," and it was unanimously resolved to send a message of sympathy and goodwill from the Wolverhampton Unitarians to their co-religionists in Hungary. On the previous Saturday Mr. Shrubsole had lectured at the Municipal Technical School, to a crowded audience, on "America's Wonderland."

Erratum.—In Mr. Mellor's letter last week, p. 140, third col., for "poet-soul" read "Over-soul."

A presentation was made on Monday week to Mr. A. W. Worthington, J.P., of Stourbridge, by the executive of the Worcestershire Liberal Council, of which he has been president for the past seven years. The presentation, which consisted of solid silver inkstands on a tray, was made by Earl Beauchamp, who expressed the admiration and gratitude of the Council for Mr. Worthington's devoted services to Liberalism during trying years of discouragement. Other members of the Council joined heartily in these expressions of regard, and Mr. Worthington, in acknowledging the gift, dwelt upon the brighter prospects of the present, and the great responsibility laid upon their party. Religious liberty, he said, had been imperilled by the Education Act, and civil liberty by the introduction of Chinese labour into South Africa. He rejoiced in the signs of a change of sentiment in the people of this country.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Centenary celebrations of the British and Foreign Bible Society, despite the absence of the King from the service on Sunday at St. Paul's, were carried through with eminent success. At the great children's meeting in the Albert Hall on Saturday Mr. Lewis Paton, Head Master of Manchester Grammar School, was very happy in his address. He said a little Welsh girl had led the way in the foundation of that Society, and still he wanted the children to lead. He wanted them to say to the Christians of this country, who had been quarrelling among themselves for the past two years: "You have been quarrelling long enough. Come and be friends again, for the Bible's sake." In his sermon at St. Paul's on Sunday the Archbishop of Canterbury said that the essential truth of the Bible had nothing to fear from the light either of science or criticism. True science and true religion were twin sisters, each studying her own sacred book of God. At the Centenary meeting on Monday the Archbishop again spoke, and Dr. John Watson was also among the speakers.

OUR estimate of the probable effect of the action of the Bishops upon the elections for the London County Council has been more than justified. The elections, which took place last Saturday, resulted in the return of the Progressives to power with a majority of forty-eight, independent of the further advantage secured by a majority of Aldermen. The "Unionist and Conservative" candidates, as those who were popularly known as "Moderates" called themselves this time, had, as we said last week, the strong support of the Church officials; but when the polls were declared their net gain, whether due to that support or not, was two! If this is an adequate measure of the influence of the clergy one may fear less for their power of political "dictation" than for their ability to touch the lives of the people in a religious way.

THE degree of public interest shown in the elections, although greater than on previous occasions, receives a significant illustration by the fact that, taken as a whole, fully half the electors did not vote. More curious is the other fact, that in constituencies that send "Unionist and Conservative" candidates to Parliament the Progressive candidates were approved for the Council. It is difficult to judge whether this is due to the abstention of Tory voters at the Council elections or to the exercise of a little independent opinion on their part. Among the newly appointed councillors are ten members of the moribund School Board (five Progressives and five Moderates), who will, no doubt, secure places on the Education Committee, and so bridge over the transition period with a minimum of disadvantage to the public service. With respect to other new candidates, we have to regret that friends of ours like Dr. Herbert Smith and Lord O'Hagan are among the defeated; on the other hand, the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, our minister at Plumstead, who was already mayor of the borough, has won a notable victory as a Progressive.

SPECULATION is rife as to the effect of the elections on the fate of the Education Scheme submitted to the Department by the old Council. It will be remembered that this Scheme rejected the policy of appointing outside members to the Committee who are to administer the Act of 1903. Rightly or wrongly, the Progressive leaders considered that it was better to miss the help of experts, if need be, than to let the administration of public duties lie in hands of persons not directly answerable to the electors. The exception in the case of women, who by the stipulation of the Act must be included in the Committee, only accentuates their contention that women should be eligible as Councillors. A good deal of dissatisfaction has been expressed, naturally, by people who would like to be represented on the Committee without the ordeal of election; and the pressure on the Government to refuse assent to the scheme has been very strong. It will be seen whether they will venture on such a course now that the Progressive policy has been so emphatically endorsed at the polls.

THE National Council of Evangelical Free Churches has been meeting this week at Newcastle-on-Tyne. On Tuesday morning the Rev. James Travis, the retiring President, preached at the opening service, after which the new President, the Rev. F. B. Meyer, gave his address on "The Duty of the Free Churches in an age of Reaction." Told to think "imperially" what they needed, he said, was to think Christianly. Reaction in the Church towards Rome, reaction in education, relaxing of moral fibre, as in the Government's attitude towards subject races and the drink traffic, decline of the old religious habits of the people, these were among the subjects touched upon by the President in his earnest address. In their churches, he urged, they must keep the spiritual aspects of their work constantly in view, and seek for closer fellowship with the spirit of Jesus Christ.

TRUE to the statement of its aim, "to promote the application of the law of Christ in every relation of human life," the Free Church Council extended the scope of its deliberations far beyond the propagation of "Evangelical" Christianity and the question of sectarian education in the schools. The threatened Government attack on the discretionary power of licensing magistrates was denounced with the utmost vigour, and an urgent demand was made for constructive reform on the lines of Lord Peel's report. The conference was deeply moved by the accounts of Mrs. King Lewis and the Rev. E. J. Brailsford of the sights seen in Macedonia by that lady and Mr. Brailsford the younger; and a resolution was passed calling upon the Government "to redeem their pledge and to put forward the more drastic and more thorough measures of reform, which have been too long delayed." Equally emphatic was the condemnation, endorsed by the great audiences at every reference to the subject, of the proposal to introduce Chinese labour into South Africa under conditions amounting to virtual slavery. Evangelical Nonconformity is making its voice heard effectively against this iniquity, and we are glad to record many protests from our own churches. But there should be more.

THERE was also a resolution urging the more rigorous enforcement of the existing law with regard to gambling, and the granting of "increased municipal and administrative powers for the suppression of facilities for betting, and the punishment of those who profit by the encouragement of the evil." Dr. Goodrich, who moved the resolution, urged that steps should be taken to make illegal the publication of betting "tips" in the Press, and that the penalties to which bookmakers are subjected for plying their business should be increased in severity. Well-deserved tributes were paid to those newspapers which refuse to publish betting news in their columns; but the proprietors of many other journals besides these would gladly welcome legislation on the subject. Actual experience has shown that the omission of such matter means absolute ruin to many journals so long as their rivals continue to give it; and, apart from merely commercial considerations, it takes courage to decide that, rather than give this news, one will forego the privilege of helping on all other good causes which the possession of a newspaper confers. The giving of "tips," however, is a thing by itself, and a newspaper proprietor incurs a responsibility which we, for one, should not like to share with him, when he ventures to advise his readers on data which are necessarily entirely inadequate as to the horse on which they should lay their money. Here, at least, the case for legislation seems clear.

Although the resolutions leading up to the establishment of a Representative Church Council, which were submitted by the two Archbishops, passed all four Houses of Convocation and both Houses of Laymen, the haste and energy with which they were pushed through are causing an angry buzz of criticism among the more sacerdotal Churchmen. The proposed Council will be a new thing, and a purely English thing, without any analogue in the Latin Church. That in itself is enough to awaken much suspicion in a large party in the Church. They are beginning to ask for precedents, and are inclined to scoff at the only precedent which can be found for them, in an obscure period in the history of the Church of Spain. The real trouble lies in this, that the Representative Council, when once firmly established, would add yet another difficulty to the dogma of Church Government by Apostolical Succession. The control by Parliament, the appointment of Bishops by the civil government, the appeal to the Privy Council from ecclesiastical courts, have already reduced the high episcopal doctrine to the thinnest of fictions, and, if in the train of all this, democracy comes in, the deluge may be expected to follow. It is quite possible that serious or even impassable obstacles may await the Primates in their further conduct of this measure.

The pamphlet on "Christian Brotherhood," which has been recently published by the Archbishop of York, is inspired by an earnest desire to realise a close spiritual fellowship between different denominations of Christians. We extract a few sentences, to illustrate a spirit which is the more welcome because of the high position which their author holds in a somewhat exclusive denomination:—

> It may be that the true fulfilment of His prayer [in the Fourth Gospel], at least for the present, lies not so much in modifications of doctrine or in assimilations of order and of organisation, as in closer spiritual fellowship; in a clearer conception of our Christian Brotherhood; in a more earnest endeavour to live as brethren; to look, not everyone on his own things, but everyone also on the things of others. . . . I venture to think that as regards our Nonconformist brethren we might well set aside for the present any definite efforts to convert them to our own way of thinking, or to bring them over to our side. I believe that, in the best sense, they are on our side already. I do not forget our many differences and divisions, and even contentions which gender strife. But our brethren, as well as we, are on the side of Christ; and if this be so, we may well be workers together with Him. . . . I feel well assured that in such a fellowship, without any compromise or surrender, we should be far more likely to understand each other as brothers in Christ, and to see "with larger, other eyes" the things about which we differ. . . . It is true that they have no part in our ministry, but do we really believe that our Nonconformist brethren are so destitute of ministerial authority that they cannot be regarded in any sense as ministers of Christ?

The Archbishop goes on to propose these general principles as helpful in the cause of Christian fellowship:—

> To acknowledge in every one of the separate communities, both ministers and members, the relation of Christian Brotherhood; to recognise in them our fellow-workers in the Kingdom of God; to avail ourselves of every opportunity of holding private converse with them about the things of God; and of uniting with them in private prayer.

Mr. Richard Bell, M.P., states that the adoption of automatic couplings by State enforcement in the United States, reduced the number of shunters on the railways who were killed or injured at their work from 11,710 in 1893 to 2,256 in 1902. He calculates that some 64,000 men who would have suffered or died and left, in many cases, widows and orphans behind them, have escaped injury through the legislative enforcement of these means of reducing their danger. In the United Kingdom the number of accidents has in the same period increased by 2,000. Mr. Bell asks whether we in England are lacking in inventive capacity or in humanity, that we show so great a contrast. He suggests that "there are literally scores of devices scattered through the country, usually the work of poor and clever men," waiting for financial aid to make them effective, and that the forthcoming Colliery Exhibition at the Royal Agricultural Hall, Islington, will afford such men an opportunity of bringing their inventions, designed for the safety of railway workers, to public notice.

The National Council of Evangelical Free Churches is about to publish a series of short volumes under the general title "Eras of Nonconformity," which are intended to give a complete history of the Free Churches of Britain. One of the volumes is on the Anabaptists, another on the Friends, the series ranges from the Lollards to the present position of the Free Churches beyond the seas. A sufficient guarantee that the subjects will be dealt with in an interesting manner is found in the name of the Rev. C. Silvester Horne as general editor. It will hardly be possible to exclude all reference to the influence of Unitarians on Free Church history; but remembering the curious silences of Mr. Silvester Horne's recent "Popular History of the Free Churches," it is not perhaps to be wondered at that we look in vain in the prospectus for a recognition of their existence. In a complete history of the Free Churches our part would be no inconsiderable one: to ignore it appears, to say the least, to be disingenuous. We may be an unwelcome presence among the Free Churches, from the Evangelical point of view, but we are not less Free than others.

An article in the current issue of One and All, the Adult School Journal, draws attention to work similar to that of the English Adult Schools, which is being carried on in Denmark and in France. In the former, the Peasants' High Schools have exercised an increasing influence on the national life during a period of sixty years, and have made the Danes what Björnson calls them, the best educated peasantry in Europe. These high schools aim at drawing out the faculties and character of young men and women, rather than at "secondary education." In France, again, a movement has sprung up with the new century which is full of promise. Popular universities to the number of perhaps three hundred have been established in the metropolis and provinces. While offering the best teaching on economic, scientific, literary, and artistic matters, these aim especially at the establishment of fellowship relations between their members.

The Rev. F. B. Meyer, in the "Question Drawer" of the March Sunday Magazine, to the question "Will Unitarians be saved?" makes the following reply:—

> Why do you put salvation in the future? It is a much more important question, whether people are being saved now and here from the power and love of sin. What may await this man or that in the future is determined by his attitude towards so much of Christ as he knows to-day. There are thousands of people who are intellectually orthodox, and can repeat every clause of the Athanasian and Nicene Creeds, but who are not saved from selfishness, greed, opinionativeness, passion, and ill-temper; whilst there are many who open their hearts to a very imperfect creed, and who are nevertheless purified and indwelt by the Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Channing and Martineau could not intellectually accept our definitions of the Trinity, but spiritually they opened their natures to the glorious fulness of Him who is the Alpha and Omega. A child may be warmed by the sun, though it knows nothing of the sun's constitution. The one question must always be, "Are men true to so much of the truth as they know?"
> Yes, Channing and Martineau opened their natures to Him, who is the Alpha and Omega, whom they knew as the Eternal Father, and this they did in lowly discipleship to Jesus Christ. But that is, perhaps, not exactly what Mr. Meyer means.

Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, sub-editor of the Hibbert Journal, has been appointed Professor of Moral Philosophy in University College, London. The Chair has recently been founded and Professor Hicks is its first occupant.

"GOD AND MY NEIGHBOUR."

IV.—"NUNQUAM'S" DETERMINISM.

"If God is responsible for Man's existence, God is responsible for Man's acts."

IN "Nunquam's" chapter on Determinism, the above sentence makes no fewer than four separate appearances, each time in italics; it is, therefore, fair to assume, (1) that this is the root-principle from which he derives his determinist views, and (2) that he knows what are the legitimate deductions from that principle. I propose to show that (1) he does not know what these legitimate deductions are, and (2) that the principle itself is wrong, "Nunquam" being witness to its wrongness.

If the position as stated by him is correct, what follows is that man cannot sin at all, because he has no responsibility at all. "Nunquam" fails to perceive this, and thinks that his italicised sentence merely proves that man cannot sin against God. Obviously, this is to understate the case: if man has no freedom, he cannot sin against his fellow-creature any more than against his Creator, who alone is, ex hypothesi, "responsible for man's acts." That this, however, is not "Nunquam's" view is evident; for on the very page preceding his exposition of determinism, he delivers himself of the following statement: "He who wrongs a fellow-creature, wrongs himself as well, and wrongs both for all eternity. Let this awful thought keep us just." Now if this means anything, it means (1) that we really can "wrong"—i.e., sin against—each other, a thing we could not do unless we were free; (2) that the consequences of wrong-doing extend for sinner and victim "for all eternity"—a curious confession from a writer whose "real belief" is that "when we die, we die finally, and for us there is no more life at all" (p. 185); and (3) that we can if we reflect upon that fact, keep just, i.e., evoke a motive that will enable us to refrain from sin—in other words, that we are free. Evidently "Nunquam" regards, with Emerson, consistency, even from one page to the next, as "the hobgoblin of little minds."

So much by way of illustrative preliminary. Now, what "Nunquam" means by his denial of man's liberty and his affirmation of God's responsibility for man's acts is briefly this, that an omnipotent and omniscient God could and should have prevented those human desires which issue in what is usually called sin. If God could foresee moral evil, He ought to have put a stop to it from the first; if He could not do so, He is not almighty; if He could, but does not, He is not all-good; if, being responsible for man's very existence, He punishes man for the evil which he commits, He is not all-just. On the theistic hypothesis, man is, according to our author, a machine for whose movements its Maker is solely answerable; for his own part, he looks upon man as simply the product of his heredity and his environment, which jointly account for or determine his volitions.

Assuming, now, as "Nunquam" would have us, that our sense of being free is a delusion, the interesting question suggests itself. How did that delusion arise? Whence do we get the idea of having the power of choice if there exists no corresponding reality? Could we, as a matter of fact, possess such an idea unless such a corresponding reality existed? Granted that I am deluded in thinking that in any particular instance I am choosing, yet for that delusion to become possible, choice must have been a real experience at some time or other. I may be mistaken in thinking that I am recognising an acquaintance in the street; but in order to make that mistake, I must have known the real person in question. The determinist who tells me that my consciousness of freedom is the spurious coinage of my fancy, and that I am merely passive in doing or forbearing, overlooks the above difficulty, and overlooks, too, that the burden of proof rests on him.

If, on the other hand, the sense of liberty is not a delusion, then "Nunquam" is obviously mistaken in saying that God, by virtue of His omnipotence, could have prevented moral evil. Just as sentiency implies liability to painful as well as pleasurable sensations, so freedom implies the power to choose and act wrongly as well as rightly. Given liberty at all, God Himself could not have made us without sin, not only because sinlessness is as impossible on the moral as painlessness is on the physical side for finite and therefore imperfect beings, but because freedom means ability to choose between two or more courses, Omnipotence could not have made moral beings, except on condition that those beings should be free; what Omnipotence might have done was to contrive ingenious marionettes, so constructed as to go through a certain performance and no other, automata who could neither have been nor felt praiseworthy for the good—or, rather, correct—things they could not help doing. "But that is just what we are," exclaims the ardent champion of marionettehood; "and our complaint against God is just that He did not make us good marionettes!" Let us see whether that contention is a valid one.

And first as to heredity and environment. "Nunquam" speaks of man as the creature of these twin forces. "His ancestors make his nature; other men, and circumstances, modify his nature" (p. 185). What escapes "Nunquam" is the sufficiently obvious reflection that if other men make and modify our natures, and if we in turn make and modify the nature of others, it would be at least strange if we could play no part in making and modifying our own, and that—the presumption being that we can do so—he, at any rate, does not prove that we cannot. But what still further escapes him is that, while our faculty of choice is limited by heredity and environment, it is not thereby abolished; the circumscribed is not therefore the non-existent. In maintaining that we are the beings we are, and choose the things we choose simply because of what our heredity and environment have made us, he is taking a part—a very important part, one admits—for the whole, and overlooking a still more important third factor, of which we shall in due course speak.

Within the limits of this article I fear that I must not attempt to touch the deeply interesting question as to how human freedom is possible in view of divine omniscience. I am convinced that there is an answer to this question; but it belongs to the domain of pure metaphysics, and I cannot enter into its exposition here. I would only suggest that what to finite intelligences appears insoluble may find its solution when considered sub specie æternitatis. We may quite frankly admit that the reconciliation between these two facts which we are bound to assume, and which seem so antagonistic to each other, transcends our understanding, not only in the same way, and for the same reason, for which the whole conception of an infinite and self-existent Being necessarily transcends our capacity, in any case, as between the difficulty suggested by the intellect and the certainty proclaimed by the moral sense, we shall do well in following the stronger of these voices.

But assuming human freedom to be possible, Divine omniscience notwithstanding, is it a fact? "Nunquam" says that the man who conquers a dire temptation simply follows the strongest motive, and hence is not free. I also believe that he follows the strongest motive, but that the genesis of that motive—the manner of its becoming effective—is the very proof of the man's freedom. What our consciousness affirms when we are said to "resist" such strong impelling forces as unlawful gain or pleasure is not that our will is "free," but that we are free to an indefinite extent to determine what our will is to be. The self—and this is the third factor to which we alluded above—has the power, out of the whole mass of contending motives, to attend to some, to the neglect of others and the strengthening of those attended to; and, moreover, by the faculties of memory and deliberation, not only to select between a number of existing motives, but to create its own motives and to make them prevail. Thus the will is not "free" in the sense of being uncaused; but man is himself a causal principle which helps to determine his will. He is not acting contrary to his own strongest motive in resisting temptation, but is setting up a motive stronger than the temptation in question. His will is not self-determined, but determined by a Self; or, the will is determined, but man is free to help in determining it. Of this freedom we feel assured, whether we have used or abused it; and of the form that assurance takes in the latter case, it has been admirably said, "What would not humanity, age after age, have given to be free from remorse? . . . Men would have exercised it if they could; but they cannot. And remorse is only a darker name for man's conviction of his own freewill."*

But is the faculty of freedom consistent with the love of a God who knew in bestowing this power of choice the sin and shame its exercise would involve? We unhesitatingly answer that question in the affirmative. Not merely could man not be a moral being without liability to sin; not merely is the only alternative to freedom sheer automatism—a condition which few would seriously prefer to their present one; but this liability to sin, like the sensibility to pain, forms part of the education of the race as of the individual, leading us upward and onward. Given the making of manhood, the fashioning of character as the end, that end could not have been attained by making us correctly-behaved marionettes. The moral ascent of the race is directly due to the crowning gift of freedom and responsibility, which thus attests as does no other the love of God towards us. Without that gift, we might have been a little higher than the brutes; with it, we are a little lower than the angels.

One would have liked, did space permit, to speak of the practical aspect of determinism—of the very serious responsibility incurred by a popular writer spreading broadcast a kind of teaching which possesses a sinister attraction for the lower element in man, always glad to escape responsibility. It is more satisfactory to close by pointing out that "Nunquam" himself, after all, only fancies himself to be a determinist, and incidentally, in the midst of fiery protestations in defence of that position, furnishes very complete proof to the contrary. Let the following two quotations speak for themselves: "You say you have power to choose between two courses. So you have, but that power is limited and controlled by heredity and environment" (p. 145). "I believe that I am what heredity and environment made me. But I know that I can make myself better or worse if I try" (p. 144, italics ours). It is scarcely credible that a man could pen these sentences without perceiving that he is surrendering the whole argument for determinism, that he is conceding all the libertarian asserts, viz., a power to choose, within limits, a conviction that he can make himself better or worse by resisting or yielding. I can only say that these sentences, if reassuring from a practical point of view, are also the final proof of "Nunquam's" radical incapacity for philosophical thought, for by giving away his entire case with both hands, without so much as suspecting it, he shows that he has never so much as understood the question at issue. In furnishing this demonstration of "Nunquam's" practical assertion of his theoretical denial of man's liberty, we may claim to have carried out our undertaking, which was to show that his root-principle is wrong, he himself being witness to its wrongness.

In conclusion, I may, perhaps, be allowed one observation. The success of "God and My Neighbour" is in one sense a distinctly disconcerting fact—disconcerting, not because such a good case has been made out against religion, but the very reverse. That a book of this calibre should be received by thousands of readers as a kind of evangel, does not speak highly for the intelligence of the "man in the street," in the workshop, in the factory. On the other hand, it may be that the phenomenon points to a very general and widespread discontent with "orthodoxy"; in any case, I believe that it points to a very distinct and urgent duty on the part of liberal Christians—a duty which, if faithfully undertaken, may yet be a great opportunity. Convinced that we have that to give for the lack of which men turn to unbelief, we may well find in the temporary vogue of Nunquamism a call to service, an exhortation and a stimulus to increased earnestness and zeal in spreading a religion as free as it is reverent, as tender as it is strong. Shall we not rise to a fuller realisation of that duty—shall we not respond to that call, and quit ourselves like men?

J. Warschauer.

In publishing this concluding article of Dr. Warschauer's, we are glad to be able to announce that he has in the press a fuller examination of "God and My Neighbour," to be published very shortly by Mr. R. H. Allenson, under the title, "Anti-Nunquam." The following table of contents will show the scope of the work, which is to be issued at sixpence:—

Chapter I.—Of "Infidels" and the "Sin of Unbelief."
" II.—"Nunquam's" Estimate of the Bible.
" III.—"Nunquam's" Agnosticism: The Intellectual Basis of Scepticism.
" IV.—"Nunquam's" Agnosticism: Evil versus Divine Goodness.
" V.—"Nunquam's" Denial of Sin and Freedom.
" VI.—"Nunquam's" Criticism of Christ.
" VII.—"Nunquam's" Indictment of Christianity.
" VIII.—The Real "Parting of the Ways."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

The first place in this month's Independent Review is given to an article by M. Jaurès on "French Socialists and the Church," which shows how stability has been given of recent years to Republican power in France, and how this is making steadily for a separation of Church from State, in order, as M. Jaurès believes, to ensure freedom for wholesome social development.

The struggle against the clerical party is one of the most living and ardent traditions of the French working classes. They know, besides, that the establishment and maintenance of a new social order presuppose in the protelariat the exercise of reason and an untrammelled spirit: they are devoted to all the efforts which tend to develop freedom in the educational system.

M. Jaurès by no means ignores the dangers of the situation. "The laws," he says, "do not sufficiently respect the working classes, nor do the working classes sufficiently respect the laws." And again at the close of his most interesting article: "The law must enable the masses to have confidence in the law. The masses must be able, without fear of betrayal, to train within the bounds of the law their action as a class, and to bring this action into line with the rest of the democratic policy." Two other timely articles are those by Mr. W. Lewis Jones, on "The Educational Crisis in Wales," foreshadowing the complete triumph of popular control, and Mr. Hugh Law, M.P., on "The Situation in the Balkans," making clear the futility of the Austro-Russian "reforms," and the certain renewal of active revolt, involving Bulgaria in war, unless much more decided steps are taken to secure control in Macedonia independent of Turkish misrule. The two "Views of Lancashire" present extraordinary contrasts in the life of the artisan population. It is a relief to turn from Mr. Leigh's dark picture to "The People of the Valley," and to know that the brighter side of the picture is also true.

In the Contemporary Dr. E. J. Dillon has a survey of the situation as regards "Japan and Russia," with which should be read Mr. Henry Norman's notes in the World's Work, for a full appreciation of the tremendous issues involved for this country and France, no less than for the actual belligerents. In the Contemporary attention should also be directed to what "A British Colonist" has to say on "British Rule in the Transvaal," and temperance men will welcome Mr. T. P. Whittaker's valuable paper on "Alcoholic Beverages and Longevity." Mrs. Crawford contributes some vivid "Recollections of Renan."

The Nineteenth Century and After opens with an article by Lord Thring on "The Unity of the Empire," which cannot, he urges, be based on sectional or merely commercial interests. Of two articles on Russia and the war the second lays bare the very serious condition of the finances of the huge Empire. The Rev. John Hughes writes on the "Proposed Educational Concordat," in reply especially to the Bishop of St. Asaph, puts the Nonconformist position very clearly, and shows that if the Church will not agree to complete popular control with opportunities for special religious instruction out of regular school hours, the alternative must be either the Scotch system or the secularisation of the schools.

The most valuable article in the Monthly Review (in which this month's illustrated article shows some beautiful examples of Pescocostanzo lace) is that by Mr. Alfred Stead on "Bushido: the Japanese Ethical Code," setting forth the fine ideal of character developed in the old feudal code of the Samurai, with its type of knightly honour, becoming an ideal for the whole people. Here are some of their accepted teachings:—

The life of a man is like the going a long journey with a heavy load on the shoulders. Haste not. Reproach none, but be for ever watchful of thine own shortcomings. Forbearance is the basis of length of days.

When others speak all manner of evil things against thee, return not evil for evil, but reflect rather that thou wast not more faithful in the discharge of thy duties.

And Mr. Stead sums up the teaching as including "Rectitude, justice, filial piety and duty, courage, benevolence and pity, politeness and propriety, truthfulness and uprightness, honour and the disgrace of dishonourable actions, and the duty of loyalty to oneself, to one's family, and to the nation."

In the World's Work, we have already referred to the Editor's notes on Russia and Japan. There are further illustrated articles on both countries, while Mr. Haldane writes on "The Lesson of the Free Trade Controversy," and among other illustrated articles are those on "The Coal Miner and His Work," and "A London Policeman."

LITERATURE.

DR. DRUMMOND ON THE FOURTH GOSPEL.*

II.—AUTHORSHIP AND DATE.

"How far is the Gospel historical?" This is the question which concerns learned and unlearned equally, and forces upon the attention of all religious people a controversy which otherwise might be left to the little company of professional critics and theologians. Did Jesus make the claims here put in his mouth, and did he substantiate those claims, which otherwise would appear extravagant even to his most devoted followers, by works which only divine power could perform? These questions are not scholastic or speculative, they are strictly practical, and of the utmost possible importance for our spiritual welfare. On the other hand, whether the Gospel was known to Justin Martyr, whether it was used by the Valentinians and by Basilides, what bearing the Paschal Controversy has upon its authenticity, these are obviously matters which cannot be discussed satisfactorily without preliminary training for the work. Indeed, it will be found very difficult to get laymen or even the majority of ministers to take an intelligent interest in any questions of the kind.

Unfortunately it is just on the answers to be given to these and similar questions that it depends what conclusion we are to arrive at respecting the date and authorship of the work. And if Dr. Drummond has devoted what may seem a disproportionate share of his book to this part of the inquiry, he may be justified by the indirect importance of it as bearing on the veracity of the Gospel narrative. If John, an apostle, who heard and saw what he relates, or even thought he had heard and seen the like, if he was the writer, it is evident that the work has an interest and authority which it would not possess if written in the middle of the second century by one who had no resources to draw upon except such as were furnished by a pious imagination. It is upon this point, therefore, that Dr. Drummond brings to bear all the resources of scholarship and critical acumen of which he is the easy master. His work is entitled "An Inquiry into the Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel," but we find that the character is dismissed in sixty-seven pages, while the authenticity is discussed through 450. The all-important question which I have placed at the beginning of this article occupies only 36 pages. It almost seems as if a better title, and one which would greatly aid the sale of the book would have been, "John the Author of the Fourth Gospel." Not that the work is other than a very model of full and candid inquiry, but that the conclusion is evidently present to the writer's mind throughout. "On weighing the arguments for and against," he writes, "to the best of my power, I must give my own judgment in favour of the Johannine authorship." And we are bound to accept the judgment with the greatest respect as that of a man than whom no one living is either more fair or more competent to deal with the subject.

Still I cannot help the impression that we have here rather a summing-up in favour of John than what the author intends, and does his best to give us—an impartial inquiry. Such an inquiry is, perhaps, impossible where religion is so deeply concerned. If we succeed in freeing ourselves of a bias to the one side, it will almost certainly be at the cost of a bias on the other.

In maintaining the Johannine authorship while impugning the historical value of the Gospel, Dr. Drummond has the support of "the tradition of the elders from the first." This tradition has come down to us through Clement of Alexandria, in the remarkable words which ought to be borne in mind by every reader of the Gospel, "that John having observed that the bodily things had been set forth in the other Gospels, being exhorted by his friends, inspired by the Spirit, produced a spiritual Gospel."

Now in the language of Alexandria, "that which is bodily" denoted the liberal sense of Scripture, while "that which is spiritual" signified the higher figurative or allegorical meaning. Clement's statement, therefore, would not mean that the other Gospels told more about the life of Christ and the Johannine more about his teaching, but that the former were literal histories, whereas John, under the influence of a special revelation, set forth his higher and more secret doctrine in the form of an allegory. The correctness of this interpretation is confirmed by the very plain statement of Origen, who declares that if all four Gospels are to be received, it can only be through the recognition "that their truth is not in the bodily (or literal) character," and he lays down the somewhat startling rule, that where the writers were unable to speak the truth, at once allegorically and literally, it was their purpose "to prefer the spiritual to the corporeal, the spiritual truth being often preserved in the corporeal falsehood, as one may say." On the other hand, the tendency to accept it as veritable history would naturally grow as time passed on. Indeed, the common mass of Christians would soon receive it in its most literal sense; for the very object of allegory was to accommodate itself to the duller apprehension of less advanced minds, and under the semblance of facts to infuse as large an amount of spiritual truth as each man was able to assimilate" (pp. 33, 34).

Now this hypothesis of allegory, that "the book is religious," not historical, "giving us not a photograph but an interpretation of a great life," disposes at once of numerous and overwhelming difficulties. We need not, e.g., trouble to account for the omission of the resurrection of Lazarus from the other Gospels, if it be only a story "designed to set forth in a vivid and picturesque form the truth that Jesus is the resurrection and the life, and by his commanding spiritual authority raised the dead from the grave of moral corruption" (p. 64). On the other hand, some will find it almost more difficult to believe that such a graphic narrative was written by one who had been an intimate friend of the Lord, had heard him preach, and been witness of his mighty works, "a simple and unlettered man," moreover, ignorant of the allegorizing methods of the Rabbinical schools and of the disciples of Philo. That a philosophic Christian of Ephesus or Alexandria could have written such "a spiritual gospel," with no intent to deceive, but on the contrary desiring to make the real truth more widely known—this is credible enough, though it is a supposition which is by no means free of difficulties.

Dr. Martineau's conclusion from the external testimony to the Gospel is, "that we cannot confidently name any earlier date than the fifth decade of the second century" for the date of composition. Dr. Drummond has, I venture to think, fixed his attention too exclusively on this opinion, which Martineau no doubt formed long before in his old age he published "The Seat of Authority in Religion." I should be embarrassed to find myself at variance with both of these distinguished authorities were it not that there is weighty opinion in support of that which I have myself long held, and Keim expressed so far back as 1867, "that according to all appearance, the correct date is the beginning of the second century, the time of the Emperor Trajan, in whose reign John is said by Irenæus to have been still alive—therefore about A.D. 110–115." (Life of Jesus, vol. i. p. 211.)

If this date be provisionally accepted, many of the objections which Dr. Drummond so convincingly urges against the post-apostolic origin of the work will no longer avail, for we may allow its direct connection with the apostle, and even its dependence on his teaching, while at the same time we can account for its apparently reluctant acceptance by the church at large. The late Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, quotes Dr. Drummond as "a very able and learned Unitarian who conclusively establishes the dependence of Justin's doctrine on St. John's"; but the more completely Justin's acquaintance with the Gospel is established, the more urgent becomes the question, "Why then has Justin not quoted the Fourth Gospel at least as often as the other three?" Though, indeed, this is hardly a full statement of the difficulty. Why, if he derived from that Gospel his characteristic doctrine of the Logos, does he not at once appeal to its authority in support of his own statements? Why does he refer so continually to the Synoptic story—some 120 times according to Westcott—and so sparingly to that of John that it has been doubted whether he knew of it? Why does he refrain from quoting it when it would perfectly answer his purpose and prefer to make use of indirect arguments from other sources?

To these questions Dr. Drummond replies almost in the words of Archdeacon Watkins "I cannot tell" (p. 157). But surely the natural inference would be that Justin did not recognise the Gospel as belonging to "The Memoirs of the Apostles," of which he makes such frequent use. He must have been acquainted with it if it existed in his time. He must, we should say, have preferred it to other Gospels if he believed it to be the work of the beloved disciple, for it is his own favourite doctrine which is set forth in it. We can account for the fact that he makes such very sparing use of it only on the supposition that while he may have admitted that it was in some sense "according to John," he did not believe John to have been the author.

* An Inquiry into the Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel. By James Drummond, M.A., LL.D., Hon. Litt.D., Principal of Manchester College, Oxford. (Williams & Norgate. 10s. 6d.)

And it is evident that there lingered on long afterwards some consciousness that the work was at least not wholly due to the apostle. We have signs of it in the Gospel itself (xix. 35, and especially xxi. 24, "we know that his witness is true"), and the ancient tradition found in the Muratorian fragment and corroborated by other authorities, represents Andrew the Apostle and others cunctis recognoscentibus as having had some responsibility for the publication, if not for the composition of the work.

It was Matthew Arnold's suggestion that :—

In his old age St. John, at Ephesus, has sayings of the Lord and incidents in the Lord's story, which have not yet been published. The elders of Ephesus move him to bestow his treasure upon the world. He gives his materials, and the presbytery provides a redaction for them and publishes them. The redaction, with its unity of tone, its flowingness and connectedness, is by one single hand—the hand of a man of literary talent, a Greek Christian, whom the Church of Ephesus found proper for such a task ("God and the Bible," p. 257).

It seems to me that Dr. Drummond has not taken sufficient account of an hypothesis of this kind, which seems to be gaining acceptance even in orthodox quarters. The only serious objection is that a gospel so edited and revised would not have taken the name of John, but have been called after its editor. For we have a parallel instance in the second Gospel, which, as tradition asserts, is the Gospel of Peter edited and added to just as we suppose John's to have been, but it has come down to us under the name not of Peter but of Mark, the editor.

I cannot admit that the argument has much weight. There was certainly no rule or etiquette of titles in the early church, and when a gospel appeared differing widely from those in general use, it was essential to its acceptance that it should bear a name known and recognised in the churches. Mark was a companion of the Apostles, and probably himself a follower of Jesus. His account might well be accepted on his own authority; but what credit would have been attached to a very different account bearing the name of one, who was probably unknown outside of Ephesus, and who certainly had never seen the Lord? It would be, strictly speaking, the Gospel according to John, if it was based on John's teaching, and under any other title could not have obtained recognition. Indeed, it seems clear that even under the shelter of so venerated a name, it was not generally received without hesitation and delay; and it is not a little remarkable that, as Dr. Westcott observes, and Dr. Drummond fully establishes it, it is "outside the church that the testimony to the general use of the gospel is both early and decisive. In the quotations from early heretical writers, the references to it are comparatively frequent." Tatian, the disciple of Justin, is one of the earliest witnesses to it in his Diatessaron, but Tatian had gone over to the heretics when he composed that work.

The chapter on the Paschal Controversy is a delightful and illuminating piece of work. The suggestion that there long prevailed "a general practice of killing a sheep at the Passover on the part of Christians" is startling, nor am I sure that the curious "Benediction of the Lamb at Easter" quoted from an old Roman Order, lends it support. This blessing was apart from the divine office, and might be no more than one instance of the practice of turning every act of life and change of times and seasons to religious account. The first eating of flesh after the long abstinence of Lent would naturally have its proper benediction. But if such a practice did exist, even if only in very early times and in Oriental provinces, it would make at once intelligible why Jesus should be introduced from the first as, "the Lamb of God."

Dr. Drummond dedicates his book—

In reverent and loving memory of John James Tayler and James Martineau, who while themselves fearlessly seeking for truth, taught others to follow evidence with their own independent judgment, however imperfect, and to call no man master upon earth.

It is no flattery to add to these two names of illustrious truth-seekers that of Dr. Drummond. Whether we agree with his conclusion or differ from him we are equally under obligation to him for a noble and inspiring book.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

THE MUNICIPAL IDEAL.*

To pronounce any book of Mr. Bernard Shaw's remarkable is to utter a foregone conclusion. Yet there is no other word for this little manual, with its clear survey of community-needs, its searching analysis of the complicated social reactions which the confused elector strives in vain to grasp as he pores over statistics and the columns of the Times. There are no figures here, nor anything to remind one of the Times when it opposes platitude to "Municipal Socialism," and raises the bogey of "increasing municipal indebtedness." On the other hand, there is a good deal of the Bernard Shaw we used to know, whose second advent one has been devoutly awaiting, the G. B. S. of spiritual ideals and pity for wasted opportunities, whether in the individual or the State. It would be indecorous to congratulate Mr. Shaw; it is inevitable that we congratulate ourselves.

"How to qualify as a municipal elector" might be the description of these 120 pages. From gas and water to the character of candidates, nothing is left unsaid that need be said. If any fault is to be found, it is on the score of compression. So wide is Mr. Shaw's angle of vision, so much is packed into a sentence, that dilution in the form of paraphrase is frequently necessary. However, a bottle of bovril will go into the pocket when an ox cannot be accommodated in the garden.

Throughout the book is the human asset set over against specious objections to "municipal indebtedness." This ranges the book on the side of the ideal. It is intensely practical as well. The appeal is based on the use of municipal credit instead of the random activities of company promoters. From the merely commercial point of view municipal trading is in many ways unquestionably advantageous. In the "ability market," too, it has "a decisive advantage in the superior attraction of public appointments." It is not to be sought all round, because there are commodities that can obviously be better provided by private enterprise. It is not advisable to "press the Parks Committee to undertake the municipal breeding of elephants for the sake of giving the children a ride." But what is to be said when, from a commercial point of view, municipal trading does not pay? Here, as many think, is the crux. Mr. Shaw's exposure of the failure of the commercial test is one of the best things in his book :—

Take the most popular branch of commercial enterprise—the drink traffic. It yields high profits. Take the most obvious and unchallenged branch of public enterprise—the making of roads. It is not commercially profitable at all. But suppose the drink trade were debited with what it costs in disablement, inefficiency, illness, and crime, with all their depressing effects on industrial productivity, and with their direct cost in doctors, policemen, prisons, &c. Suppose at the same time the municipal highways and bridges account were credited with the time and wear and tear saved by them. It would at once appear that the roads and bridges pay for themselves many times over, whilst the pleasures of drunkenness are costly beyond all reason. Consequently, a municipalised drink traffic which should check drinking at the point of excess would be a much better bargain for the ratepayers than our present system, even if the profits made at present by brewers and publicans were changed to losses made up by subsidies from the rates.

This is a case where "the desirability of municipal trading is actually in inverse ratio to its commercial profitableness." Mr. Shaw goes on to apply the seeming paradox to the case of a dock company.

Near the docks three institutions are sure to be found—a workhouse, an infirmary, a police court. . . . Numbers of men are taken on and discharged just as they are wanted, at sixpence an hour or less. This is convenient for the dock company, but it surrounds the dock with a demoralised, reckless, and desperately poor population. The shareholders and directors do not live near the docks, so this does not affect them personally. But the ratepayers who do live near the dock are affected very seriously. . . . In fact, a large part of the cost of the casual labour is borne by the ratepayer and not by the dock company. The dividends come out of the ratepayers' pockets, and are not in any real sense profits at all. Thus it is one of the many ironies of the situation that the sacrifices the ratepayer makes to relieve the poor really go largely to subsidise the rich.

"A municipality," Mr. Shaw adds, "cannot pick the ratepayers' pocket in this fashion." Under the new conditions it is possible that the profits made by the company would disappear, but if a considerable portion of the pauperism and crime of the neighbourhood also disappeared, the bargain would be a very profi able one for the ratepayers, and how profitable for those who now swell the prisons and workhouses!

"If you have to choose between underfeeding your boy, and patching his knickers, patch his knickers," sums up the greater part of the "profit and loss" discussion in this book. The human asset is everything; and the fact that it can be had without ruining, nay, without straining the security of those who now reap large harvests from private enterprise, remove a bogey-barrier to municipalisation. Those for whom the word has a terror, forget that the rates have a pleasant side. There is much more in this book that I should like to speak of and to quote. The chapter on housing is, perhaps, as luminous as anything that has appeared on the subject. It is to be hoped that the book will be widely and earnestly read, because it falls into the category—scanty enough—of social ideals that are also practical.

THOMAS J. HARDY.

LONDON SQUARES.

MR. W. H. DICKINSON, in a letter to the press, draws attention to a serious peril that menaces the city for which he has worked so strenuously and successfully on the County Council. The square gardens, of which London possesses a large number, are one of the characteristic features of our city, and the value of these open spaces in the midst of this huge agglomeration of buildings is very great. There is danger of their being built over, a danger not remote but immediate. Twice already has the County Council intervened. By an accident Euston-square has been saved. The North-Western Railway had acquired rights over it. Fortunately it was possible to get a clause inserted in one of their Bills to prevent building here. This course, however, is not generally possible. As the law stands at present, the builder cannot be stayed from covering many of the squares with bricks and mortar. Just as the commons of the country were enclosed and the needs of the poor ignored, so it seems the squares of the city may be closed, in spite of the needs of the citizens. One of these open spaces in Stepney was acquired some time ago for building, and was only rescued because the Council purchased it at its full building value: a value, it should be remembered, created simply by the fact that people are living around it in overcrowded conditions. This policy cannot, as Mr. Dickinson points out, be followed on a large scale; the cost would be prohibitive.

If the squares are to be saved it can only be by legislation. To this end a Bill has been introduced into the House of Lords. It has to run the gauntlet of powerful private interests, and if it is to be successful it must receive the strong support of public opinion. The Borough Councils should be appealed to to assist the passage of the Bill. Something also can be done by private associations. Perhaps still more influence could be exerted by individual electors writing to their Members of Parliament. Everything should be done to make it clear that these breathing spaces must not be lost.

The squares are of vital importance to London in many ways. We hear constantly of the need to prevent overcrowding in houses. But the evil of overcrowding an area, though less often referred to, is equally serious. The open squares do serve the function of modifying the unhealthiness of city life. Many of them are on sloping ground, and give a feeling of space even greater than their actual size. This sense of space, with the relief it brings to the eye, and through the eye to the heart, is invaluable. The grass, the shrubs, the trees, are reminiscent of a greater and more humane life. But even beyond this æsthetic value is the importance of the primary function served by the squares—that of keeping open-air spaces in the midst of the city. It is, therefore, on all grounds, to be hoped that Mr. Dickinson's appeal will not be in vain. But if this result is to be achieved, the people of London must be resolute and active.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE TALENTS.

(ST. MATTHEW XXV. 14—30.)

HAVE you thought about some other responsibilities than what jingle in your money-boxes? Here is a poem which is nice to say when you are seven years old, and to remember at any age:—

There's no dew left on the daisies and clover,
There's no rain left in heaven:
I've said my seven times over and over,
Seven times one are seven.
I am old, so old, I can write a letter,
My birthday lessons are done;
The lambs play always, they know no better:
They are only one times one.
O moon in the night, I have seen you sailing
And shining so round and low;
You were bright! ah bright! but your light is failing,
You are nothing now but a bow.
You moon, have you done something wrong in heaven
That God has hidden your face?
I hope, if you have, you will soon be forgiven,
And shine again in your place.
O velvet bee, you're a dusty fellow,
You've powdered your legs with gold!
O brave marsh-marybuds, rich and yellow,
Give me your money to hold.
O columbine, open your folded wrapper,
Where two twin turtledoves dwell!
O cuckoo-pint, toll me the purple clapper
That hangs in your clear green bell!
And show me your nest with the young ones in it,
I will not steal them away;
I am old! you may trust me linnet, linnet,
I am seven years old to-day.

The little girl (or it might be a boy) is very happy, but she has certainly learnt some of the responsibility of being seven years old. By the way she says "my birthday lessons," she seems to have taken extra pains with them, and perhaps has made great resolutions for future diligence. But more lessons are learnt outside than inside school-books, and she has answered God not only in the schoolroom, but out of doors, for the trust of her intelligence and senses and other powers that work through them. Poets and men of science can tell in their way of the things God has created, but without their five or two talents, and with only one talent for taking in loveliness and wonder, we make good use of our minds and eyes and ears if we even delight as much as the little seven-year-old in the beauties of birds, insects, and flowers, and try to understand their marvellous life. Just now we can "build ourselves nests of pleasant thoughts," watching the changing colour of the woods as the buds swell, the spreading of the first green wings of the bracken, the gleaming of the first celandine, the awakening of insects from winter sleep in crevices, the funny games of the lambs, the restlessness of birds till they settle to nest-building and rearing of fledglings. Even in town gardens and parks there is much to make us think, wonder, and feel about plant and animal life, to say nothing of the wonders of creation in museums. "Keep your eyes open and think," said clever General Baden Powell. It is good advice, wherever you happen to live, and may be applied most usefully also to the study of railway lines and engines, shop-windows, fire-escapes, and water-carts, if you are not lucky enough to be a country child. Then the little girl feels it her duty never to know about or admire wonderful and beautiful things, if by so doing unnecessary pain is given to any living creature. "I will not steal them away. You may trust me, linnet, linnet, I am seven years old to-day." Altogether having a birthday has set her thinking more seriously than usual, and she begins to see that life to her means more than to the other happy creatures round her. God gives human beings a choice of using their lives for good or ill. He makes children, when they have done wrong, feel as the moon looks under a cloud, and when they try to be better lets them "shine again" in their place.

That brings me back to the parable. I want you to think of the talents as the trust of human life and all its powers. Body, limbs, hands, tongue, voice, senses, brain, soul, are responsibilities given you by God, and you are to bring Him the best results for them you know. At first older people take this responsibility for you, but the longer you live you ought to become more and more able to use your powers wisely and well. Every child knows that gifts bestowed are not alike in amount or kind. To each is given "according to his several ability." Provided it is good, God does not reward according to quantity or kind of return, but for the faithfulness with which you have performed the trust. To the slave who had five talents and the one who had two the lord uses the same words of praise, and offers the same reward.

When the faithful bond-servants had restored the talents with interest on his return, the master gave a supper, and invited them to sit down to table with him as a sign that henceforth they were free, and lived as his friends. (Luke xii. 37.) There was no more toil through fear or by force as slaves. Whatever work was in store would be done with understanding and loving obedience. This was entering "into the joy of their Lord."

Do you know the happiness when your parents smile "Well done," when you have worked your best at something they have asked you to do (puzzling, perhaps, why they should set it you, and timid lest you should fail)? Their loving approval makes you feel that you ought never to hesitate over any trust they may lay on you, and that it is a never-ending joy to find that each duty well done for them draws you nearer to them, making you know and love them more and more. This must be something like the perfect understanding and love of God which Jesus felt when doing the will of his Heavenly Father, and something like what he means by "Enter into the joy of thy Lord." Every man, woman, or child who has answered well for the trust of life may share that joy with Jesus, and all the good and faithful who have ever lived.

THE PEOPLE OF THE BOOK.

PERHAPS few pictures referring to popular Royal actions are better known than the one in which the late QUEEN was portrayed holding out a Bible to some dusky potentate, and affirming that this was the source of England's greatness. It was but in keeping with this tradition that the KING and QUEEN should undertake to attend the special service at St. Paul's Cathedral last Sunday, to give weight by their presence to the aims and principles of the Bible Society, and to re-affirm in this way the representative action of the late QUEEN. The KING was unfortunately prevented by the inclement weather and his recent indisposition from fulfilling his purpose, but QUEEN ALEXANDRA and the PRINCE and PRINCESS OF WALES were there.

There is something striking in this external admission, at any rate, that our sway takes ostensibly the form of a Theocracy, and that through the mouth of Royal representatives, the people confess that GOD is, in the ultimate resort, their Lawgiver and Judge. This is indeed all that the most exacting of us could desire. The term "subject" has long since lost its old significance. Autocracy and the divine right of kingship are obsolete terms, and the term democracy is far too ambiguous to be of any practical use. To possess, therefore, an external and supreme standard by which a nation may adjust its conduct, the general terms of which are too well known and too highly and universally honoured to meet with any sane opposition, this is a priceless blessing and an indispensable "moderator of lawless ambition." The Bible is held as the symbol of the Theocracy, and the principles of the Theocracy are condensed into the famous "requirement," "to do justly and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy GOD."

We may gladly admit that the notable celebrations that have been so universally held in connection with the British and Foreign Bible Society, have been inspired by a more or less clear perception that fundamentally the reason for the efforts, and the joy in their success, are owing to a sincere desire to be true to the great "requirement," and to a firm belief that, in the main, the British race has been fairly faithful to it. Yet it would be affectation to pretend that there has been success commensurate with the ostensible appearance of things. We are by no means sure that a somewhat less rapid and less ostentatious display and propagation of our avowed objects would not be more solidly successful in the long run. After all, the real victories of the Bible are being achieved under the ægis of the third Beatitude, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth," and it is the lot of these to be largely obscure and forgotten. "Ceux qui prennent le rôle du dévouement et de la douceur," said Renan, "sont d'ordinaire oubliés."

It is possible for the Bible to have too many friends, who are too much allied with the powers that be, too eager for seductive pieces of silver, and too ready to betray it with a kiss. Among the most obtrusive admirers of the Bible are those who are least inclined or least able to follow its divinest precepts. And it is galling to be forced to see how it is at times used as a mere stalking-horse, behind which a worldly and deadly policy can be more successfully carried out. It is with no desire to insert a kind of Kiplingite "saving clause," that we pause to estimate the value of the recent far-flung celebrations beneath pine and palm. After a military parade of portentous proportions worthy, to be sure, of a God of Battles and a Lord of Hosts, suddenly to bethink us of "the Father that seeth in secret," so that like a boy caught in a pompous folly, we shuffle and catch our breath and "walk humbly" as beseems creatures of that peculiar breed, such ostentatious after-thoughts would be nauseous if they were not so radically ludicrous. This theatricality before high Heaven—at one moment the beating of big drums and the swagger, and then, the next, the beating of breasts, with inability to lift up so much as our eyes unto heaven—out-Phariseeing the Pharisee—is only Biblical inasmuch as both types are given, but not exactly as common to the same men. No, some aspects of the celebrations give us pause because we feel that more and more it is necessary to emphasise the "rôle du dévouement et de la douceur" as the real source of the power of the Bible. To crucify it, as it were, between an unscrupulous flag and an unscrupulous trade, is to add mockery to cruelty, but even so it may save one of its two malefactors, but not both. It may forgive and spiritualise trade; it cannot do anything with the ways of violence, except leave them alone. The same social evolution that has brought us as far as Law Courts and out of the quagmire of fisticuffs and duels, must inevitably bring the nations out of their benighted methods of barbarism into International Arbitration Courts.

"Everything shall live whither the river cometh"; that is a grand saying as applied to the Bible. But it must be the pure waters of life in truth and love that are brought to the people. When its streams are mingled at one time with blood and at another time with the deadly intoxicating drugs of opium and alcohol, when its teachings of peace are mingled with examples of bloodthirsty violence, fraud, greed, lust, chicanery; and when these things are done in the name of and by the "People of the Book," is it to be wondered at that many tremble for the fate of a Book they love and honour? The actual propagation of the Bible, we do not doubt, is being generally carried on with the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove, in such a way, doubtless, as we ourselves should appreciate if it should occur to the Hindoos to found a Hindoo and Foreign Vedas Society, or to the Persians to found a Persian and Foreign Zendavesta Society, or to the Chinese to found a Chinese and Foreign Devil Confucius Society, and to scatter amongst us their translators, colporteurs, and sacred book women. Whether we should welcome them with the same avidity as they are alleged to welcome us is a matter about which much honest doubt might be felt. A CARNEGIE might do worse than subsidise heavily some such societies in the interests of comparative religion and the proprieties of religious toleration under difficulties.

Another hundred years of the Bible Society may prepare many surprises for men in the course of its development. Its publication of the Revised Version, with limitations imposed by Oxford, and its constant anxiety to revise its own innumerable translations into the vernaculars of many lands, so as to avoid, e.g., "a fading crown of glory" being translated "a worn-out old hat," may bring in an even more acceptable Revised Version than the present, which will gradually open the eyes of the blind and bring light to a people who sit in darkness and in the shadow of many popular fallacies. This in itself may be the highest recommendation to the foreigner of our bona fides, our fearlessness, our toleration, our desire to learn as well as to teach. We feel assured, however, that the safety and the salvation of the Bible and its victories are in the keeping of the hands and hearts of those "qui prennent le rôle du dévouement et de la douceur." Thus, indeed, "everything shall live whither the river cometh."

JOHN STUART BLACKIE AND SUBSCRIPTION TO CREEDS.

THE biographer of John Stuart Blackie appears by no means favourably inclined to Unitarianism. Her work contains a slur upon that particular form of Christian doctrine which is perhaps more calculated to give offence than an open attack. It is surely to be regretted that one who makes a claim to breadth of view and liberality of judgment should have penned such a sentence as the following. Not very long after his appointment to the Aberdeen Professorship Blackie had a fit of despondency, and the writer of his biography thus endeavours to account for it:—

> Perhaps he was overworked, and the strain of his gallant fight against prejudice and stupidity was beginning to tell. Unhappily, too, some book of Unitarian sermons had drifted into the current of his life, and he had thought fit to read them. They set in motion that flickering pulse of unbelief which beats intermittently in every serious mind. He began to waste his strength once more in vain questioning, letting his faith ebb.*

This allusion to a volume of Unitarian sermons as though they were some species of poison harmful to a man who had already steeped himself in German rationalism would be highly amusing if it were not so grossly unfair.

The real cause of Blackie's depression was probably due to a conscience not quite at ease about the terms upon which he had accepted his professorship. A compromise had been effected which, to a mind such as his, can hardly have seemed satisfactory when calmly reviewed. And the Unitarian sermons, which, whatever their limitations of faith, were not likely to err in a moral difficulty of this kind, probably roused into an uneasy activity scruples that had been somewhat too easily suppressed.

The position had been a trying one. Circumstances made it exceedingly desirable that he should secure some certain means of income, and the Latin Chair in Marischal College was a post just suited both to his abilities and inclination. But unfortunately in those days the Chair could only be held by one who had signed what his biographer irreverently terms that "tough and wordy document," the Westminster Confession of Faith. The epithet is not a happy one, for the document is not "wordy" in the sense that it is obscure or ill-composed. With terrible distinctness, it discloses a conception of God and man from which an unperverted reason recoils in horror. Blackie was advised to sign it without "impertinent scruples," but it was no easy matter, and after studying the document more closely his scruples grew stronger. "To sign a creed," he says, "was to say you believed the creed—that the creed was yours. When this conviction first flashed upon me, I was horror-struck. I could not sign a Calvinistic Confession of Faith without declaring myself a Calvinist. I could not sign any Confession of Faith without signing away my freedom of thought."† Much pressure was brought to bear upon him. Father and friends urged every argument against his impracticable attitude. The example of Dr. Paley, of countless clergymen whose lives declared their piety, was pressed upon him. At last a way was opened which promised an honest compromise. He could not subscribe simpliciter: he might subscribe with a declaration of his attitude, which publicly made and publicly advertised, should inform those concerned that his subscription did not imply an avowal of the creed each clause expressed, but an agreement to respect that creed in the exercise of his professional duties.

So with this ingenious evasion in his mind he signed the Confession, and then made his declaration. It is hardly to be wondered at that one of the members of the Presbytery "said, 'that this declaration should have been made prior to signing,'" and that the Presbytery refused to put it on record. Determined that it should be published, Blackie sent it to the Aberdeen newspapers, and no little stir was created. The suit which resulted was gained by Blackie, and he was duly installed in the University. He had signed the Confession, made his declaration, kept his Chair; but he was not quite satisfied, and those unlucky Unitarian sermons, instead of lulling his scruples, like the example of countless pious clergymen, had the very opposite effect. "There is no doubt that he reviewed his position under the influence of these conditions, and fell into sore distress. It seemed to him that he must give up the Humanity Chair, become perilous to one at variance not only with the Calvinism which overshadowed it, but with the fundamental doctrine of Christianity." In his distress a friend wrote to him a letter full of denunciation of Unitarianism, and urging him to regard it as "part of the discipline of Providence" that he was not free "to express all his opinions, though quite free to think and form them." The letter appears to have attained its object, but that it did not quite suppress his interest in Unitarian sermons is evident from this extract, written many years later, in the autumn of 1859, when the British Association had met at Aberdeen:—

> James Martineau has been living up at Braemar for two months, and preached last Sunday forenoon in this place. Of course, I did not miss the opportunity of seeing what small account the Holy Spirit takes of our petty orthodoxies and heterodoxies, and verily I was rewarded! Such a sermon, so commanding, so comprehensive, so profound, so original, and, as a whole, so effective, I have seldom heard. It was directed to the men of science especially, showing how the idea of a mere God of natural laws is insufficient to satisfy the cry of the human heart.*

Many years later he received a letter from the great philosophic preacher, which is quoted. It recalls an interesting passage in Dr. Martineau's student days:—

> Many thanks for the Acropolis. The last time I handled a Greek newspaper was in the summer of 1824, within two or three months of Byron's death at Missolonghi. Calling on Mrs. Barbauld at Newington-green, I found her on her feet just taking leave of two visitors who had brought her some message from Byron, and lingered for a few more last words. When they were gone she asked me who they were. I was sure only that they were people of mark. They were Samuel Rogers and Sir James Mackintosh. They had brought a bundle of Greek newspapers sent by Byron just before his death in the preceding April. Mrs. B. said, "They are a touching memorial; but I cannot read them; you would like, perhaps, to look into their contents; take them and tell me what you find." I retain a strong impression of my interest in studying them, but cannot remember how I returned them to the dear old lady. For I never saw her again, and I think her death occurred within a year. I was still a student at college. Were I now at the same age I should be tempted to conform to the Church of Scotland in the hope of meriting an appointment to your Greek Theological Scholarship.*

This sportive allusion to the temptation of subscription in order to obtain an appointment may have recalled to Professor Blackie the painful incident in his early life to which allusion has been made. Largely through his efforts the necessity of subscription for any Chair save that of theology had been long abolished, but for the Greek Theological Scholarship, which he had done so much to raise, and which was identified with his name, it was essential. How little such subscription was in accord with his views we may gather from some of his frank utterances; thus: "We retired to his rooms" (Dr. Appleton's) "after dinner, when I had an opportunity of hearing how ingeniously these gentlemen can justify the Athanasian Creed, and other dogmatic pedantries."† He had soon had enough of this, and left so abruptly, that Dr. Appleton sent a letter of explanation which followed him to London.

The lines which he wrote, when stirred by the persecution of Dr. Robertson Smith, express his feeling:—

> Why did Luther fling,
> His ban against the Pope and his misdeeds,
> If private judgment must be caged in creeds,
> Each free word gagged, and clipt each upward wing,
> And you with churchly ban and pulpit drum
> Strike Bible readers blind and prophets dumb?‡

Here also, in a sonnet contributed to the Scotsman, we have what he called his "Confession of Faith":—

> Creeds and Confessions! High Church or the Low?
> I cannot say; but you would vastly please us
> If with some pointed scripture you could show
> To which of these belonged the Saviour Jesus.
> I think to all or none; not curious creeds
> Or ordered forms of churchly rule He taught,
> But soul of love that blossomed into deeds,
> With human good and human blessing fraught.
> On me nor Priest nor Presbyter, nor Pope,
> Bishop, or Dean may stamp a party name;
> But Jesus, with his largely human scope,
> The service of my human life may claim.
> Let prideful priests do battle about creeds,
> The church is mine that does most Christ-like deeds.§

Far be it from us to attempt to do what Priest, Presbyter, Pope, Bishop, Dean would find impossible, and yet we may find in the life and utterances of John Stuart Blackie a powerful argument for the principle of non-subscription. For the rest, we may echo the exclamation of "a strict Calvinistic Celt," who said: "Blackie's neyther orthodox, haiterodox, nor ony ither dox; he's juist himsel'!"

A "HERETIC'S" IMPRESSIONS OF THE NORTH.

UNDER this title the Northern Star of March 3, published at Dingwall, devotes a column to the Rev. Alexander Webster's impressions of his recent lecturing tour in the North of Scotland, of which he told in our Provincial Letter of last week. "A Plea for Wider Thought" is a sub-title of this article, in which Mr. Webster tells his story for readers in the North. The library, Mr. Webster thinks, is going to be the illumination of the North, and will make a new Highlander. "It is the fountain of intellectual regeneration, and therefore it should be guarded in a wise and gracious spirit. Sectarian management of it would be sacrilege. To keep the modern spirit out of it would be an unpardonable offence." And then he goes on:—

"Whatever may come of my sowing of Unitarian seed, the protest against an exclusive library is effectually made. The books which the bigoted librarian rejected are now in the library, and may be read by all.

It appears to me that an extension of Protestantism is needed in the North. I am not sure about the logicality of the Celtic mind. I know it is mystical and romantic in its temperament, but I think it lacks logical grip. Had it been radically Protestant, it would have put all Creeds and Confessions away, and held to the Bible only. A Confession of Faith with a Declaratory Act giving relief over a dogma or two is a vain thing. The relief is too small and shallow. Entire relief from dogmatic coercion is needed. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." A creed is a restriction of thought, an arrest of belief, a mental bondage.

But the most radical need of the Highlands in religion is an enlightened understanding of the Bible. Judging by the volleys of texts fired at me, I find a lack of discernment in the use of the Bible. My questioners seemed to think it was enough to quote a text, no matter where from. That is an utter misuse of the Bible.

There are diversities of view in the Bible with the same spirit. The point of view of each writer requires to be got at. To quote indiscriminately from one book and another is to make confusion. A value-judgment is necessary, a principle whereby to distinguish between one view and another. The Bible is actually a library, representing various literary deposits, and should be treated as literature and read with analytic power. The courage of criticism is needed in reading it. But that courage has yet to be kindled in the Highlands. Above all, the supreme value of the teaching of Jesus needs to be acknowledged. I found an inbred tendency in the North to quote from Paul most readily. His ideas have taken deeper hold than those of Christ. His forensic phraseology rather than the simple and homely language of Jesus has become the common theological speech. This ought not so to be. A Christian should make Christ supreme. A study of the utterances of Jesus by themselves alone, with a discrimination between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel, is the thing most vitally needed in the North, as elsewhere. Such a study would show that Calvinism has no warrant from the teaching of Jesus, and that orthodoxy needs regeneration.

One thing puzzled me during my Northern tour. No clergyman crossed my path or appeared at any of my meetings. I wondered if the shepherds were on holidays. Not even on the golf course did I see one. Perhaps it was clerical diplomacy that kept them from meeting me. Why did not some of them challenge me face to face? I would have been glad to exchange cards, if not shots, with them. I trust that if they speak of Unitarianism in my absence it will be with truthfulness.

I thank the several laymen who expressed their hearty sympathy with my object in appearing in the North. Their kindness warmed the atmosphere, and made me feel that beneath the Northern snow there is a heart glowing with eagerness for the truth.

A PRAYER FOR SUNSHINE.

OUT of the mist and driving rain and cloud,
We cry to Thee. O Lord, the days are drear.
Send but one ray of light to pierce the shroud;
Let but one glimpse of blue in heaven appear.
So long our hands have laboured in the shade,
So long this darkness makes our hearts afraid.
God of the winter, now one grace accord;
Send us thy sunshine on the world, O Lord!

Out of the depths we cry. The world grows old
In hopeless-seeming struggle for the right;
Black clouds the sun of justice still enfold;
Thy people strive and weary for the light.
How long shall woe and sin our lives o'ershade?
How long shall error make our souls afraid?
Father of broken hearts, this grace accord;
Send now salvation on thy world, O Lord!

Sometimes 'mid rain and murk an hour is sent,
An hour of azure and of golden rays,
When budding twigs in measureless content
Dream sweetly of the far-off summer days;
And sometimes deeds are done on this sad earth
That promise her a new and radiant birth.
O God of sunshine and the shadowed past,
Send us thy summer on the world at last!

MANSFORD STREET CHURCH AND MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE fifteenth annual meeting of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, was held in the church on Wednesday evening, when there was a fair attendance of subscribers and friends and members of the congregation.

The Rev. HENRY GOW took the chair, and explained that to their great regret Mr. Stanton W. Preston, who was to have presided, had not felt equal to being present. Their treasurer, Miss L. Jones, had also been suddenly called away from home, and was unable to be present.

Mr. J. CLASSON DRUMMOND read the Committee's report:—

The report opened with a tribute to the ability and enthusiasm with which the Rev. John Ellis had thrown himself into the work of the church and mission, the various agencies being in a state of great efficiency, and with an expression of satisfaction at his election as a borough councillor. It welcomed the new departure which had been made, with the cordial co-operation of the authorities, by which students of Manchester College, Oxford, came to spend successive week ends at the mission to help in the work.

As to finance, it was noted that the small balance was due to special circumstances, including an unusual number of donations during the year, with one from Lady Durning-Lawrence specially for the repair of the organ, and that the actual income from subscriptions was about £150 less than the necessary expenses. A legacy of £500 had been received from the late Mrs. E. B. Squire, and Miss Eleanor Garrett had given a sum of £600 in memory of her sister, the late Miss E. J. Garrett, the income of which was to be spent under the direction of the committee for the relief of the very poor. Two memorials to Miss E. J. Garrett had been placed in the chapel, an altar cloth, worked by the members of her Young Women's Class, and a panel in opus sectile, by Mr. Henry Holiday, emblematic of charity, and subscribed for by personal friends. Reference was also made to the great interest taken by the late Dr. Brooke Herford in the Mission, and it was stated that the balance of the Corkran Memorial Fund had been spent in bookcases and other equipment of Blyth-street Hall for use as a reading room, and that donations of modern books would be very gratefully received.

Mr. DRUMMOND, in the absence of the treasurer, also read the statement of accounts, with a total expenditure of £455 14s. 5d., and a balance in hand of £6 8s. 11d. The annual subscriptions amounted to £259, donations £50, and special for the organ £60, collection at Rosslyn Hill Chapel £39 10s. 2d., grants from L.D.U.S. £25, and B. & F.U.A. £15.

Mr. W. J. CLARK read the report of the chapel committee giving a full account of the many activities centred in the misson, and noting the great need of more teachers and especially of men for the Sunday-school, where in the afternoon school there are 210 scholars on the books, and an average attendance (last quarter) of 145.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON presented a satisfactory chapel balance-sheet.

The Rev. JOHN ELLIS read his report and also emphasised the needs of bringing into the Sunday work "more helpers, especially men who are imbued with the spirit of religion and convinced of the value of our Gospel as a message for the times." He spoke of the valuable help rendered by students of Manchester

College, and offered to members of the Laymen's Club "a splendid field for their enthusiasm to influence their fellowmen for good by teaching, lectures, and popular services." He recorded the steady maintenance of the good work of the mission in its many branches and in the following paragraph noted a large amount of new work that had been taken up :—

The distinctly social side of our work has been immensely improved by the accession of fresh helpers since the autumn. Indeed, the evenings are so crowded that it is impossible to find room for another institution. Miss Punnett has taken charge of the Young Women's Circle on Wednesday evenings. Miss C. A. Lawrence is giving herself heartily to the work in connection with the Mission, not only on Sundays, but during week evenings. She conducts a sewing and drill class, and has started a Band of Mercy. Mrs. J. C. Drummond and Miss May Punnett have made themselves responsible for a singing class on Thursday evenings. Mrs. H. Thompson is doing splendidly with her boys' club on Wednesday evenings. Mr. J. C. Drummond and Mr. Punnett are endeavouring to organise a men's reading and debating society. Mr. P. F. Booth has charge of arrangements for the literary society, and three excellent meetings have already been held. Mr. E. Darlinson has revived the gymnasium, and Mr. S. Parker has the members of the Preston Club well in hand. Altogether, the social activity in connection with the Mission is eminently satisfactory. Amongst it all, I sometimes think we are tempted to neglect the higher aims of the church, and I should be glad to see, along with this social fellowship, a growing desire and distinct purpose to improve the mind and to deepen the religious life. Only in this way will our movement grow in power and influence. Religion—love to God and love to man—will alone sustain our best efforts, and the success of them will be measured by the production of an increasing number of men and women, of large minds, large hearts, and generous hands. My hope in this direction lies in the serious purpose of the Guild.

The report concluded with a word of earnest thanks to all helpers, and the aspiration "May God give us strength to do greater and better service in the coming days."

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the reports, dwelt on the splendid record of work, from which they must derive great encouragement, even while they felt the weight of the terrible amount of poverty and suffering around them which they could not touch. They must recognise that there was a spirit in those reports which was more effective than the special activities of the various agencies. He spoke with great satisfaction of the fresh strength brought to the work of the mission by the help of Manchester College students and of Mr. Ellis's election to the Borough Council. They must congratulate themselves on having such a man at the head of the mission, with practical organising power, one who had made himself felt as a strong man outside the immediate circle of their church. It was a great thing for the people of the district to know that they had a man working fearlessly for their best interests, with no axe of his own to grind, whose influence would make constantly for justice and purity in their common life. When Mr. Ellis spoke rather sadly of the difficulty of making the religious influence of their work felt, he did not, he was sure, forget the power of personal influence in all their varied social activities. No religious influence at the mission had been deeper than that of Miss Garrett, exercised by her simple presence and the sympathy which she had thrown into her devoted work among the people. For his own part, he believed more and more in that mission work as the greatest opportunity for doing good offered to a minister, and to the men and women who came down, week after week, often from great distances, to help. He did not think the helpers always realised how much inspiration they brought by their presence, and the simple desire to be of use. He wished they could get more help for the provident visiting, which Mr. Charles Booth had spoken of as one of the best, if not the best method of exerting personal influence in lifting up the lives of the poor. It was a great opportunity, and women especially were needed for the work, which brought them into close touch with the people. Often, he was sure, lives were saved by those who were able to take practical sympathy and wholesome advice to the poor ignorant women whose confidence they gained. It was no doubt hard work once a week in all weathers, and it meant patient self-sacrifice; but those who had some little time to give would find in the work opportunities for the highest influence.

Miss PUNNETT seconded the motion, and, speaking as one who had only recently become connected with the work of the mission, said that much of the good accomplished could not be measured by numbers or put into the words of a report. The impression of progress made by the record was full of hope for the future, and it was a great satisfaction to feel that they had a strong organiser at the centre. She spoke with warm appreciation of Mr. Ellis's cheerful courage, as a great help in the work, and of his high ideals.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

Mr. E. F. GRUNDY moved a resolution of confidence and satisfaction in the work accomplished, of thanks to Mr. Ellis for his able and untiring labours, with a pledge to promote the welfare of the mission by securing more subscriptions and fresh helpers. He expressed his deep interest in the work, and pointed to the many ways of help open. Appeal had been made for the active sympathy of the members of the Laymen's Club, which he hoped would bear fruit. To increase the subscription list was good, but the great thing was personal help.

Miss HELEN BROOKE HERFORD seconded and Mr. THOMAS ADAMS supported the motion which was cordially passed.

The Rev. JOHN ELLIS gratefully acknowledged the expressions of sympathy, which, he said, were a great help in that work, in which it was difficult sometimes not to be discouraged. He spoke of the difficulty of drawing people into the chapel services. He had found that among some of the best of their neighbours there was a feeling that it was discreditable to be associated with a church, because it meant they went there for what they could get. They must use every effort to counteract that impression, and make it felt that their one aim was to nourish what was highest and noblest in the life of the people. He was specially anxious to enlist the sympathy of the men, and he felt they had a great opportunity, if only they had more helpers. A neighbouring vicar had a Sunday afternoon "Bible-class" of a thousand men; something of that kind, he thought, they might do in their own church, if only a sufficient body of helpers would volunteer. A friend of theirs was about to establish a coffee tavern in that neighbourhood and had placed two bed-rooms at his disposal for the use of helpers who would come down for week-ends. He concluded with words of earnest thanks and encouragement to his many fellow-workers.

On the motion of Mr. C. F. PEARSON, seconded by the Rev. V. D. DAVIS, the committee and officers were elected, and a vote of thanks to the chair, moved by Mr. E. B. Squire and seconded by Mr. J. C. Drummond, brought the meeting to a close.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY:

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting was held at Essex Hall on Saturday evening, March 5. After an hour for refreshments and sociability, the chair was taken by Mr. John Harrison, the President.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD, as treasurer, presented the accounts, which showed an adverse balance of £19 2s. 8d., but he announced that Dr. Herbert Smith, president of the Laymen's Club, had written to say that the club hoped by means of an entertainment to be able to make that amount good.

Mr. ALEC BARNES, hon. secretary, read the committee's report, which showed that there were 20 affiliated schools with 286 teachers and 2,959 scholars, of whom 241 are over sixteen. Particulars as to the Southend Holiday Home were also given.

Mr. F. E. ALLEN presented the report as to the visiting of the schools, and Miss LAWRENCE read the report of the Country Holiday Movement; 412 children from 17 of their schools had been sent into the country, of whom 374 were under thirteen years of age. Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD read a gratifying report on the Southend Home.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the reports, said they were satisfactory on all points except in the matter of finance. He pleaded for greater interest on the part of delegates from the schools in the work of the committee.

The resolution was seconded by the Rev. J. TOYE and passed.

On the motion of Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD, seconded by the Rev. F. W. STANLEY, Mr. John Harrison was re-elected President, and the other officers and committee were also elected.

Miss C. A. LAWRENCE then read a paper on "The Use of the Bible in our Sunday-schools," in which she earnestly advocated the giving of the first place to Bible teaching in the schools, care being taken to make the lessons as interesting and helpful as possible, with ample illustrations. She urged that teachers ought to make the best possible use of the one lesson in the week, for which parents entrusted the children to their care; the lessons ought to be distinctly religious, and to that end she felt that the teaching of the Bible was the best.

The Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS also read a paper on the same subject, noting the deplorable ignorance of the Bible simply as literature, shown by many Unitarians, and discussion followed, in which Mr. F. W. Turner, the Rev. F. W. Stanley, Mr. Thompson, and the President took part.

Votes of thanks brought a successful meeting to a close, more than a hundred being present.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT.

THE summons to write a provincial letter on Liverpool and District affairs came at short notice; and so this letter can have no pretensions either to chronological accuracy or to a generous fulness of content.

Beginning with the events of this winter—beyond which, indeed, the memory runneth not back—the advent of the Rev. R. P. Farley as missionary to the Liverpool District Missionary Association must receive our first attention.

This primary notice is due not only to priority in point of time, but also, and mainly, to the fact that in the work of the Association the common interests of all the congregations are focussed. Mr. Farley came amongst us at the end of September; and we are all sure that the high opinions, so spontaneously expressed, of his tutors at Manchester College, Oxford, will be borne out by our practical experience. New iron churches have been opened at Garston and St. Helens, and Mr. Farley has now the responsibility of providing for three regular Sunday evening services, at Widnes, St. Helens, and Garston, in addition to a morning children's service and afternoon school at Garston. This would, of course, be quite impossible without the ready help of a fine band of lay preachers, which includes three ladies.

But many of us think that St. Helens is ready to respond to the energies of a missionary, whose headquarters should be there. Is there no student who would consider it a valuable experience to serve even for a minimum wage, for even a year, in this work? I am confident that no better practical training is possible than this of probationary missionary experience. A knowledge of needs and men and methods is acquired which, as a general ground for ministerial culture, is, in my opinion, unequalled by any attachment as assistant to an individual church. A man is thereby enabled to prove himself, and gauge and extend his powers; whilst the sense of the efficacy of his gospel for the rational and spiritual solution of many a doubter's fears, will not only strengthen his own soul, but will render him a missionary in spirit all the years of his life.

A plan for increasing the scope and efficiency of the Association, by bringing in all the churches of the district, whether aided or not, is to be proposed at the annual meeting on the 19th inst. at the Ancient Chapel. A goodly muster may serve to show our Evangelical Bishop that, though in darkness, we earnestly desire life both for ourselves and for others.

I chanced to be the representative to welcome the Rev. and Mrs. C. Harvey Cook to Warrington in the name of the District Association and of the ministers. There was a hearty goodwill apparent in the large gatherings. The interested outsider could not help being amused and struck by the insistent dwelling of the speakers on one note. Other churches always had designs upon their Warrington ministers. Nor did the spokesmen of the congregation care to dwell upon the implied flattery to their powers of knowing a good man when they saw and heard him. The lament was that their lamb was always needed in other pastures. Several pairs of distant ears should have reddened; if telepathy is of any account.

Though considerably later in time, mention must be made here of the other accessions to our local ministerial ranks. Mr. Hawkes and I were fortunate enough to be present at the congregational meeting at Southport to welcome the Rev. and Mrs. F. B. Mott. There appears to be a wealth of men of power at Southport; and the meeting was a fine tribute to the faithful work of our dear friend, Mr. Wellbeloved.

Mr. Mott has evidently gained an American buoyancy and humour; and though one discovered no trace of the additional hope of Mr. Hawkes, that "there might be a slight American accent," we may rest assured that the Transatlantic experience of Mr. and Mrs. Mott will be most valuable in their new English charge.

The account in THE INQUIRER of last week of the bright evening at Ullet-road to welcome the Rev. and Mrs. J. Collins Odgers, was so graphic and true, that there is only left for me to remark on the abundance of young life that has been visible at Ullet-road since the opening of the beautiful Church Hall. Some of the congregation wondered what they would ever be able to do with their new building; but I conclude that no such anxiety for possible utilities exists now. The modest remark of the chairman that "the building was too good for them" is easily complemented by the observation that it is a perennial fount of æsthetic satisfaction to all their visitorss. Well might Mr. Odgers say that he was afraid his fellow ministers would envy him his material environment. Tacitly, no doubt, but very naturally he would except the Hope-street ministers!

The hopes of the Liverpool district go out to our new ministers. They are of us all, as well as being of their congregations; and there is every sign that our common life will be aided by them, whilst, in return, we trust that they also may be quickened by contact with the larger sphere of local community. If the district looks with large hope to Ullet-road Church the reason is that it is happily endowed with the power of being a giver of good gifts.

As I write (March 1), I hear that the Rev. Charles Craddock has accepted the invitation of the congregation worshipping in the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, to be their minister, and will begin his ministry on Sunday, the 13th inst. This happy announcement precludes me from writing about our translated friend, Mr. Jupp, and the character of the devoted congregation he gathered around him. The word "personality," written of the late minister, and "eclectic" and "inclusive" of the congregation, must now suffice. We understand that Mr. Jupp is possessed of the sweet certainty that the woods of Croham Hurst are better than all the parks of Liverpool; but all that is allowed us to say is, that we will temper our regrets at his departure, if the loss to Liverpool is a just indication of the gain to Croydon.

To Mr. Craddock we extend our heartiest welcome. Formerly a Congregationalist minister, for two years he has been in the wilderness of Arabia. Some of us have met him as he was taking the services at the Ancient Chapel during the month of January; to most of us he is yet a stranger. But we can assure him and Mrs. Craddock that they have our warmest feeling of fellowship.

I hope it will be perceived by my readers that this bit of good news has disturbed the course of my remarks. I had had it in mind, amongst other matters, to record the very earnest meeting the other Saturday of our Postal Mission, when Mr. Harvey-Cook was the chief speaker, and the audience became convinced that Warrington had brought into our midst a man upon whom something of the mantle of his old friend, the late minister of the "Ancient," had fallen.

The energetic minister of Bootle, Mr. Mills, who has lost nothing of his former Methodistic initiative and resource, planned, and has most successfully carried through, a scheme of four Sunday evening sermons on "Religion and Life," "Religion and Labour," "Religion and Theology," "The Religion of the Future." I trust not to overwhelm the special preachers with work if I say that they were Messrs. Harvey-Cook, C. Peach, R. Travers Herford, and R. A. Armstrong. I understand that the congregations were excellent, not to say "full"; for were not little biographies of the preachers printed in the church calendar, and specially distributed throughout the locality? Mr. Herford, too, was not yet known to fame as the author of "Christianity in Talmud and Midrash."

It is with peculiar pleasure that I am able to state, in answer to many questions I receive about Mr. Armstrong—that on Sunday morning at Hope-street Church he preached a vigorous sermon, diluted only by sweetness and charity, upon "The Darkness of Unitarianism," and in the evening an extempore sermon at Bootle Free Church.

In making my way lately into the rural scenes of Wirral, I noticed effective posters announcing the Rev. James Crossley as giving a course of sermons on "The Germs of the Creeds"; but I have not heard of the public response. I only know that the new church, with its beautiful interior, must be of great aid to Mr. Crossley, and the Birkenhead Congregation.

The ceremony at Chester of unveiling the memorial tablet to the memory of Major Bryan Johnson, behind his accustomed seat, must have been moving to his former fellow-worshippers, and has evoked much sympathy from the good Major's many friends, who hold him so dearly in remembrance.

H. D. ROBERTS.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The seventh annual sermons were preached last Sunday, in the morning and afternoon, by the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, and in the evening by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. Collections, £10 16s. 10d.

Colne.—In connection with the Ladies' Guild, a pleasant evening was spent on Saturday, March 5. Musical and literary selections were rendered by representatives of various other churches of the town, which were greatly enjoyed by a good audience.

Darlington.—After morning service on Sunday the congregation of the Unitarian Church unanimously adopted a resolution protesting against the introduction of indentured Chinese labour into the Transvaal.

Dover.—On Tuesday, March 1, the Rev. F. K. Freeston delivered an able and interesting lecture, under the auspices of the Provincial Assembly at Adrian-street Church, on Dr. Joseph Priestley. The lecture was illustrated by some unique and beautiful slides.

Horwich.—On Tuesday evening the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal, gave the last of three lectures on "Evolution and Religion" in the school to an audience that quite filled the room. His visits have been most successful. From four to five hundred persons have been in attendance. Last Sunday evening the Rev. R. C. Moore began a series of sermons for the month, under the title, "What Evolution Leaves with us." A large congregation listened to his interpretation of "The Larger Thought of God."

Kilmarnock: A Masonic Service.—Sectarian distinctions in Kilmarnock have, for once, been obliterated. On Sunday evening last the four lodges of Freemasons in the town held a church parade, and assembled in Clerk's-lane Free Christian Church, where the Rev. A. Irvine Innes (who will shortly leave for America) preached an appropriate sermon on "The Architect's Workers."

London (Brixton).—The congregation of Effra-road Church, being desirous of marking in permanent form their sense of the kindly and faithful services of their late treasurer, Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, continued during a period of eighteen years, have presented to him an address, expressing their gratitude for his unswerving efforts when in office, and for his generosity in presenting to a new body of trustees, with an open trust, the reversion of the freehold of the ground on which the church building stands. The address, signed by every member, having been handsomely illuminated and framed, was presented to Mr. Nettlefold at his residence, Streatham-grove, on Saturday, March 5, by a small deputation. All Mr. Nettlefold's friends regret his enforced seclusion, and trust that before very long he may be seen amongst them again in restored health.

London: Essex Church.—The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is announced to preach at Essex Church at to-morrow's evening service.

London: Stratford.—On Wednesday and Thursday, March 2 and 3, the members of the Young People's Guild gave performances of the operetta "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," adapted from Grimm's well-known fairy tale, and set to music by George F. Root. In spite of the inclement weather audiences of about 100 and 130 were present. A short concert preceded the play. There was a repetition of the performance on the Friday for the Band of Hope, when about 200 were present. The play was a great success.

Maidstone.—On Wednesday, March 2, the annual school winter treat took place. Mr. M. A. Ruck presided, and distributed the prizes and medals. Mr. Moseley expressed the thanks of the congregation to Miss Ellis and the teachers for their devoted labours in connection with the school and its institutions, and to all the workers who had helped in the preparations for the gathering; and the Rev. S. S. Brettell conveyed the thanks of the meeting to Mr. Ruck for his services in the chair and for his work as treasurer of the Sunday-school. A very successful entertainment followed, in which teachers, scholars, and friends took part. A sale of work which was held during the evening realised a useful sum.

Manchester District Association.—The monthly visit was paid on Saturday last to Chorlton. The religious service was conducted by the Rev. Ambrose Bennett, with sermon by the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, from Matt. xi. 28. The evening meeting took the form of a conference, the Rev. Priestley Prime treating, exhaustively, the subject of "The Influence of a Church upon the District." Mr. Hillier, Mr. Piggott, the Rev. James Ruddle, Mrs. Hillier, Mr. Law, and the Rev. J. A. Pearson discussed the subject. In his opening remarks the President, Mr. Percy H. Leigh, spoke of Chorlton as one of the Forward Movement Churches and congratulated the congregation on its own steady forward movement. The music and singing were very good, and the memory of the hearty praise will long linger with some who were present. In the evening the organist played an admirable organ solo. The next visit is to Altrincham on April 16.

Manchester: Moss Side.—With a view to the more complete equipment of the new Church which was opened between two and three years ago, the congregation has recently had a new organ built by Jardine & Co., of Manchester, at a cost of £650. The opening ceremony took place on Saturday evening, February 27, when a recital was given by Mr. Thomas Sharple, Mus.Bac., F.R.C.O., L.R.A.M., who brought out all the powers of the instrument in a most effective manner. The organ has three manuals. In the great organ there are nine stops; in the swell organ twelve stops; in the choir organ six stops; and in the pedal organ three stops. It has six couplers, and nine double-action composition pedals. The expert criticism on the instrument is of a very satisfactory character.

Manchester: Pendleton.—On Sunday, March 6, there were large and enthusiastic congregations morning and evening, when Rev. Neander Anderton, B.A., commenced his duties as minister. The subject of the morning discourse was "A Worshipful Congregation," in which the worship of God, fellowship, and communion were urged as the central objects of congregational life. The evening discourse was on "Our Outlook," the text being Exodus xiv. 15: "Speak to the children of Israel, that they go forward." The principles for which the Unitarian Church of to-day stands were clearly set forth. The central objects and the great helpfulness of congregational life were stated with force and eloquence. The reasons for hopefulness and courage and confidence in the future of Unitarian and Free Christian Religion in the crisis which is not far distant, and is already hanging over creed-bound churches, were urged. The services were pervaded by a spirit of deep religious fervour. This church, which has been without resident minister since August, 1902, now looks forward to a brighter future. The lighting has been improved, the seats newly cushioned throughout, and a new set of the Essex Hall Hymnal has been substituted for the older "Martineau."

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—A popular form of evening service was introduced here on Sunday last. The service consisted very largely of musical items rendered by an orchestral band of nearly forty performers and an enlarged choir of about a similar number. The church was well filled, and the congregation joined heartily in the singing and paid great attention to the address, which dealt with some of our fundamental teachings in religion. It is proposed to continue these services monthly at present, and later to hold them regularly every Sunday evening.

Merthyr Tydfil: Religious Services for the People.—The Unitarians of Merthyr and District are indebted to the B. and F. U. A. for the opportunity afforded them of bringing the glad news of Unitarian Christianity before the public in a manner never attempted before in this part of the country. Diligent preparations have been made by the local committee of the three congregations for holding a series of four popular services in the Theatre Royal, on Sunday evenings in the present month. The preachers engaged for the series are:—Revs. John Page Hopps (March 6 and 13), James C. Street (March 20), and V. D. Davis (March 27). A circular bearing the portraits of the two veteran preachers, Revs. John Page Hopps and James C. Street, a motto by Page Hopps, and "A Plea for Unitarian Christianity," by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, has been widely circulated in Merthyr, Cefn-Coed and Dowlais. Ten thousand copies have been distributed from door to door. This circular is an adaptation of the one used by the Newcastle friends. Large placards calling attention to the services were also posted on the hoardings. The result of the first service on March 6 has fully justified expectations. By 8 p.m. a large audience had gathered in the theatre, there being 800 to 1,000 people present. The service was simple but as conducted by Mr. Hopps it was wonderfully impressive, his reading of passages from Isaiah xl. being particularly fine. The audience was quiet, orderly, and attentive. The subject of the address was: "God in Christ, and God in Us." Mr. Hopps began by disclaiming belief in Jesus as "a mere man." He did not like the phrase as applied to human beings. He believed in Jesus as much more than an ordinary man; but could not express in words the kind of being he believed him to be. He knew that he was a true Son of God—so far all sects and parties agreed. There is a passage in the Bible of the truth of which he was convinced: "God was in Christ, reconciling the world to Himself." All churches agreed that God was in Christ. Mr. Hopps would go further and say that God was in every man, even the poorest kind, to some extent, that is, every man has as much of God in him as his nature is able to receive. It is when the churches dogmatise that difference of opinion comes in: when they insist that God is a Trinity in Unity: three persons in one God: when they insist on dogma as essential, it is then that harm is done to religious faith. He said that the progressive spirits in all the churches are tired of dogma, and impatient to get at the central truth at the heart of all religion. He spoke of the God "in whom we live and move and have our being," the unknown almighty Cause to whom all nations, and men of all creeds have directed their prayers, and in whom they have steadfastly believed. God is in all things: not only in men but in all nature: in the field of corn and the apples in the orchard. If these last could speak, they too would say, "We rejoice in the God in whom we live and move, and have our being." The keynote of the address was to be found in "the thought of God" as expressed in Hosmer's hymn sung during the evening:—

> One thought I have, my ample creed,
> So deep it is and broad,
> And equal to my every need—
> It is the thought of God.

A remarkable feature of the service was the way in which the preacher made every portion of it contribute to the effect of the whole: hymn, prayer, readings, address had in them "the thought of God." This was the dominant note throughout. The singing of "Nearer, my God, to Thee" by the large audience at the close was very effective. Mr. Hopps conducted the morning service at the Unitarian Chapel, Thomas-street, and preached an impressive sermon on the Doctrine of Election, choosing for his text: "Many are called, but few are chosen." There was a good congregation present to welcome the veteran preacher.

Mossley.—Special services were conducted in the Christian Church on Sunday by the Rev. V. D. Davis, when very good congregations assembled, and on the following evening Mr. Davis attended a public meeting in the chapel, as representative of the B. & F.U.A., when addresses were also given by the Revs. H. Enfield Dowson, J. A. Pearson, and W. C. Hall. The chair was taken by the Rev. T. R. Elliott, and, on the motion of Mr. Wm. Lawton, seconded by Mr. John Gledhill, a cordial vote of thanks to the speakers and the Association and the chairman was passed.

Newcastle-on-Tyne: Church of the Divine Unity.—Under the auspices of the Unity Literary Society, the Rev. Charles Travers, of Carlisle, gave the first of a series of three lectures on Thursday evening, March 3. The lectures deal with Mr. Travers' visits to Italy, and are illustrated by a series of beautiful pictures, collected and photographed by himself, and give some realistic representations of Ancient and Modern Italy. On Sunday, March 6, Mr. Travers conducted the services at Unity Church, Gateshead, his evening subject being "A page from Nunquam's 'God and my Neighbour.'" The second lecture was given in Unity Church, on Monday evening, when the pictures shown were entirely different. This lecture was repeated at Unity Church, South Shields, on the Tuesday evening following.

Portsmouth.—On behalf of the John Pound's Mission, a successful sacred concert was given in High-street Chapel, on Wednesday, February 24, by a volunteer choir from orthodox churches.

The programme included selections from Handel Mendelssohn, Gounod, &c., and the music was much enjoyed. On Wednesday, March 2, the congregation held a tea meeting in honour of the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, of Liverpool, who had occupied the pulpit during the last four Sundays. After tea, a good audience in the chapel was both delighted and instructed by Mr. Hawkes' charming "Talk about Japan," illustrated by lantern slides painted by native artists. Mr. Hawkes' description of the beautiful country, and the people—praising them for their politeness and thoroughness of character—and his reference to the privilege he had enjoyed, in conjunction with American friends, in starting a liberal religious movement on Unitarian lines in Tokio—these and other matters of interest furnished recollections which will not soon be forgotten.

Tavistock.—On Wednesday week the Rev. J. Barron lectured in the Abbey Chapel on "Islam, the Religion of the Divine Unity," being the fourth in a series of lectures on various religions of the world.

Wakefield.—As a fitting close to the various activities of the winter months, the "Elijah" was rendered last Sunday afternoon at Westgate Chapel, with principals of high repute in the profession, and a chorus of eighty-five voices. In spite of unfavourable weather the chapel was crowded to the utmost, and the music was such as to call forth enthusiastic praise. The collection was sufficient to cover the somewhat heavy expenses, and to leave a balance for the choir fund. In the evening there was a musical service, with an address on "The Harp and the Organ," by the Rev. Andrew Chalmers. A gratifying feature in the day's proceedings was the help readily given by members of the choirs of orthodox churches, about forty excellent singers giving their services gratuitously. The past season has been one of prosperous and useful work in the congregation, while the Sunday-school has not had for several years so able and devoted a band of teachers or so many promising young people.

THE Rev. F. B. Meyer has taken a leading part in the general protest of the religious public against the introduction of indentured Chinese labour into the South African gold mines. He was one of the first to sound the battle-cry. He has the courage of his convictions, and undeterred by fear of the charge that he is making the pulpit political, he has invited Dr. Macnamara to speak from the pulpit at Christchurch, Westminster, on this subject. It is a sound precedent, for this is an evil of many aspects, and one that can usefully be treated alike by preacher, politician, and labour leader.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from J. W. A., A. B., E. H. C., E. D., W. H. D., M. C. G., H. A. R. J., J. M. M., J. R., V. R. S., A. W., F. W.

THE

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION HYMN AND TUNE BOOK.

Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged.

Price 2s. 6d. net. Postage 4d.

The fact that a fourth edition of the HYMN AND TUNE BOOK has been called for is sufficient evidence that the action of the Committee of the Sunday School Association in publishing such a work has been amply justified. Opportunity has been taken to add to this new edition some 20 Tunes, so as to make the volume available for the two Hymn Books issued by the Association, namely Hymns for Heart and Voice and The Sunday School Hymn Book.

Through all the Seven Ages of Man is a sustaining and invigorating influence— a Perfect food Beverage—from infancy to Old Age.

To the INFANT it brings comfort and nourishment; to the GROWING BOY strength and muscular development; to the YOUTH hardihood for studies and exercise; to the YOUNG MAN vigour for the strenuous battle of life; to the MAN OF MIDDLE AGE solid force and continued activity; and to the OLD MAN a hale and hearty evening of life.

HEALTH says: "CADBURY's Cocoa has in a remarkable degree, those natural elements of sustenance which give the system endurance and hardihood, building up muscle and bodily vigour with a steady action that renders it a most acceptable and reliable beverage."

GUY'S HOSPITAL GAZETTE says: "CADBURY's Cocoa may be considered the highest type of a pure Cocoa, and from practical experience we can say it is most tempting to the palate, possesses high nutritive power, and is a great restorer of muscular activity."

Cadbury's Cocoa—ABSOLUTELY PURE THEREFORE BEST.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT
By PROFESSOR A. JÜLICHER.
Translated by JANET PENROSE WARD.

In this work Professor Jülicher gives an account—first, of each separate document of the New Testament, going into such questions as authorship, date, and the circumstances under which it was written; next, of the gradual rise of the canon; and, lastly, of the main features of Textual History. His standpoint throughout is that of the free historical inquirer.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AT this time of year reports of the annual meetings of the District Associations and other societies come crowding in, and it is impossible to give as much space to each as we should wish. The annual meeting of the Manchester Domestic Mission, held on Tuesday in the Lord Mayor's Parlour, we must report next week, and also that of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission at Horwich last Saturday. There will be also reports of the Manchester District and Liverpool Associations, which are meeting to-day.

IN our present issue will be found the address given by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong at the dedication of a memorial tablet to the late Rev. John Hamilton Thom, in the Chapel of the Liverpool Domestic Mission. The Mission was founded at a meeting in Renshaw-street Chapel on Good Friday, 1836. On Good Friday this year the Manchester District Sunday-school Association is to hold its annual meeting in Liverpool, when members and friends will have the opportunity of seeing not only the beautiful Ullet-road Church, where the central window in the chancel is a memorial to Mr. Thom, but the splendid buildings of the Domestic Mission in Mill-street, where the chapel has just been enriched not only by this further memorial, but by some striking decorative Della Robbia plaques, the gift of Mr. Walter Holland.

AT the first meeting of the newly elected London County Council on Tuesday Mr. J. W. Benn, one of the "Old Guard" of the first Council of 1889, was elected chairman. A letter was read from the Board of Education, approving of the Council's scheme for the constitution of the Committee, which is to administer education in the Metropolis. The Committee will be selected from the Council itself, with the addition of five women, who will be co-opted; and the further addition, for a period of two years, of five members of the expiring School Board. It is satisfactory to know that London is to be spared the representation of ecclesiastical and other "interests." It is a partial victory for the principle of public control—a principle which will require considerable extension before the Education question is settled.

IT is formally announced that "it is His Majesty's pleasure not to disallow the Labour Importation Ordinance." This, it is explained, amounts to a definite sanction of the Ordinance, the final clause of which declares that it Shall not take effect unless and until the Governor shall proclaim in the Gazette that it is His Majesty's pleasure not to disallow the same, and thereafter it shall come into operation upon such a date as the Governor shall notify by proclamation.

The date of this proclamation is, however, uncertain. The Royal "sanction" was accompanied by the announcement that the Ordinance could not be brought into operation "for the present." Officials have to be appointed and further arrangements made with the Chinese Government under the Treaty of Peking. The agitation against the Ordinance must not and will not cease, however, even when that instrument is in full force. With the fall of the present Government, which may come at any time, the Ordinance will, of course be promptly repealed, but for the honour of England the demand must be made of the present Government for its withdrawal. To-day's great demonstration in Hyde Park will make it plain to ministers that their hurried announcement will not stop the opposition to their policy, and every day brings news of similar condemnations from all parts of the country and the Empire.

THE negotiations over the execution of the reform schemes in Macedonia continue to drag on their weary way without any sign that they are reaching a successful conclusion. A fortnight ago the Porte announced that it could not consent to the European officers of the reconstructed gendarmerie being given the power to dismiss their Turkish subordinates, and last week there was talk of a surrender on this point provided the Sultan would promise to make such dismissals himself! So long as this farce of assuming the Sultan's bona fides, and preserving his authority continues, no progress whatever will be made. Surely Lord Lansdowne must realise by now that the time has come, the possibility of which he professed last month to foresee, when the ineffective Austro-Russian reform scheme must be brushed aside, and the sovereignty of Macedonia definitely put into commission under unfettered European control.

A GREAT demonstration, organised by the United Kingdom Alliance, the Church of England Temperance Society, the National Temperance Federation, and the Consultative Temperance Committee of the Free Churches, was held at Exeter Hall on Tuesday, when both afternoon and evening the following resolution was unanimously passed with the most determined enthusiasm:—

That this National Conference enters its solemn protest against the Government proposal to abridge or fetter the salutary power so long possessed by justices of refusing, on public grounds, the grant of licences by way of renewal; and calls upon all persons without distinction of party to unite in the most strenuous opposition to such reactionary proposals.

"The licensing magistrates," said the Hon. A. H. Hibbert, who presided at the afternoon Conference, "are the only safeguard left between the public and the publican; and we are here to protest against any attempt to fetter their hands by a highly organised trade whose only idea of a nation's welfare is their war-cry, 'Our trade, our politics'!" And Sir Wilfred Lawson, who supported the resolution, declared that the real question was whether the liquor traffic should rule this country, or this country rule the liquor traffic. A petition to Parliament, in the sense of this resolution, is being circulated by the National Unitarian Temperance Association, with an appeal to Ministers to bring the matter before their congregations. At the same time a memorial to licensing justices against the employment of barmaids in public-houses is being promoted.

THE annual meeting of the Women's Local Government Society was held at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, on Wednesday afternoon. Lady Trevelyan, who presided, spoke of the growing need of women's work on Borough and Education Councils, and of the admirable work women had done on School Boards. Miss Louisa Twining, who is the new president, spoke of the great opportunity for women in workhouse administration, and strongly urged the appointment of women workhouse inspectors.

THE gathering of Evangelical Churches at Newcastle, which, by its determination to include the whole world of politics in the religious sphere recalls the great days of Nonconformity, has been held and dissolved. The members will have taken with them to some thousands of places memories of high eloquence and enthusiasm. One most impressive event of the week was a night rally at closing time in order to arrest for an hour the frequenters of the public-houses of the town. It fittingly sets forth the strenuous resolve of the Federation to be up and doing, alike for the personal needs of the individual and the common welfare of the society in and through which we have to discover our more complete manhood.

"THE Coarsening of National Ideals" was the subject to be dealt with by Dr. John Watson. There are not wanting such hopeful signs as the increasing strength of the collective idea. But, on the whole, Dr. Watson's outlook was dark as he surveyed the new slavery, the debasement of sport, the growth of luxury, which even invades the student life; the exodus from the villages, the glamour of the music-halls, and, what he connects with this, the stunted physique of a population living in conditions injurious both to mind and body. For all this, the speaker is ready to contemplate the battle between social tyrannies and the Kingdom of God with faith in the Gospel and confidence in the result.

THAT was a spirited letter which was read in the Police Court at Leeds from the Rev. W. Hookins, President of the Methodist New Connexion Conference, who was summoned for non-payment of a portion of the poor rate. He wrote:—"The measure of progress has been the measure of resistance to bad laws. I will not acknowledge the sanction the law gives in this case. The Act justifies clerics in thousands of public schools in teaching the children that my faith and that of my fellow Free Churchmen is heresy; that they, the scholars, sin by entering sanctuaries where they were baptized, and where their parents were united in matrimony, and now to that insult they add the outrage of compelling me on Tuesday next to pay for the perpetuation of that cruel wrong." The first sentence of our question is not an axiom to be accepted entirely without examination or modification. And one would hope that the extremes suggested in the sentences that follow are seldom realised in the actual working of the schools. Still the earnestness of Nonconformity in this matter, and the reality of its grievance, are admirably presented in the letter.

THE Wesleyans have opened a training college for evangelists, teachers, candidates for the ministry, and other workers. It is known as Cliff College, and is situated in the Peak district. Forty-three students from different classes in society—farmers, artisans, clerks, &c.—have taken up their residence for the first term of seventeen weeks. An inaugural address was given to students and friends by Dr. J. H. Moulton, of Didsbury, who urged the necessity of intellectual as well as spiritual equipment for the study of the Bible. It is said that of the students about one-third are in training as candidates for the ministry, the others as local preachers and evangelists.

WE noticed in these columns some months ago a new departure in missionary enterprise. It now appears from an interview with Mr. Walker, the promoter, which is published in the Examiner, that the Papuan Industries, Limited, is actually being started with a capital of £50,000. It is Mr. Walker's object to show the natives that it is possible to be both a Christian and a trader, a thing which they have hitherto thought to be impossible; to afford an opening to an industrial life for Christian converts, and in this way to check the dying out of the savage race in contact with European civilisation. It is interesting to know that this attempt to moralise commerce as well as to Christianise individuals is being made in regions so remote as Uganda, India, and Australasia.

THE Primitive Methodists, like the Wesleyans, find their denominational periodicals a difficulty. All their magazines except the Christian Messenger show a decreased circulation. The constant succession of experiments in the way of little magazines among our own churches are illustrations of a difficulty felt by nearly or quite all the Christian Churches.

WHEN the leaf buds unfold and the birds think of nesting, the mind of the tramp begins to stir within him, and turns from the dark places of the city where he has spent the winter of his discontent to the open road and the village alehouse. The vagrant spirit prepares itself for the fortunes and misfortunes of a long unrespected summer holiday, oblivious of the fact that his case and his welfare are exciting the consideration of philanthropic people. It might be valuable, and certainly would be entertaining, if we could hear the criticisms of the vagabonds on the various schemes for their compulsory improvement. Possibly, however, as they are not for the most part close students of contemporary politics, they are not aware of the interest they are arousing; it is also not improbable that they would decline to co-operate in the designs, e.g., of Colonel Lamb.

COLONEL LAMB is an officer of the Salvation Army. He is anxious to see a large extension of the Hadleigh Colony policy, under philanthropic auspices where possible, but also under County Councils and Boards of Guardians. But the essential point is the power of detention. Colonel Lamb would make admission possible either on the personal application of the vagrant, or on conviction before a magistrate; he would detain the first class for a year or less, the second, for any period from two to five years. Now five years' penal servitude, even in a philanthropic institution, seems a heavy penalty for a rather undefined offence. The Colonel evidently finds it natural to think in lustres of years. But apart from the lordly breadth of his plans, there is a great deal to be said for a power of detention of those who will not work. The mischief of this Salvation Army plan, and of many others that are flying about, is to be found in their confusion of two classes of the unemployed. Nothing effectual will or can be done to compel the lazy until the claims are recognised of the large and deserving class of men who are quite ready to work for a reasonably adequate wage. It cannot be too often repeated that the self-respecting working man will not, and ought not, to submit to "Army" conditions which are only suited to men who have lost their self-respect.

WE published a note last week based upon a letter from Mr. Richard Bell, M.P., of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, in the Times of March 7, dealing with the comparative statistics of accidents to shunters on British and American railways, showing a great decrease in the rate of American accidents, owing to the adoption by State enforcement of automatic couplings, and by contrast casting reflection on English inventive capacity or humanity. To last Saturday's Times Mr. Edwin A. Pratt, author of a recent work on American railways, contributed an elaborate letter, pointing out the fallacies of Mr. Bell's argument. In comparing statistics of accidents in the two countries, Mr. Pratt points out that the different conditions of traffic must be borne in mind. One must not judge only by the relative proportion of accidents to men employed, for "the complexities of railway traffic on this side of the Atlantic are far greater than is the case on the other side, with the result that the amount of necessary coupling and uncoupling is much greater here in proportion to the business done than is the case in the United States." He also shows that in the British statistics a large number of minor accidents are included, which are ignored in the American returns, while as regards automatic coupling, it leads to other forms of accident, unknown in this country, and is by no means shown as yet to be a desirable improvement of method. Mr. Pratt's letter contains the following significant passage:—

Then Mr. Bell, in referring to the very substantial decrease in the number of accidents to railway men in the United States which has followed the introduction there of safety appliances, makes invidious comparisons with the British railways because they do not show a decrease equally great in their own number of accidents. But it is to their credit, rather than otherwise, that such should be the case, and for this reason. When the use of automatic couplers was enforced in the United States the railways were conducted with such disregard for human life that the casualties attained to proportions which have never had any parallel in this country. Consequently the compulsory use of almost any safety appliance, whether perfect or imperfect, was bound to effect good results, and those results, spread over a series of years, may well appear to be proportionately greater than any corresponding decrease in accidents in a country which had no such abnormal casualty lists to start with

. . . . What is actually happening in the United States is that in regard to the safety of human life in the operation of their lines, the railways of that country are now gradually reaching the point that was attained by the railways of Great Britain years ago. What makes their present rate of progress in these matters appear greater than our own is simply the fact that they had so much to make up for.

IN last week's Examiner a most interesting correspondence on "Unitarians and Christ" was closed by a final letter from the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, who had written in the issue of Feb. 25, objecting to a statement of a writer "Servus Servorum," on Feb. 11, that Unitarians "have no Divine Christ to compel obedience, but only a Jesus," and that "their own judgment becomes the dominant authority in their lives." Mr. Thomas asserts, on the contrary, that "All Unitarians I know believe profoundly in the Divinity of Christ," an expression certainly liable to misunderstanding; and in his final letter he explains it as meaning that he believes in the manifestation of God in Christ, as in Humanity and in Nature, and further elucidates the doctrine of the supreme inward authority in religion. Some passages from this correspondence we propose to reprint next week.

REFERRING to our leading article on the Bible Society's Centenary, a correspondent asks what the attitude should be of those who believe that criticism has had "results," which must count—"in other words, are we who possess the Bible of A.D. 1904 justified in co-operating with those whose whole energies are devoted to the circulation of the Bible of A.D. 1804?"

In its pamphlets the Society tells us that "all our foreign Missions," eight hundred colporteurs, and more than six hundred bible-women are engaged in the work of circulation. So far might we rejoice. But when we reflect that this "circulation" is secondary to belief and teaching that this Book is not only Scriptures but Holy Scriptures, not only Holy Scriptures, but The Holy Scriptures; in other words, that a whole theological system is involved in the Society's method of distribution—in this we cannot rejoice or wish God-speed.

The Guardian raised an objection to the work of the Society similar to that of our correspondent, though from a very different, point of view, rejoicing indeed that the Scriptures were so widely disseminated, but regretting the tone of the propaganda, which upheld the Book as supreme, without regard to the authority of the Church. On the other hand, it is something to the good that the Society has now taken up the Revised Version to be circulated, as well as the Old.

THE monthly magazine of the Swansea Unitarian Church, with the title The Free Point of View in Theology and Religion, has in its February number an address to its readers by the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, who has now been for five years minister of the church. As Unitarians, Mr. Jones declares, they have chosen the most difficult path in religion;

We have made the path difficult by believing more in a God of the Present than of the Past, but in doing this we have placed ourselves in the great religious current which is moving over the Western World to-day.

And then he adds an earnest reminder that religion is a matter not only of individual but of collective life, and that all must co-operate together for the great ends of the higher life. Unitarian Christianity must be their common ground, the simple religion of Jesus Christ.

It is a recognition of the spiritual element in man's nature—an element other than his own narrow self, an element which struggles, mounts, and conquers, and thus unites itself more and more with the very essence of the Universe—God.

The same number of the magazine contains the article on Professor Eucken, of Jena, which we recently published, and for the March number an article on Mr. Stopford Brooke is promised.

"THE Darkness of Unitarianism" is the subject of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's sermon in the March number of his Sermons for the Day, to which is appended the correspondence with the Bishop of Liverpool, which was its occasion. The "Darkness" of which the Bishop spoke, could not, Mr. Armstrong shows, be either intellectual or moral, and must therefore be spiritual; and then he contrasts the Evangelical and the Unitarian conception of spiritual religion, pointing out the injustice of applying the reproach of darkness to the latter.

The Unitarian Christian, while rejoicing to the full in the flood of light concerning God and his love revealed by Jesus both by his word and by his life, loving and honouring him with full and devout heart, longing for his spirit, seeing in him a marvellous realisation of the true relation of our human kind to the Eternal, does not believe that this is the only avenue lying open from the divine heart to the human. The Unitarian Christian looks out upon a world flooded with the divine light. From all quarters of the heavens, to his vision, streams this light of God. There is no dark quarter. He believes that the love of God was poured out upon his children millenniums before the name of Jesus was ever spoken, is poured out now on millions who have never heard that blessed name. He finds witness of God in every branch of knowledge. In the loveliness, the splendour, nay, in the stern awfulness of outward nature, he hears whispers of the eternal voice. He finds Christs—many and many a Christ—who penetrate to the depths of the soul, in mothers nursing their children, in fathers teaching their boys and girls, in wise teachers, in great and noble books, in all the varied life and thrill of our human race; and from all, all of these he delights to learn more and ever more of God. I speak of Unitarian Christianity at its best and highest. The Unitarian, alas! no more always lives up to the exaltation of his gospel than the Evangelical to that of his. But this, this receiving of and rejoicing in the light that floods the world from God the Father everywhere and always is the ideal of Unitarian religion.

In conclusion Mr. Armstrong directs the Bishop to the contrast between light and darkness in the Epistle of St. John, and reminds him that it is "he who loveth not his brother" who is really in the darkness, and that not orthodoxy but simply love is the measure of the true Christian

LITERATURE.

A NEW RELIGIOUS POET OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.*

THOMAS TRAHERNE.

I.

ABOUT the beginning of 1897, a number of manuscripts which for two hundred years had a precarious existence, fell into that greater jeopardy which is occasioned by an inglorious descent to the street book-stall. Fortunately, by the exchange of a few pence they came into the hands of Mr. Wm. T. Brooke, who, after careful examination, adjudged them to be the production of Henry Vaughan. Thereupon he communicated with Dr. Grosart, who confirmed his opinion and undertook to prepare a new and elaborate edition of the works of the Silurist. This scheme, in consequence of the decease of its projector, was not completed. On Dr. Grosart's death in 1899, his library was purchased by Mr. Charles Higham, the bookseller. Mr. Bertram Dobell, having learned from Mr. Brooke the story of the manuscripts, became interested, and, after an examination courteously allowed by Mr. Higham, purchased two of them. A third came into his possession at a sale of part of Dr. Grosart's library at Sotheby's.

Mr. Dobell seems to have arrived very quickly, on the consideration of internal evidence, at the conclusion that these three manuscripts were not the work of Vaughan but must have been the production of a hitherto unrecognised religious poet of the seventeenth century. The problem now was, how to determine the question of authorship. The assistance of Mr. Brooke was invited. He pointed out that there was appended to an edition of Giles Fletcher's "Christ's Victory and Triumph," which he had edited, a poem entitled "The Ways of Wisdom" which was very similar in style and spirit to those contained in the manuscripts. This, Mr. Brooke said, he had found in a little book in the British Museum, entitled "A Serious and Patheticall Contemplation of the Mercies of God, in several most Devout and Sublime Thanksgivings for the same," which further included other pieces in verse. Of these Mr. Dobell desired a copy; which obtaining, it became evident to him that the author of the manuscript poems, and of the "Devout and Sublime Thanksgivings" must be one and the same person. Now, in the "Address to the Reader" of the prose piece it is stated, among other matters of biographical interest, that the author was "in the service of Lord Keeper Bridgman as his Chaplain." This clue followed to Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses identified the author with Thomas Traherne, who wrote also "Roman Forgeries" and "Christian Ethicks." It remained to determine, by way of confirmation, whether there was evidence to connect either of these works with the author of the manuscripts. This was found in "Christian Ethicks," which contains a poem included also, though in a shorter form and with textual variations, in the manuscript "Centuries of Meditations." So the question of authorship was settled.

II.

Who was Thomas Traherne? As also in the case of many poets of the seventeenth century, so here, we have little direct biographical information: the account which careful research furnishes so far is slender. He was the son of a shoemaker, of a family of Welsh descent, and probably was born at Hereford in the year 1636. Another suggestion gives Ledbury as his birthplace. The fact cannot be determined, as the parish registers of both places for this period are lost. We have no further record of him before his entrance into Oxford University. It is probable, as Mr. Dobell surmises, that he received an education at Hereford Grammar-school; yet, even for such an easy surmise there is no indication of evidence. Athenæ Oxonienses says he was "entered a Commoner of Brazen-nose College on the first day of March, 1652, took one degree in Arts, left the House for a time, entered into the sacred function, and in 1661 he was actually created Master of Arts. About that time he became Rector of Credinhill, commonly called Crednell, near to the city of Hereford . . . . and in 1669 Bachelor of Divinity." "About that time" is vague; it cannot refer to the year 1661. I imagine—an inference which, if made, might have saved Mr. Dobell from an unnecessary, although small, perplexity—it refers to the time of his actual graduation as a Bachelor. A manuscript of Lambeth Library, quoted by Mr. Dobell, which contains particulars of admissions to benefices during the Commonwealth, has the following entry:

Thomas Traherne, clerk, admitted 30 Dec., 1657, by the Commissioners for the Approbation of Public Preachers to the Rectory of Crednell, alias Creddenhill, Co. Hereford: patron, Amabella, Countess Dowager of Kent.

Traherne could not have been more than twenty-one years old at that time; and the suggestion is plausible that he may first have acted as assistant to the minister whom he actually succeeded. He remained at Crednell rather more than nine and a half years. Then he removed to London "to become private chaplain to Sir Orlando Bridgman, who on August 30, 1667, was created Lord Keeper of the Seals." Lord Bridgman, as he became designated, was deprived of his office in 1672 and went into retirement at Teddington. He took Traherne with him, who seems to have become, apart from his chaplaincy, minister of the parish, "although the post was nominally held by a clerical pluralist of the time." Bridgman died at Teddington on June 25, 1674. Three months later Traherne died in his patron's house—the exact date is not known—and was buried on October 10, 1674, under the reading-desk in the church at Teddington. At the time of his death he was probably not more than thirty eight years of age.

In his will, which was nuncupative, he bequeathed all his books to his brother Philip. Thereafter, probably by the marriage of Philip, they passed into a family named Skipp, which dwelt at Ledbury. In this keeping they probably remained until the year 1888, when the family property was dispersed. The manuscripts of which we have spoken, which presumably were reckoned among these books, fell then into hands ignorant of their value. They were discovered on a street bookstall about the beginning of 1897 by Mr. William T. Brooke. So our account comes back to its starting-point.

I reserve for a subsequent article description and criticism of the volume to which I have drawn the reader's attention.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN SCOTLAND.*

Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell deserve the permanent gratitude of temperance reformers for their persistent consideration of the drink problem, their enlightening publications, and their practical proposals for public control.

The pamphlet before us has Scotland specially in view, and sets forth in a clear and concise manner a scheme for direct public control. The scheme betokens a shrewd diplomacy. The authors know that the Temperance party is divided on the subject, and requires conversion to the principle of public control. The more sentimental and Puritanic section will not hear of municipalisation, of compensation, or of any arrangement which gives the traffic leave to exist. They will have nothing but immediate and total Prohibition. They are willing to accept reduction of licences as a present protest, though it is seen that the gradual reducing means a rich monopoly for those that are granted.

The famous "Temperance Manifesto" put up the back of this section, and caused a rather frantic reiteration of the determination not to have the public hands imbrued with the iniquity of the traffic.

There are other sections equally against municipalisation, but favourable to the idea of disinterested Public Control. That idea seems to represent the line of least resistance, and therefore, statesman-like, Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell ran their scheme on that line. They assume (prematurely, perhaps) that the proposal of disinterested control has "taken its place as the authoritative temperance policy." We are under the impression that the main body of Temperance Associates in Scotland has still to be converted to that principle. The pamphlet of Mr. Thomas P. Whittaker, M.P., ("Some Frank and Friendly Words to Temperance People, &c.") implies a feeling that the Temperance Party as a whole needs converting to the principle. That pamphlet consists of an elaborately drawn and powerful argument in favour of direct and disinterested control, stated with a view of dissolving Temperance opposition to the proposal. That opposition is specially strong in Scotland. But, granting the position assumed by Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell, that "the proposal has now widespread assent," we may hopefully consider its details.

They state that the object of Public Control is to "enlist the force of national and local arrangements on the side of the community, instead of, as now, on the side of the drink-seller." The situation in which the new proposal is brought forward is this:—

It is now seen (a) That Local Veto, effective as it has been in its own sphere (i.e., in rural and sparsely-peopled districts, and in certain suburbs of towns), cannot solve the problem of the great urban centres; and (b) That it is well within the power of practical statesmanship to frame a scheme of Public Control which will greatly lessen the evils connected with drink-selling, but which will give localities, as such, no direct and appreciable pecuniary gain from the profits of the traffic.

The radical difficulty lies in procuring the "disinterested control." The proposers know the dangers connected with municipal management of the traffic. The combining of amusements with the drinking, the making of drinking conditions more respectable, and especially the drawing from drink means of public benefit, either in the shape of rate-saving or the providing of recreative facilities, have moral dangers which make them obnoxious. How then can control be at once made public and disinterested. The authors of this pamphlet think it can be done by the formation of a company composed of resident citizens whose function would be twofold:—

First. To take over the whole retail traffic in excisable liquor within the licensing area, and to carry it on so that the element of private profit should be entirely eliminated from it.

Second. To administer, in association with an equal number of representatives or nominees of the local governing body, the grants given (through the Secretary for Scotland) to the locality for the maintenance and establishment of counter-attractions to the public-house.

The practical details of working are fully set forth in the Memorandum, which is suggested as a basis for a Bill, and for these we must refer the reader to the pamphlet itself. It will be seen from this outline that the proposal is a diplomatic compromise between Local Veto and municipalisation. It reserves the right of Local Veto, and embodies the principle of municipalisation while avoiding the dangers of that method. It ought to commend itself as an experiment to all who desire a lessening of the evils connected with the traffic and the ultimate abolition of the traffic itself.

The fundamental difficulty will be the formation of such a company. The taking over of any considerable portion of the liquor traffic of a city would require a large capital. Where is it to come from? Who are likely to take up the trade in the manner proposed? Though the temperance people say "Amen" to the proposal they are not likely to take the matter practically in hand.

There may be many who would be glad of an opportunity to make the 4 per cent. guaranteed on the capital invested, but would such care to undertake the management of the scheme? Only the most unselfish and morally earnest citizens would put their hands to such a work. The company would not be accountable to electors, as a publicly-formed body is, and that would give it more or less the character of a close corporation. It might create a new publican interest which would "tie" houses in a sinister way, and, supposing the Licensing Justices did not favour the company, but preferred private licences, would they be obliged to give licences to the company? In the event of the company and a private holder applying for a licence for the same premises, might not the Justices give the licence to the individual? How are the Licensing Authorities to be made to fall in with the public scheme? They are a difficulty now; would they not remain a difficulty even under a scheme of public disinterested control? There are inherent difficulties and dangers connected with the drink traffic which no scheme can wholly overcome. We prefer the idea of municipalisation as combining control and accountability. In the municipality or local governing body there exists already the apparatus of public administration, and if public control of the liquor traffic be desirable, it seems natural to place it in the hands of the popularly-elected governing body. Whatever the ultimate solution may be, reformers like the authors of this pamphlet are educators of public spirit, for whose endeavours all lovers of social purity should be grateful. A. W.

* Principles and Methods of Direct Popular Control of the Liquor Traffic (Scotland). By Joseph Rowntree and Arthur Sherwell. Edinburgh: Methuen & Wallace. 1904. (Price 3d.)

MONACHISM.*

THIS little volume, which we owe to the pastor of the Liberal Protestant Church at Brussels, has avowedly a polemical aim, and has been occasioned by the controversies which have for some time been raging round the monastic orders, particularly in France and Spain. M. Hocart declares himself unhesitatingly an enemy of monasticism, and the object of the book before us is to demonstrate "its pagan origins, its fundamental errors, its pernicious influence on religion, morals and society."

After alluding to the Egyptian anchorites of the third century and to the ascetic tendencies that existed even earlier in the Christian Church, our author proceeds to describe the rise and organisation of the first religious orders. The oldest order was that founded about the year 360 by St. Basil of Cæsarea, who laid down for his monks no less than 368 rules of life, based on the four principles of poverty, chastity, obedience, and work. The rule of St. Basil has remained to the present day the code of the large majority of Eastern convents. Western monasticism was first organised, A.D. 529, by St. Benedict of Nursia, who adopted Basil's four principles, but applied them more rigorously and introduced the important innovation of perpetual vows. The origin of the monastic idea, however, is to be sought elsewhere than in Christendom, for, as M. Hocart points out, it was practised before the Christian era among the Essenes of Judea, and far earlier still in Brahmanism and Buddhism. The fundamental error of monachism consists, firstly, in the notion of ascetic perfection on which it is based, and secondly, on the irrevocable character of the vows that have been exacted since the sixth century. Both these points are argued with ability and cogency.

The larger portion of the work is devoted to a consideration of the effects of monachism on religion and theology, morality and society. Its influence is pronounced to be disastrous in nearly every respect. Much has been made of the services rendered to mankind by the monastic orders, and Catholic writers such as Montalembert have depicted their good works in glowing and eloquent language. M. Hocart acknowledges the services rendered by many monks to literature, and by others to agriculture, and the devotion shown by some of the orders to philanthropy or to education; but he ascribes all that is good in their work not to the monastic or ascetic principle, but, to the human element which still remained in the monks in spite of their asceticism.

There are great characters and noble figures among the monks; we pay homage to them, we admire them, we class them among those who may, by their example, remain permanent benefactors of the human race. But what touches us, gains our hearts, strengthens us, is not their renouncement of the world, but their virtues, gentle or manly, as citizens of the world. Yes, I am attracted to St. Bernard, edified by St. Bernard, but it is not when the ruins his health by his fasts and mortifications, nor when he plunges so completely into mystic contemplation as to travel for a whole day along the Lake of Geneva without looking at it; it is rather when I see him taking up his abode with twelve companions in a desert valley near Langres, and, through painful toil and privation, transforming that vale of wormwood into a vale of brightness, clara vallis, whence the name of the Abbey of Clairvaux. I am attracted and edified by Francis of Assisi, but it is not when he begs his bread, or when he descends from Mount Alverno, after a forty days' fast, bearing what are called the stigmata, pathologic tumours due to an intense and prolonged auto-suggestion; it is rather when I see him living in an intimate communion with nature, calling all living beings—the birds of the forest, the sheep of the meadow, even the humble ass that carries him—his brothers and sisters; it is when I hear him, in his universal sympathy, chanting the Hymn of all the Creatures. Then I feel that these monks are truly my brothers, because they are truly men. Then, too, I find them to be truly religious, because then, like him who loved to call himself the Son of man, they truly serve God in nature and in humanity.

But the work done by the monks has been more frequently of a different kind. They have debased religion, making it to consist in self-renunciation, not in heroic self-denial for the sake of others or in support of a great principle, but in self-renouncement for its own sake and in contempt of the world and of life. In theology, the influence of the monks has, with very few exceptions, been exerted on the side of irrational dogmatism, from the time of the Council of Nicæa—even before they were organised into orders—to that of the Vatican Council and its proclamation of papal infallibility. They have always been the enemies of liberty and foremost in the persecution of heretics. The influence of monasticism on morals has been no less injurious; it has tended to discredit marriage and to destroy family affection, and its abuse of casuistry is notorious. The monks have been active in educational work, but they have failed to form independent personalities or to inculcate the love of scientific truth. Even their charity has been harmful, for it has had the effect of pauperising large masses of the population.

Such are some of the accusations which M. Hocart brings against monachism, and he amply supports them by arguments and historical illustrations. He modestly disclaims any intention of giving us a work of erudition, but he has presented us with a well-written and profoundly interesting study of the monastic system, and its effects on the life of the countries where it has flourished.

PHYSICS AND THEOLOGY.

SIR,—I have to thank your correspondents for their various criticisms and suggestions, and to make some attempt to explain my own position a little more fully.

Some two years ago much thought was aroused by Professor James's book on "Varieties of Religious Experience," and many religionists must have been not a little surprised to find that the basis of their own particular theological system (whatever that might be) was nearly the same as that of widely different, or even antagonistic, beliefs. The Mariolater, the Buddhist, the orthodox Evangelical Christian, and the Unitarian all appeal to certain religious experiences in evidence of the reality of the Deity they believe in. But while their conceptions of Deity are so very different, their subjective religious experience appeared to be almost the same. Now, when we further realise that Buddha himself, to mention no others, enjoyed these highest religious experiences without any conception of a personal Deity,* we seem at first to be almost forced into the position that religious experiences are purely subjective, and not dependent on any being external to ourselves, but merely upon our inner development and state of mind, of body and of soul. But in that case should we not have to place theology among the fine arts rather than the sciences, the only canons of true or false being those of taste? and surely there are many of us to whom such a consequence would appear little better than a reductio ad absurdum.

But if we now turn to consider the process by which the lower organic faculties are developed, we find that it appears to be always in response to real external stimuli in the environment. The outer covering or skin of primitive organisms may be slightly sensitive to a variety of external stimuli, but the diversity of those external facts begets a corresponding diversity of skin organs, beginning first as specialised spots of pigment cells, and gradually developing through marvellous and incredible modifications to the perfect eye and ear. Such an elaborate process (as Fiske† points out) would be possible only in response to the external facts of light and sound. And it is equally obvious,

* Prof. Rhys Davids's Buddhism, &c.
† Through Nature to God.

I think, that the great faculty of apperception, or of unifying and combining, which psychologists tell us is the single function of mind—could never have reached its perfection in so many directions had it not been for a great fact in the outside world, which we describe as order or sequence. The scientist will tell us that a scientific law is not an outside fact, not a law of Nature binding her motions, but merely a human generalisation by which to group immense numbers of diverse observations. And this, of course, is true, but if there were not something in the nature of things which responded to these laws they would not be any use. Just as the eye is certainly a human organ and in no way limits the luminosity of the sun, yet what the eye perceives is light, and unless there were some objective reality in the external world corresponding to this, the eye would be no use, and would never have come into existence, so our various religious experiences undoubtedly point to a supreme external cosmic reality in the nature of things. But what practically every system of Theism does is to describe this cosmic reality by the human faculty or image, by means of which we experience it.

To describe God as Mind, or Love, or Self-consciousness is in no way less purely metaphorical than to describe the sun as the "eye" of day. Now, whatever the cosmic spiritual Reality may be "in itself," what it really is to us, is that in which we think, feel and consciously exist, and in response to which organic nature has evolved thought, feeling, and consciousness.

The Supreme Reality is to human, conscious life what light is to the eye, both its creator and that in which it functions. It is the cosmic factor or condition of thought and love, but human minds and souls are the sole organic factors. Now, if this be so, there is a sense in which it is true that Religion is a subjective thing, dependent on the state of our own physical, intellectual, or moral faculties, and the "aids" or "mediators" of the religious life will be as different as the different bodily conditions which suit different individuals and temperaments, whereas the experiences of health and disease will be closely akin in all, especially that of perfect health. And in order to reach the condition of spiritual health in which "the heavens are opened" to us, we certainly need nothing more than we need the thought of ideal humanity. It will ever be, therefore, as it ever has been, that saints and divine men lead us up to the vision. But in identifying the infinite cosmic Reality with these mediators or with any human images or ideals, we involve ourselves in many insuperable difficulties, which the great theological systems have been attempts to resolve.

Assuming a personal Deity, the question they have to meet is, How can the personal and essentially human be the absolute condition of humanity? for the condition of anything is rather its complementary antithesis than its duplicate or prototype. Light, for instance, being the original "condition" of the eye, is yet entirely without any kind of outward resemblance to it.

Now all this, and much more of equally great import, has been recognised and worked out in the developed doctrine of the Trinity. Here we are able to think of the Creator as conditioned by no human qualities whatsoever, for these may be all withdrawn into the person of the incarnate God, through whom alone our finite minds have access to the absolute Divine Being.

As a system this is full of the deepest and most beautiful significance, corresponding perfectly to the great fact that we can only know the absolute Condition of existence as the highest human nature reveals it to us. It is profoundly significant, as (in greater or less degree) are all the doctrines of the great Christian Catholic Church. But when we ask, further, if it is true, there is for us, at all events, but one answer. For if there were no other difficulty this were sufficient, that Jesus, the carpenter of Nazareth, was in no sense the final revelation of the creative power.

It is in vain then for us to plead, that the expressions in vogue in our Unitarian worship have significance or symbolical value if they have not literal truth—for they can hardly have more significance than the orthodox doctrines we have rightly (as I hold) rejected as untrue. And I cannot think that I stand entirely alone, in feeling that the use of even such words as He and Him act as a continual back draught into the more confined conceptions of Deity and the universe, which it is so hard to hold to-day as true.

And is not our wonder and joy increased both in finite man and his Eternal environment by recognising that everything we value in life—love, knowledge, joy and personality itself, are only waked into being by this wondrous human nature, of which we are all heirs—while humanity itself is only the response of organic nature to realities in the eternal nature of things? Then "God"—if we may still use this great word—though no longer limited by human conditions of thought, is conceived in no vague or merely negative way, but as the all present condition of conscious being. God is the abysmal cosmic origin of this mighty complex of experience we call life, which enters our organic consciousnesses as good or evil, but into the absolute nature of which we can never penetrate, except to say that ideal humanity is that which pierces for us most deeply thereinto, and does so in the moment when it attains through love and all its highest powers its own most blessed vision.

"GOD AND MY NEIGHBOUR."

Sir,—Dr. Warschauer may, I think, claim to have shown that Mr. Blatchford is not at all well equipped for the task he has so light-heartedly undertaken—the sweeping out of the religious from life and the putting in the place of it a merely mundane Socialism.

But I also think it will be a mistake to assume that now that Mr. Blatchford has been answered there is an end of him. The fact is, he has only been expressing—sometimes very forcibly, often very crudely and unskilfully, and now and again rather coarsely—thoughts and feelings that are everywhere gaining ground, and which are, I believe, really at the bottom of that religious apathy of which all churches are alike complaining.

The plain truth is, Sir, that every day and all day, in individual experience and in society and the world at large, things are happening which it is rationally impossible to reconcile with the idea of an all-just, all-good Ruler of the universe, or with any theory of human training and education. The things themselves are not new; but what is new is the light that evolutionary science and Biblical criticism have of late been throwing upon them. Men are everywhere feeling that there is simply no reconciling many of the commonest evils of life with Divine Fatherhood and the beneficent oversight of the individual. Explain them as cleverly as we may, I believe we are all conscious that the explanation is depressingly, hopelessly inadequate.

For my own part, I came, years ago, to the conclusion that it was simply impossible to believe in the main teaching of any of the churches if we leave out of that teaching what at one time they all believed in, but what, apparently, they have now all abandoned—the existence of a second power in the universe. Ten years ago I earnestly insisted that we were bound to go the way in which Mr. Blatchford is so gaily leading if we ignored the personal belief and the unmistakable teaching of the Founder of Christianity, and gave up the idea of an evil potency in opposition to the good. It is not necessary to get back to the Mosaic, or what used to be the Mosaic teaching on the matter. But what, in my belief, it is absolutely necessary to do if the world is to retain its hold on a beneficent theism, is to recognise in the tragedies of nature and of human life, overwhelming evidence of some Titanic disturbance of the reign of beneficent law, physical as well as moral. The old story of Genesis is no truth, but it is an intuition of the direction in which the truth lies. Let this disturbance of the intended scheme of things be assumed, and I believe it would be possible for Mr. Robert Blatchford and Dr. Warschauer to meet in a common faith.

Errata and Emendation. — In last week's article on "God and My Neighbour," the passage dealing with the antithesis between human freedom and Divine omniscience (p. 163, col. 3) should have read as follows:—

"We may quite frankly admit that the reconciliation of these two facts—both of which we have to assume, in spite of their seeming antagonism—transcends our understanding; but it does so, only in the same way, and for the same reason, for which the whole conception of an infinite and self-existent Being necessarily transcends our intellectual capacity. In any case, as between the difficulty suggested by the intellect and the certainty proclaimed by the moral sense, we shall do well in following the latter of these voices."

Later in the same column, in the quotation from Illingworth, for "exercised" read "exorcised."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE GIVING OF SELF.

If any man come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me. For whosoever would save his life shall lose it, and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake shall find it.—Matthew xvi. 24, 25.

My brothers and sisters and I grew up alongside another family of boys and girls, who lived opposite our house. They had a large garden, and thanks to the chivalry of the brothers, some credit also being due to the sisters, we played there, boy and girl together, longer than many young folks. The lawn was big enough for athletic sports, for which we trained most perseveringly.

Tastes change. Most of us now think war horrible and un-Christian, but in those days we played soldiers without misgiving. There was a mound with a tree on the top, where a flag would bravely fly. Many a siege has that fortress stood from combatants with equipments and rules of warfare that were a strange reminder of old-time fighting and modern manœuvres of Notts Yeomanry and Robin Hood Volunteers. Captains Courageous were the lads, defending the girls within the fort by many a deed of knightly daring. And when the girls naturally wanted to share more actively in the defence of their flag, tin swords for the brothers, wooden ones for the sisters was the curiously chivalrous rule. Willie, however, ever champion of the weak, girt on his metal weapon with what we now agree was the truer knightly feeling, that there was some injustice in the arrangement, well-intentioned though it was, that he, just because he was a boy (and younger too), should have a better blade than girls.

Willie belonged to the family who lived across the road, and it is chiefly about him I want to tell you. With all his boyish high spirits, wilfulness, and the faults that all have to conquer if they are to grow up worth anything, he was unusually self-forgetful for his age. I am afraid that we girls sometimes took advantage of his willingness to be buyer at our play-shop, instead of allowing him to act the more interesting part of shop-man and maker of ingenious produce for sale. When there was a funeral, to dispose in decent burial of a poor dead bird or mouse, it was Willie who saved us from touching the "remains" by gently lifting them for us into the box-coffin. He always shared the gardener's gifts of plants for his little plot with us who had gardens but no gardener. He ran cheerfully with lots of notes for his father, and on errands for his busy mother, while many an hour I've seen him wheeling his invalid sister round the garden, or reading to her under the apple-trees.

As we grew older, play-hours became shorter, and school-hours longer. By the time school-days were ended, Willie was captain and gold medallist of a large public school. Through boyhood and youth his parents say they never used even one strong word to him. "Great energy and strength of will he had, but such reverent gentleness in trust and obedience, such graciousness, that a wish and a look were always enough with him for guidance, such self-control he used over a spirit that could have flashed anger."

Then the life of business began, and as a cotton salesman he became a well-known figure in the biggest cotton market of the world, a favourite for his genial courtesy, and respected for business skill and strict honesty of word and dealing. He also continued in spare time to be a steady reader of good books, and so could always lift his thoughts above the buying and selling by which he earned his living. Athletic and vigorous, he was one of the Volunteers, all over 6 ft. high, chosen for a guard of honour on a visit of Queen Victoria to his city. But Willie's leisure was always spent more for others than himself, and chiefly for the young, the sick, and the poor. Saturday afternoons, Sundays, and week evenings found him working at this or that boys' club, mission, or boys' camp, taking children to the sea-side at his own expense, or entertaining them at his own little country house. As he was a non-smoker and teetotaler he had more money to spare for the pleasures of hospitality, and much of it was offered to waifs and strays of every condition of life. Often he might be seen with queer bundles and battered tin boxes in his arms, slum lads hanging on his sleeve, taking excited parties back to town after a blissful visit under his roof. Every Wednesday, for several summers, he used to cycle into the country at 6 a.m. to gather flowers to leave on his way to business for the old women at the work-house. Thus, in one way or another, he was always quietly, secretly, giving himself for those around him.

At last, when only twenty-seven years old, he gave his life unto death. He went into Wales with a holiday party, chiefly of tired workers from the North Country, and sacrificed one week of his short holiday that he might brighten and ennoble the holidays of others. A sudden storm overwhelmed a happy boating party, and Willie, an accomplished oarsman and swimmer, who might easily have saved himself, died saving others, a woman's cloak in his last grasp.

In the week following, when two of us who were Willie's playfellows from childhood, took up the holiday leadership which he laid down in death so noble, the words of Jesus at the beginning of this Children's Column were often in our hearts. They used to be sung in the service at our chapel as far back as I can remember, but, partly because the music had a melancholy and distant sound, they often had a dismal and far away meaning to me. Now, when the air, and friends' letters, and the newspapers were full of memories of one so well loved by us, whose life and death had been a glorious losing of himself for others, Christ's message became, even in our grief, very real, and full of joyous inspiration. Here was one, who had gone about among us from our babyhood, living a home and school life very like our own, having to earn a living and fill spare time as we had, and always in work or play, business or leisure, by cheerful self-denial, self-forgetfulness, self-discipline, even in the brightest hours which his sunny nature loved, he had shown that it was possible to follow Christ, till the call came, as it came to Christ, to lose life in the joyful strength of early manhood.

And, children, the spirit of Christ, which reveals God's love, can dwell in us from childhood. Jesus' invitation to take up his cross and follow him need never have a far away meaning to us. We can leave to God what trials of heroism may befall us, whether unto death or not. It is for us to begin whilst we are young, even among the fun and frolic, to lead courageous, loving, Christ-like lives, by taking up the daily small crosses of self-denial, unselfishness and self-control for the sake of God and everyone around us, as children with Jesus of a Heavenly Father. Believe me, God would have us in this way make our play in the garden of childhood a blessed preparation for work in the world of manhood and womanhood, and our mimic warfare on the mound, alike for tin and wooden swordsmen, a training in that Christian chivalry which is needed sorely in the battle of life.

EMILY H. SMITH.

THE terms of the resolution on the subject of National Education, passed at the recent meeting of the Evangelical Free Church Council at Newcastle, to which reference is made in our leading article, were as follows:—

"In presenting these proposals the executive have in view the establishment of a truly national and efficient system of education, which shall secure justice to every citizen, and conform to what the executive believe to be the mind of the British people. Subject to the essential principles involved in the following proposals being secured, the executive express the hope that the claims of other members of the community may be duly considered, and that a solution may be reached which will wound no conscience, and will bring about a lasting educational peace. The proposals are:—

"(1) That the system of education shall recognise only one type of public elementary schools, viz., schools provided and controlled by a public education authority.

"(2) That denominational school buildings, if required and suitable for use as provided schools, may be rented or purchased on equitable terms for the purpose of elementary education, due regard being had to the existing rights of the public in such buildings.

"(3) That all schools maintained by public funds, whether by rates or taxes, shall be under the sole management and control of representatives appointed by the method of popular election.

"(4) That there shall be adequate provision for the training of all teachers of elementary schools free from theological and ecclesiastical tests, and under the sole management and control of the popularly elected education authorities.

"(5) That no ecclesiastical or theological tests shall be applied in the appointment of teachers of publicly supported schools or training colleges.

"(6) That no distinctively denominational teaching or formulary be given or used in public schools in school hours; but simple Biblical instruction may be given according to a syllabus, as is general at present in provided schools. Attendance at such instruction shall be subject to a conscience clause.

"(7) That the foregoing propositions shall also have reference to secondary education as far as they may be applicable.

"(8) That women shall be eligible for election to any local education authority throughout England and Wales, and including London."

COMING EDUCATION SETTLEMENT.

MONDAY'S debate on the administration of the Education Act of 1902 makes it clear that no one outside the Government and a few clerical extremists believes that the law as it stands offers a final solution of the education problem. Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE showed how intole able is the position forced upon Nonconformist Wales, and convinced the House that here at least is occasion for compromise. But Sir WILLIAM ANSON, backed by the Prime Minister, had nothing to offer but attacks on the "religious animosity of the Nonconformists" and threats of a mandamus against each of the recalcitrant County Councils. That sort of thing, however, is doomed to failure. The present Government is clearly tottering to its fall, and its members, except, perhaps, Sir WILLIAM ANSON, are fully aware of the fact. Men's minds are turning to the question as to what form the inevitable reconstruction of our educational system shall take.

As far as the question of control is concerned, it may be taken as pretty certain —assuming, as seems probable, that the task of reconstruction falls to a Liberal Government with a clear majority behind it—that the first five clauses of the programme adopted by the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches at Newcastle, last week, will fairly represent the minimum demanded. The new Act, we hope and believe, will "recognise only one type of elementary schools, viz., schools provided and controlled by a public education authority." Doubtless it will be provided "that denominational school buildings, if required and suitable for use as provided schools, may be rented or purchased on equitable terms for the purpose of elementary education." But "all schools maintained by public funds, whether by rates or otherwise," must be "under the sole management and control of representatives appointed by the method of popular election." "No ecclesiastical or theological tests" must be "applied in the appointment of teachers of publicly supported schools," and there must be "adequate provision for the training of all teachers of public elementary schools free from ecclesiastical and theological tests, and under the sole management and control of popularly elected educational authorities."

So far there is and can be no room for compromise, and so far there was absolute unanimity among the Evangelical Free Churchmen last week. The difficulty arises, of course, on the question of religious teaching. A clause was carried at Newcastle declaring--

That no distinctively denominational teaching or formulary shall be given or used in public schools in school hours, but simple Biblical instruction may be given according to a syllabus, as is general at present in provided schools; attendance at such instruction shall be subject to a conscience clause.

As we pointed out in the autumn, when the clause was first published, everything turns on the question, What is meant by "simple Biblical instruction"? The explanatory phrase, "as is general at present in provided schools," is not promising. Some weeks ago the question was discussed in some detail in these columns, and the conclusion was arrived at that while "Board-school religion" in the form widely adopted had been largely acquiesced in by "Unitarians, Agnostics, and Jews" as a temporary expedient and in a section of the schools of the nation, it could hardly be accepted as part of a permanent and universal system; while persistence on the part of Anglicans and Roman Catholics in rejecting its claims to represent the greatest common measure of the beliefs of Christians would make it impossible to force it upon them in substitution for the teaching now given in denominational schools.

An amendment rejected by the Evangelical Free Church Council sought to exclude the Bible altogether from the schools. This would be an altogether too heroic remedy. Some knowledge of the contents of the Bible is surely essential to even an elementary education, irrespective of the views held regarding them. Unitarians would, of course, like to see Bible reading accompanied by simple explanation and historical interpretation, and the inculcation of elementary Christian ethics; but they are faced by the fact that permission to give such teaching is usually taken by both managers and teachers to mean permission to teach Evangelical Christianity in a form obnoxious, not only to Unitarians, Agnostics, and Jews, but to Anglicans and Roman Catholics as well.

For these reasons the conviction is gaining force—accepted gladly by some and most reluctantly by others—that, except for simple Bible reading without comment, religious instruction as a recognised subject in the school curriculum will have to be excluded in the settlement which is approaching, and the task of providing it relegated to the parents and the denominations to which the parents belong—out of school hours. Whether or not the school buildings should be lent for that purpose is matter for discussion. For curselves, we dislike the idea of making the schools a miniature battle-ground of the sects. Yet one would give much for a settlement of this vexed question, and if permission to use the school buildings would in any way help to reconcile the sects to their exclusion from the control of elementary education, the proposal seems at least worthy of careful consideration.

A MEMORIAL TO JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

A SERVICE of special interest, not only to our churches in Liverpool but to all who revere the memory of the late Rev. JOHN HAMILTON THOM, was held last Sunday evening in the chapel of the Liverpool Domestic Mission in Mill-street. The Mission buildings are well known as the most spacious, the most beautiful, and the best equipped of our whole community, and the Mission must always hold a place of its own in our regard on account of the close association of Dr. MARTINEAU and Mr. THOM with its foundation, and their life-long interest in its work.

The service on Sunday evening marked the re-opening of the chapel, after the addition to its decoration of four Della Robbia plaques, the gift of Mr. WALTER HOLLAND, representing "The Creation," "The Prophet Micah's Message," "The Nativity," and "The Lord's Prayer," while at the same time the occasion was taken to dedicate a beautiful brass tablet placed in the chapel by the RATHBONE family as a memorial to Mr. THOM. The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. T. LLOYD JONES, minister of the Mission, who also preached a sermon, in which he recounted the history of the Mission, and after alluding to the beautiful additions made to the adornment of their chapel, spoke with grateful appreciation of the faithful service rendered by the large band of helpers who sustain him and Mr. JOSEPH ANDERTON in the work to which for the past twenty years their lives have been devoted.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG then delivered the address of dedication, which we here print in full, and we are privileged to add also the prayer which followed the address. The appeal of his words will, we trust, go straight home to many hearts, and not in Liverpool alone; for this work of ministry to the poor makes its urgent claim in all great cities, especially to our young men and women, to those who have leisure, and gifts and graces of the higher life which in all simplicity and brotherly kindness they can share with those who have the greatest need of help and sympathy. Much true response there is already in Liverpool, in London, Manchester, Birmingham, and other cities, but always the need is greater than the forces enlisted in the service, and the field is always open to the faith and the self-sacrifice and the overflowing love of the fresh young life growing up in our churches. And while the appeal of pathetic needs touches many hearts to generous response in willing service, there may well be in this memorial, and the thoughts it quickens, a fresh call of consecration. The ministry of Mr. THOM'S life was given, indeed, to Liverpool; but his searching words are now the possession of all the churches. Others may now share the great privilege of being quickened by the spirit of his discipleship, of seeing with his clear vision the way of lowly duty, with its boundless opportunities, and the glory of a divine self-sacrifice.

ADDRESS OF DEDICATION.

BY THE REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG.

THE personality of John Hamilton Thom, from whom in so large a measure it caught its initial inspiration, must ever be entwined with the Liverpool Domestic Mission to the Poor; and meeting here at the first public service of religion since our chapel has been robed in its new and gracious furnishings, it is most meet that we should also dedicate to his consecrated memory the tablet which records his devout and steadfast care for the Mission and its sacred purposes.

It is seventy years ago since that memorable visit of Jonathan Phillips and Dr. Tuckerman, of Boston, to this city of wealth and commerce, also, alas! both then and now, of so much sin and sorrow, washed by the broad-bosomed Mersey. Those two young ministers whose friendship right through the main part of the nineteenth century is one of the fairest idyls of our churches, met the two Americans at Greenbank and elsewhere, and Martineau records how "their benevolent and devout enthusiasm came upon us like the Angel descending to stir the sleeping waters; and their recital of what was being done to uplift and evangelise the neglected classes in Boston fell as a convicting and converting word, and yet a word of hope and zeal, upon our conscience." Then came Mr. Thom's great sermon at Renshaw-street Chapel on Christmas Day, 1835, repeated afterwards at Paradise-street; and on Good Friday, 1836, the historic meeting at Renshaw-street Chapel, the "crowded platform," which Mr. Thom recalled a generation later, having among its occupants the William Rathbone of that day, the romantic and pathetic figure of Blanco White, Martineau and Thom themselves—the one thirty years of age, the other only twenty-eight—and the men who had in charge the fair fame of Liverpool, of the names of Holt, Roscoe, Gair, Booth, Jevons, Yates, and a rare company of their compeers. There and then was founded this Mission of love and uplifting to the poor, which to-day has put on one more garment of adornment, the expression of the honour in which the generous heart of one faithful friend holds its purposes and its achievement.

And as for us, brethren, how shall we dedicate this memorial tablet to him whose mind had so large a part in conceiving and organising this Mission to the poor, a mission whose house was once so lowly, but in our day has become a palace? Well we know that not in sumptuous halls and gathered examples of æsthetic art would his soul have found pleasure, unless these outward things were the earnest of hearts moved with succouring love, souls fired with redeeming passion. If all that has been lavished on the outward equipment of this Mission since the first stone of this present building was laid, is but the symbol of the striving of our people towards a larger human service, a deeper heed to the call of Christ in the secret heart, then is it well indeed. But if any man deem that the material things, or anything that money can buy, by itself can promote the Kingdom of God, then is his zeal a delusive snare, a mocking of the Divine call sounding from the voice of God. The men of 1836 gave, in their measure, of their material wealth for the work of the kingdom; but they gave of their time, of their energy, of their thought, of their love. Their material gifts are forgotten, dissolved in air. Their spiritual gifts, whatever they were, live on, are woven to-day into the heart and life of our city, for they are of the fabrics which neither years nor death can destroy. If you call up before you the grave, beautiful face of him whose memorial we consecrate to-night, if you listen in the chamber of memory for the exquisite intonation of his voice—what do eyes and accents seem to ask you now? What does the spirit which was behind them, if he is with us here in spirit presence, disrobed of all that was mortal, ask you now? Are your lives devoted to that purpose of Christ which is for ever urgent? Are you mindful of the call which never ceases, or are you content to take to yourselves the decencies and comforts of religion in your homes, hearing no importunate call to the common service? How are you arranging your lives? For absorption in business, for pleasure, for refined quietude and ease, or for sacrifice, for recognition of all God's need of you? What are you teaching your children? Are they going to be helpers of the world when your hands are folded on your breast? What are the young men doing—especially young men bearing the old and noble names that are so deeply carved into the history of Liverpool?

I am told that when this Domestic Mission had a quarter of a century of life behind it, now more than forty years ago, some of the young men whose fathers had founded it, and still cherished it, felt that for them, the younger generation, there was little room in its management, and resolved themselves to found and foster a kindred institution in the northern quarter of the city. So sprang up the North-end Mission, now in active life in Bond-street and Hamilton-road. What energy of life, what sense of the call of God and of his Christ, lay in that action of those young men! But to-day, though the call is still as urgent, there is the utmost difficulty in procuring for the North-end Mission adequate support. We want generous munificence in the north as well as in the south. Both south and north want willing and eager workers. Let the memory which to-night we honour make its mute appeal to all for whatsoever they are able to confer, money or labour; above all, care and support, and the sympathy of hearts stirred by the spirit of the Christ.

Ah! brethren, what a power to salvation might our churches be: this little group of churches here in Liverpool, in which the mind is invited to perfect liberty, where the preacher's word is wholly free, where no creed or ritual is imposed by priest or synod, where the only pledge is to seek the Kingdom of God and render it our service; what a power to salvation might these churches be, with their wide sweep of worldly estate from the wealthiest to the poorest, from leaders and rulers of men down to the lowliest—what a power to salvation might they be, if in every breast ruled even some faint image of the spirit of the Christ! How might we lead the way in all things that make for cleanliness, decency, sobriety, self-respecting citizenhood, domestic happiness, the culture of the immortal spirit, we who own no allegiance to ecclesiastical authority or spiritual court? Pray God for the spirit of him whom we commemorate this night, that man of mystic insight into the truths of the spirit, that steadfast teacher and practiser of the Gospel of Jesus. Pray God that we, too, may be true to the "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ," and faithfully bear the burden handed down alike to preachers and to people by the holy dead.

THE PRAYER.

O Thou without whom all our works are vain, Everlasting Father, God of all holiness and truth, consecrate in our hearts that gracious memory to which this night we have turned our minds and hearts. As the record of his name and life and spirit is enshrined in letters of man's device upon these walls, so may the example which he set, the purposes which he loved, be graven deep upon our souls. We consecrate to thee, O God, this memorial which the eye can see: may the memorial which endures in lives made purer, in service made more devout, be consecrated within us, wrought to effective power of the spirit for the coming of thy kingdom. We thank thee that in the old times of our fathers he and many brethren were stirred by the love of Christ and of his poor to found this ministry of lowly service. We thank thee for the ardour of their hearts, for the wisdom of their counsels; for the way in which they laid the lines of this institution, for all pure and devout enthusiasm which has been poured into its endeavours both in their day and in the after times. We thank thee for all lives made pure, all homes made sweet and clean thereby. We pray for thy blessing on those who in our day have entered into the toil and care of this great task. We pray thee to endue them with wisdom, with patience, with faith, with abounding love. We pray thee to stir the hearts of many to become their willing helpers. And we pray that the spirit which shone with so gracious a light from thy servant whose name and memory are specially in our mouths and hearts to-night, may live again in the labourers of to-day and of to-morrow, and of the years when we too shall have passed away. So, Father, quickened by all that is beautiful within these walls, and by the living word which shall here be spoken, may many learn to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with their God! Amen.

INSCRIPTION ON THE TABLET.

To the Memory of John Hamilton Thom,
Born at Newry, 1808, Died at Liverpool, 1894;
Minister of Renshaw Street Chapel,
1831 to 1866.

His ministry kindled in others a love for the service of mankind, and his writings quickened the spiritual faith of seekers after truth in many lands. This Mission, the Third Domestic Mission in England, is a living witness to his influence and labour. Beginning in a small Mission House in 1836, it removed to Beaufort-street in 1856, and to Mill-street in 1892. He ever remained its friend and supporter, nor suffered his fellow-worshippers to forget that its high aim was the fulfilment of the word which saith, "And the poor have the Gospel preached to them."

Among those who were associated with him in the foundation of the Mission were—

William Rathbone, Chairman,
Rev. J. Blanco White, Rev. Dr. Shepperd, Thos. Avison, Thos. Bolton, J. B. Blackburne, George Holt, Rev. Jas. Martineau, Rev. H. Giles, Thos. Holt, Jas. Harvey, William Jevons, Richard Rathbone, Christopher Rawdon, Samuel Bright, R. A. Fletcher, Richard Roscoe, Samuel Gair, Henry Booth, J. A. Barclay, R. V. Yates.

The copy of the inscription which has reached us gives 1829 as the date of the beginning of Mr. Thom's ministry at Renshaw-street Chapel. If it is so on the tablet, it is a mistake. It is true that Mr. Thom's first sermon in Liverpool was preached in Renshaw-street Chapel, but from 1829 to 1831 he was minister of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, and only in the latter year succeeded his friend the Rev. John Hincks at Renshaw-street. There was a break of three years, from 1854 to 1857, in Mr. Thom's ministry at Renshaw-street, when his place was taken by the Rev. W. H. Channing. Mr. Thom closed his pastorate at Renshaw-street with the year 1866, preaching his farewell sermon, however, on February 24, 1867.

UNUM TALEM.

Gazing, I felt all childhood's worth,
Dear open eyes, dear open brow!
There is not, sweet, on earth,
A thing so sweet as thou.

The sunshine dwells above those eyes,
The sapphire throne within them burns;
The Wisdom of the wise
To thee, sweet, wisely turns.

Dear open heart, it needs must be,
That one sweet pearl in Heaven is flung
Wide open still for thee,
Its sister pearls among.

So enter, sweet, that God may reap
The harvest of an exile's cup—
The fountains of my deep
May reach, and break them up.

LUCY AIKIN.

The name of Lucy Aikin is less well known than that of her aunt Mrs. Barbauld. Yet to many it will not come with great unfamiliarity, and hers was, perhaps, a more interesting personality than that of the poetess.

Lucy Aikin was born on Nov. 6, 1781, at Warrington, where her father, John Aikin, practised as a physician. Her parents were cousins, her mother being a Miss Jennings, of the Bedfordshire family of that name. Among her ancestors was the Sir Francis Wingate, who, as a Bedfordshire magistrate, clapped John Bunyan into gaol. After a sojourn of about ten years in Yarmouth Dr. Aikin moved to London, and there, or in the neighbouring village (as it then was) of Hampstead, the greater part of Lucy Aikin's life was spent.

The atmosphere in which she lived was that of the higher middle class, a literary and refined Whig society. Her brother, Arthur Aikin, was secretary to the Society of Arts, and in this capacity he knew the Duke of Sussex, who was very friendly towards the amiable secretary and his sister. We find at one time the Duke requesting Miss Aikin to lend him a volume of Dr. Channing's sermons. Among Lucy Aikin's greatest friends were "Mrs." Joanna Baillie and her sister—from them she would hear from time to time news of Maria Edgeworth. Among her other friends and acquaintances she reckoned Mrs. Opie, Whishaw, Rogers, the poet, Harriet Martineau, Roscoe, the historian, the Taylor family, and Denman, the Chief Justice. Sir Walter Scott she met on one memorable occasion:—

". . . on Thursday last (she writes) arrived an invitation from the Carrs to my father and my aunt to dine with them the next day to meet Walter Scott. . . . A charming day we had. I did not indeed see much of the great lion, for we were fourteen at dinner, of whom about half were constantly talking . . . but he was delighted to see my aunt (Mrs. Barbauld), and paid her great attention, which I was very glad of. He told her that the 'Tramp, tramp,' 'Splash, splash,' of Taylor's 'Leonora,' which she carried into Scotland to Dugald Stewart many years ago, was what made him a poet. I heard him tell a story or two with a dry kind of humour, for which he is distinguished; and though he speaks very broad Scotch, is a heavy-looking man, and has little the air of a gentleman, I was much pleased with him—he is lively, spirited, and quite above all affectation. . . . I had the good fortune to be placed at dinner between Mr. Whishaw and Sotheby, . . . a lady next him asked if he did not think we could see by Mr. Scott's countenance, if 'Waverley' were mentioned, whether he was the author? 'I don't know,' said Mr. S——, 'we will try.' So he called out from the bottom of the table to the top, 'Mr. Scott, I have heard that there is a new novel coming out by the author of Waverley, have you heard of it?' 'I have,' said the Minstrel, 'and I believe it.' He answered very steadily, and everyone cried out directly 'Oh, I am glad of it!' 'Yes,' said Mr. Whishaw, 'I am a great admirer of those novels'; and we began to discuss which was the best of the two, but Scott kept out of this debate, and had not the assurance to say anything handsome of the works though he is not the author—Oh, no, for he denies them!"

Of Southey she writes thus:—"The fifth volume of Southey has been occupying me. The effect of his work is on the whole melancholy. . . . I can remember when his friends said, 'No doubt he is arrogant, but he will mend of that, he will find his level.' There was the mistake, his was an incurable case; neither the mellowing hand of time, nor the rude shocks of disappointment, could in the least degree moderate his self-opinion. Posterity was to do him justice, his fame was to be immortal. It was a kind of monomania, and was the true source of his bigotry religious and political, and of that virulence of abuse and invective by which he disgusted his own party almost as much as he provoked the opposite."

Coleridge she was unable to appreciate. In the possession of the writer's family is a copy of "Lyrical Ballads" (1798), and the first of the ballads is the "Rime of the Ancyent Marinere," being the first edition of that wonderful, weird, and intensely fascinating poem. This, falling into the hands of Lucy Aikin, greatly provoked her ire. In the margins are scrawled pencil notes by the lady. It is probable that in her scorn of this poem she was not in a minority; to the admirers of Pope and Dryden no doubt it came as a shock.

It was natural that such a thorough-going Whig and Nonconformist should feel little sympathy towards, or admiration for, Dr. Johnson. She considered he did Milton a cruel wrong in his "Lives of the Poets."

"You have certainly" (she writes to Dr. Channing) "not given Johnson more reprehension than he richly deserves for his outrages against one so inestimably his superior. In this country where Tory and High Church principles are still lamentably prevalent, it is impossible to estimate the mischief as I should call it, which Johnson has effected, by lending the sanction of his authority to popular prejudices. I know no other example of powers so vigorous, self-devoted to the drudgery of forging chains and riveting fetters in the human mind."

Of Lucy Aikin's own literary work it is difficult to speak in these days. She lived when women-writers were comparatively rare and appreciation easy, and when critics often displayed a gallantry towards the weaker sex, not apparently objected to then, but which to-day might possibly annoy our lady novelists. Lucy Aikin's most successful venture into the realms of literature was her "Memoirs of the Court of Elizabeth"; her subsequent works on the reigns of Charles I. and James I. were inferior and met with fewer readers. Later she wrote a Life of Addison, which was unkindly reviewed by Croker to the lady's chagrin.

Her conversation was brilliant and incisive. She breathed intolerance, and was a "good hater." An argument as to the merits of Wordsworth between her and Crabbe Robinson became so heated that the latter stamped out of the house in a rage and never returned. She was a great letter writer, and carried on an animated correspondence with Dr. Channing, Mr. Mallet (son of Mallet du Pan), Mrs. Barbauld, and Mr. Holland, grandfather of the present Lord Knutsford. The letters, though not so sprightly as her conversation, have their interest even now. With Dr. Channing she discussed every possible subject with unfailing zest.

The last years of Miss Aikin's life were spent at the home of a married niece at Wimbledon. The quiet country house was a change for the old lady used to her own circle of London friends. But, unlike many elderly unmarried women, she was neither restless nor dissatisfied, but remained to the end, cheerful, interested, and enthusiastic, making the best of what simple pleasures she could get, devoted to her garden, and living happily in the remembrance of the greater gaiety of her earlier years. When old age was upon her she contracted the habit of thinking aloud. As she lay upstairs in bed her maid would sit sewing in an adjoining room. One day the old lady was evidently troubled with the solution of certain ethical problems. "If a man were to pray that the life of his enemy be spared?" She repeated this question many times more and more insistently. The exasperated maid at last, unable to bear it any longer, burst into the room. "Well, ma'am," she cried, "and what then?" The old lady's reply is not recorded.

She now belongs to the past—that past that held so much that was sane, vigorous and witty, a dip into which, to us sunk in the slough of our modern dulness, cannot now and then come amiss.

THE RIGHT MAN.

"His office let another take." There were no candidates for this vacancy; nor would the apostles make an absolute appointment; neither would they have recourse to popular election; and yet selection of some kind was necessary; what was to be done? There was first the question of qualification, and it was decided that the sole requirement should be ability to witness — to bear witness, both by testimony and example, to the risen life. They put forward two; they offered prayer; and then, it is strangely said, "they gave lots for them." Apparently, they left the issue to chance.

"Fortune," "chance," and "luck," as determining factors, are not so much as mentioned in the Bible. No Jew believed in them; but every Jew believed in the drawing of lots as a religious act. It was used in the distribution of land, in appointing a king, in assigning duties to a priest. The belief is fully explained by a verse in the Book of Proverbs: "The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord." The mechanical act was nothing; there was no blind submission to a blind power; the disposing was of the Lord.

There may have been an element of superstition in this procedure, as procedure; if it weakened the sense of responsibility, and interfered with the use of reason and judgment, on that ground also it would be open to blame; but the motive was wholly religious. The process, moreover, had this to commend it, that it left no heartburnings; the decision was accepted as irreversible, and entirely just; there was no exultation of victory, no soreness of defeat. The act of settlement was outside human control, and therefore out of the field of human passion. The lot was a kind of sacrament, an outward sign full of deep significance. Even in our own word "clergy" the connection of thought remains, though the connection of use has long since passed away.

We are always trying to find the right man. If only he could be found, all would go well. But history is constantly reversing past judgments; sometimes, alas! we live long enough to reverse them for ourselves. There are many superannuated wrong men who were thought to be right men once. They were received with exaggerated praise, and dismissed with undeserved blame. Now and then it happens that the despised prophet is found to have been right after all, if that can be said to be found which is found too late.

The question suggests itself: Is the right man ever found? Is he not made? With one exception, the apostles justified their choice. Yet they were hardly the men who would have been pronounced beforehand to be the right men. One was fickle and impulsive, two were ambitious and intolerant, a fourth was despondent and hesitating, another, in his worldly calling, had had a bad training. The apostolate made the men. They were unpromising enough until they were put in trust; trusted, they became strong. Is it not better to have a constantly good system than an occasionally good man? Many of the highest departments, many of the most efficient institutions, in the country are so well ordered throughout that it matters little who the individual head or leader may be. The duties are distributed, the corporate sense of responsibility is strong. It is the service itself that trains the man, not the man called in who creates the service. There are schools and churches whose history is a record of failures, not so much in finding the right man, as in making him. The right place is of more consequence than the right man, for there is a disposing hand which moves amongst the "changes and chances" of this mortal life.

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meetings of the Midland Christian Union were held in the Newhall Hill Church, Birmingham, on Friday, March 11, the President, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, presiding. There was a large attendance of ministers and delegates.

The business meeting was held in the morning, when the SECRETARY, the Rev. A. H. Shelley, read the committee's report.

The first paragraph of the report expressed the great regret of the committee at the resignation of the secretaryship by Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, after holding the office for nearly ten years. He had been unsparing in his devotion of time and energy to the service of the Union, and his departure was felt to be a severe loss. Acknowledgment was made of the services of Rev. A. H. Shelley, Mr. Charlesworth's successor, who, accepting office in the middle of the year's work, had minimised the inconvenience necessarily resulting from such a change. The chief event of the year had been the initiation of the "Priestley Memorial Fund," proposed by the Rev. Joseph Wood at the previous annual meeting. It being found that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association had decided to apply part of its income to the promotion of lectures on theology and religion in various parts of the country, the idea of establishing a theological lectureship for the district had been abandoned, and it was decided to concentrate effort upon raising, by subscription and bazaar, a sum of £5,000, to enable the committee to adapt its policy to the requirements of the times, and to guarantee to that policy such support and continuity as would enable its effectiveness to be fairly put to the test.

Dr. RUSSELL, the treasurer, summarised the contents of the balance-sheet. The expenditure had exceeded the year's income by £134, and that income included a legacy of £50 from Miss Evers. That meant that by March, 1905, they would have spent, to make good their deficits, the whole of their capital which they could spend. Their hope was in the Priestley Fund. If its help were not forthcoming in a year's time they would have to reduce their work by 50 per cent.

The reports were adopted on the motion of the PRESIDENT, seconded by Mr. FORRESTER, the President suggesting that, the visitor having resigned, it might be well for members of the committee to visit the aided churches this year. They would lose the advantage of having all reported upon from one standard, but the members of the committee would learn more about the churches with which they had to deal. As regards the Autumnal Conferences he was inclined to think the small attendances in recent years scarcely compensated for the secretary's work in calling them, and suggested that special visits to the aided churches by the committee and delegates should take their place.

The roll having been called, Mr. DERRINGTON proposed, and Mr. TRANTER seconded, a vote of thanks to the old and the appointment of the new committee.

AFTERNOON CONFERENCE.

After luncheon, at the Great Western Hotel, the assembly met in the afternoon to hear an address by Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED on "The work of district associations; how to make mutual help effective." Having spoken generally on the importance of Sunday worship, and its influence on every-day life, Mr. Wicksteed said there were two kinds of churches that required assistance, namely, those that had seen their best days, and those that were hoping to see their best days. He made a number of suggestions as to the manner in which the central body might help those two classes of churches. Dealing with the churches that were going forward, he dwelt upon the importance of having several new movements in hand, and of recognising the value of local feeling. The locality must be made to work and to feel responsibility. The central body must go about the work confidently, and go about it not extravagantly, but he would almost say lavishly. With regard to the other class of churches, he said that if the religious spirit was really there, much good could be done by members, earnest men or women, delivering addresses in their own simple words. Local associations might do a great deal by arranging for exchanges amongst local speakers.

The CHAIRMAN moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Wicksteed for his address, and, in doing so, said it was the duty of an association like theirs to provoke inquiry amongst the people as to the cause of their indifference to religious observance. He emphasised the importance of combined effort, and went on to say that they had at the present time received promises of subscriptions amounting to £2,000 towards the £5,000 required for the Priestley Memorial Fund. If the delegates of the churches would go back to their congregations, feeling that the object was one worth working for, he had no doubt that they would prove successful in raising the necessary amount.

The Rev. Joseph Wood, in seconding the resolution, rejoiced in the amount of success that had already been attained, for which they owed very much indeed to the chairman of the meeting. They wanted another £1,000 in cash before they could see their way to making £5,000, and he trusted there would be a movement in every church to get subscriptions as well as gifts for the bazaar. Having spoken at length upon the duties of the ministers and of the laity, he said their treasurer had told them that morning that they spent £150 to £170 every year more than their ordinary income. To meet that they had drawn upon their capital, and had drawn upon it to such an extent that at the end of this next year their capital would be gone. Then what was to happen? Could any of them contemplate for a moment the giving up of such a work as they already had in hand. Could they imagine the help that they were giving to churches here and there being withdrawn? The crisis should arouse in them a feeling of enthusiasm to work together and raise the £5,000 required. They had already heard how successfully the movement had been commenced, but a great deal yet remained to be done. There were churches yet outside the work, and he appealed to those churches to come in and render help. He did not believe there was any so poor that it could not do anything. The Salvation Army had their self-denial week, and its success was most remarkable; why could they not have a self-denial week?

Mr. G. Basnett. Mr. H. New, the Rev. E. A. Vosey, and Mr. Perry also spoke to the resolution, which was carried unanimously, and was suitably acknowledged by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed.

A sermon was preached in the evening by the Rev. J. W. Austin.

AT EVENTIDE.

The clouds are spread o'er the evening sky;
Yet, through a rift in the grey, I spy
A star-lit space, a vault of blue,
Which the moon in her splendour is gliding through.

Anon up roll the clouds, and the stars are gone,
And dark is the night: Has the moon really shone—
And the stars—in the heavens? There is left not a ray
Of their brightness, to cheer or illumine my way.

Ah! thus in the days of the long, long ago,
At eventide, in the sunset's glow,
A wondrous peace, and a joy supreme
On my spirit fell! But they passed like a dream!

Yet a dream may be true! And who can say
That the blessed vision I had that day
Was a whit less real, or any less true
Than the moon or the stars that were seen in the blue? A.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

The district covered by our Association is most extensive, and this fact makes the working of it somewhat difficult. Included on our roll are places as far apart as Carlisle and Middlesbrough, Stockton and Choppington. Each congregation, too, has a distinct individuality of its own, and each church has its band of loyal workers and supporters, yet, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts they make, we are not able to say that we are progressing at all quickly. There are, perhaps, many ways of accounting for this fact, and easily the most reasonable one is that other denominations are coming more and more into line with our own theological position. In the country districts particularly we find our Primitive Methodist friends keeping in close touch with us, some of their local preachers taking a service now and then for us. In the larger districts, such as Newcastle, there are always one or two liberal-minded preachers. Recently a Congregational minister in this city, speaking on "What is Hell?" said in the course of his remarks, that > the idea of a future life, and of reward and punishment hereafter had wandered over the world with man, and was to be found in nearly every religion extant. It was not exclusively a Bible doctrine. He did not believe in a hell of eternal fire. It was absurd. It was taking literally what was meant to be understood figuratively. Man made his own hell. God did not make it; God made Heaven. It was man that made hell by a vicious life.

I wonder how much clearer any of our ministers could have stated our own position in regard to eternal punishment than this. Is it surprising, then, that many who at one time felt compelled to leave the orthodox churches are now able to retain their places, and so make it more difficult for us to make numerical progress?

We have had quite a stirring time here lately. Owing principally to the generosity of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association a series of Sunday evening services was held in the Town Hall, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the four Sunday evenings in February. The young people connected with the Church of the Divine Unity, assisted by those of the congregations at Byker and Gateshead, undertook in Newcastle and Gateshead a house-to-house distribution of 40,000 circulars announcing the services and containing the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie's plea for Unitarian Christianity. The attendances at the services were difficult to understand; they began at over 700, and diminished to something under 400. This was, of course, disappointing, especially when one takes into account the liberal manner in which the services were advertised. Still, some good must result from such a splendid piece of mission work as the distribution of the circulars. The three churches in the immediate district were open during the time of the special services. Mention must be made of the valuable help rendered by the members of the Unity Musical Society, who formed themselves into a choir for the four Sundays. The organist of the Church of the Divine Unity, Mr. E. J. Chapman, acted as choirmaster and presided at the grand organ, his own place being filled by Councillor Robert Affleck, J.P.

We have also had a sort of pastoral visit from the Rev. Jas. Harwood, of London, who came as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Mr. Harwood visited most of the churches on our roll. This new departure of our London friends cannot fail to produce good results, for Mr. Harwood not only took two services each Sunday, but delivered a week-night lecture at each place, and had conferences with the various Church Committees. Only those who know our smaller churches can realise what a great inspiration it is to the workers to have one of our trusted leaders amongst them. Earlier in the winter the Revs. Dendy Agate and Charles Roper visited some of our churches, and the Rev. Herbert V. Mills gave a course of three lectures on "Evolution and Religion" on three successive weeks at South Shields, Sunderland, and Gateshead in December. Mr. Mills is at present giving a further course of lectures at Byker, Choppington, and Stockton, so that we have been enabled during the winter months to arrange quite a large number of interesting meetings.

During the month of January the Rev. Frank Walters delivered at the Church of the Divine Unity a course of lectures to young men, which created a deep impression amongst those who heard them. It is pleasing to notice the large number of young folks of both sexes who attend the services regularly.

Arrangements are in progress for celebrating on Sunday, April 10, the 50th anniversary of the opening of the present church. The Rev. Henry Gow, of Hampstead, will be the special preacher. Mr. Richard Welford, the well-known local historian and antiquary, who is a member of the congregation, has undertaken to prepare and deliver a lecture giving a history of the church during those 50 years.

The mission church at Byker is again in the charge of the local Association, the transfer for a time of its management to the congregation of the Church of the Divine Unity not proving satisfactory. The services are conducted each Sunday by Mr. Charles Martin, one of our lay preachers. The congregation, which numbers some thirty-five members, are hoping some time in the near future to secure for themselves a permanent church, a piece of land having meanwhile been secured by one of our most generous North-country Unitarians. The Sunday-school flourishes, and would be even larger if the premises permitted the superintendent to take more scholars.

Carlisle is too far away from Newcastle for us to exchange many visits with each other; we occasionally get in touch, however, but not so frequently as we would like. The congregation is to be congratulated on the splendid manner in which they support the many institutions in connection with their church.

At Gateshead, the work so ably initiated by the Rev. Arthur Harvie, on behalf of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, keeps well to the front. The congregation early last year lost their leader

Mr. Harvie having removed to Northampton. The members, however, keep well together, and are now looking hopefully to the future under the ministry of the Rev. G. A. Ferguson. The Sunday-school and Band of Hope and Mercy are among the many institutions which are conducted by a number of enthusiastic workers.

An effort, by means of a sale of work next month, is being made by the South Shields congregation to raise a fund to enable them to have their church redecorated and made more cheerful. Being without a minister is a drawback to most of churches, but especially is this so in a place like South Shields, with its teeming population of over one hundred and twenty thousand people. The congregation, from one cause and another, has dwindled down to little more than a handful, who, however, work very hard to keep the church open. It ought to be possible to resuscitate a congregation in such a prosperous town. There is a splendid church, fairly well equipped, and free from debt, if only we could raise the means of securing the services of a thoroughly good man, even though he should have to divide his time between two congregations.

At Sunderland the congregation is suffering from a complaint which has troubled many of our churches in the large towns. The church at Sunderland is in the very centre of the town, and almost the last place of worship in that position. In consequence, the congregegation has suffered severely by its members removing to the outskirts of the town. I understand an offer has been made to them for the purchase of their property, and, it may be, that the congregation would be wise to adopt the plan of their one-time neighbours and sell their building, erecting with the proceeds a better equipped church in one of the residential portions of the town.

Not many of our congregations suffer in quite the same way as our friends at Middlesbrough, where, I understand, the work is hampered by want of space, not only in the schools, but in the church. This speaks volumes for those who are devoting their time and energies to making known our beautiful faith among the toilers of that quite modern though grimy town.

Stockton has come considerably closer to us here in Newcastle, lately, from the fact that the President of the Northumberland and Durham Association for the present year is also the secretary of the church in that place. I believe that in Stockton good steady progress is being made.

Darlington is rapidly becoming a manufacturing centre, and has grown enormously within the last five or six years. Our Lead Yard friends believe in feeling their way carefully, and presently we shall hope to hear that they have given an invitation which has been accepted, to one of our ministers to take charge of their pulpit. Barnard Castle will, of course, share in the benefit of such a settlement.

At Choppington we have a congregation of hardworking, horny-handed folk, who are a credit to our denomination. Most of the men work in the collieries in the district, which is quite famous for the number of men it has sent out to all parts of the world as political and social leaders.

Newcastle is a city much sought after in which to hold conferences, and one of the most important religious conferences which takes place during the year has recently been held in the city. I refer, of course, to the National Free Church Council. The committee of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association sent a resolution of welcome to the members which I understand was received with applause. The resolution was in the following terms:—

To the Members and Delegates of the National Free Church Council, assembled in the city of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, March 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th.

GENTLEMEN,—We, the members of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, beg to offer you a hearty welcome to this ancient city, and trust that your deliberations will be profitable not only to the Churches and Denominations which you represent, but to the community at large.

It will not appear inappropriate that ours should be amongst the many greetings awaiting you, when you learn that amongst the churches on the roll of our Association is that known as the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne, which is the present representative of the Old Hanover Square Chapel, one of the first Nonconformist places of worship in Newcastle, and whose list of ministers begins with the Rev. William Durant, who was ejected from All Saints' Church, Pilgrim Street, in 1662, and includes such illustrious names as those of the Rev. William Turner, who, about one hundred years ago, was President of the Association of Nonconformist Ministers of this city, and the Rev. George Harris. The Jubilee of the present church buildings will be celebrated in April of this year. Having so much in common, and sharing so frequently the inspirations of our respective leaders and thinkers, we feel that, though at present we are not invited to share in your deliberations, there is much sympathy between us, in that we are at heart one with you in the effort to bring the Kingdom of Heaven upon earth. We realise in you part of the army warring for the things of the spirit against the powers of materialism, an army in which we also serve. We therefore most heartily give you welcome, and pray the Divine blessing on all your labours."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Belfast Domestic Mission.—The annual sermons on behalf of the Stanhope-street Mission were preached on March 6, by the Rev. R. Travers Herford, of Stand, in the morning at the First Church, and in the evening at All Souls. The annual meeting was held in All Souls' Church on the following evening. After tea and a brief recital on the organ, the chair was taken by Mr. Richard Patterson, J.P., of Holywood, and there was a large attendance of subscribers and friends. Miss C. Bruce read the committee's report, which gave an encouraging record of the year's work. The Mission buildings having been enlarged, in celebration of the Jubilee, were reopened Oct. 3, 1903, and had since been fully occupied with the various activities of the Mission. A satisfactory financial statement was also presented. The Rev. G. J. Slipper, in his report of work at the Mission, said that they had tried to embrace the greater opportunities afforded them by the rebuilding and enlargement of their premises. With a new lease of life they had sought to expand the scope of their work, so much requiring to be done in face of the great needs which confront them. In quiet ways the Mission had taken part in the Christlike service of uplifting the poor, seeking, irrespective of religious differences, and without any semblance of proselytism, to influence the wayward and indifferent towards higher and nobler purposes of life; showing practical sympathy with those who had fallen under trial and adversity; helping many who had evinced a desire to help themselves, and in every way striving to awaken a deeper sense of God's love and grace within the hearts of those who were crushed in life's battle. In the internal work of the Mission there was much that afforded encouragement. Numerically they had gained both in the attendances at their services and their Sunday-schools. The Boys' Brigade, the Men's Club, the Guild, the Band of Mercy, and the Band of Hope, were each in a flourishing condition as regarded attendance and funds. A new library would be opened early in March, and towards this object the Misses Bruce and Mr. A. Duffin had given generous aid. The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the reports, paid a tribute to Mr. Slipper for his devoted work. The motion was seconded by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, and supported by the Revs. R. T. Herford, D. Walmsley, and G. V. Crook, in earnest speeches, and unanimously passed. The committee was appointed, and a vote of thanks to the chair brought the meeting to a close.

Blackley: Manchester.—On the first Sunday of the present year Mr. J. J. Brown completed the long period of forty years' service in the Sunday-school, and the teachers felt that such an event called for special recognition. A subscription list was opened, and contributions were freely given by both teachers and scholars. Last Sunday afternoon a gold watch, bearing his monogram and a suitable inscription, was presented to Mr. Brown by the Rev. W. Holmshaw, on behalf of the subscribers. Mr. Holmshaw spoke of the value of the services Mr. Brown had rendered, and of the force of the example he had set, and Mr. Brown, in acknowledging the gift, gave expression to his deep sense of the importance of Sunday-school work for all concerned in it.

Crewkerne.—The annual distribution of prizes in connection with the Sunday-school took place at the Town Hall on Wednesday, March 2. 120 scholars had gained the required number of marks to qualify for prizes, and these received suitable books, at the hands of Mrs. Edward J. Blake. There was a very large attendance of parents and friends.

Hinckley (Resignation).—The Rev. W. G. Price has intimated to the Great Meeting Congregation that at the end of May he will terminate his ministry at Hinckley, where he has been settled since leaving the Home Missionary College in 1894.

Leeds: Holbeck (Welcome Meeting).—A meeting was held on Monday evening to welcome the Rev. W. R. Shanks, the newly-appointed minister. After tea, at which about a hundred were present, Mr. J. T. Kitchen took the chair, supported by the Revs. C. Hargrove, J. Fox, A. H. Dolphin, O. Binns, E. Lockett, J. M. Whiteman, J. A. Pearson (representing the Manchester District Association); Messrs. Grosvenor Talbot, E. Basil Lupton, and others. Sir James Kitson wrote apologising for absence, and sending his good wishes, and letters were also received from the Revs. E. Ceredig Jones, A. W. Fox, T. P. Spedding, and others. The chairman, on behalf of the congregation, offered a hearty welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Shanks, as did Mr. B. Pearson on behalf of the Sunday-school. Mr. Grosvenor Talbot then spoke as President of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, expressing his pleasure that so many friends from near and far had come to join in that welcome. He hoped that the congregation would not only welcome Mr. and Mrs. Shanks, but would heartily work with them, and give them the true help of sympathy and appreciation. The Rev. Charles Hargrove also joined in the welcome, which Mr. Shanks then acknowledged. He came, he said, to preach, as earnestly as he could, great principles and truths, and he trusted that his labours would result in the quickening of the life of the congregation. It was a great gratification to him to be called to a church which had such a magnificent school and suite of class-rooms. All his life he had been a Sunday-school worker, and he desired to continue his labours in that direction. Unitarian church building must be carried on like the work of a steeple-jack—from within. If their congregations were to grow, they must, in the very nature of things, grow through the Sunday-school. The other ministers present also gave short addresses, and a vote of thanks to the speakers brought the meeting to a close.

London: Central Postal Mission.—A A very pleasant soirée of the members and friends of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union was held, on the invitation of the president and committee, at Essex Hall, on Wednesday evening. The guests were received by Miss Tagart, the president; Miss Florence Hill, the hon. secretary; and other members of the committee; London ministers and lay-preachers, and Postal Mission correspondents being well represented in the gathering. The first part of the evening, when tea and coffee were served, was spent in conversation, after which Miss Tagart took the chair, supported on the platform by Miss Clephan, Mrs. Ginever, and Miss F. Hill, who read several letters of regret for absence. Miss Tagart, having offered a warm welcome to all the friends present, and especially to the correspondents of the Mission, said that evening was the conclusion of a most interesting and helpful series of conferences which they had held, and which she hoped would be renewed next winter. They had been greatly indebted to the Rev. G. Critchley and to Mr. T. J. Hardy, for the valuable papers they had read. She then offered a cordial welcome to Mrs. Ginever, and spoke with much feeling of the Unitarians of Hungary, from whom she said they might learn much. Mrs. Ginever then gave an eloquent address in fluent English, telling of some of the early romantic associations of Englishmen with her country, and concluding with a reference to the inspiration Hungary had gained, in her efforts after truth and liberty, from English writers at the end of the eighteenth and in the nineteenth century. Miss Clephan also spoke as one who was engaged in Postal Mission correspondence, which, she said, compelled one to a thorough study of Unitarian literature. Correspondents sometimes sought for logical assistance, sometimes for sympathy, and to give the latter was the greatest privilege. Correspondents often grew to be real friends, even though they never met, and it was a great happiness to be allowed to help in that way, and to bring light to those who were seeking companionship in knowledge of the higher life. Later in the evening Miss Tagart announced that it would not be possible to arrange any summer holiday party for the present year, but in connection with the International Conference, which would probably be held in Geneva next year at the beginning of September, they might possibly be able to organise an August party, but nothing definite could be fixed at present. During the evening songs were sung by Mr. Collard and Miss Burgess, and Miss Winifred Robinson gave the greatest pleasure by her masterly rendering of some violin solos. The music contributed greatly to the success of the evening.

London: Mansford-street.—The Rev. John Ellis spoke on Sunday on the "Transvaal Labour Question." The congregation passed a resolution in the strongest terms protesting against the importation of Chinese labour into the Transvaal. The resolution was sent to the Prime Minister, the Member of Parliament for South-west Bethnal Green, and the Daily News.

London: Plumstead.—On Tuesday evening, March 8, a very successful "Social" was held in the little Hall of the Unitarian Church at Plumstead Common-road. There was a large attendance of members, with an unusually large number of strangers. The Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, J.P. (Mayor) received a very hearty ovation in recognition of his return at the head of the poll to the L.C.C. on the previous Saturday. The Social was organised by the ladies of the Sewing Society, who themselves paid all expenses in order to devote as much as possible to the funds of the Society now engaged in preparing for a Bazaar in connection with the projected new Church Building Fund. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards recently lectured here on "Grand Old Oliver, the Uncrowned King." The subject proved to be a taking one, and the lecture was much appreciated.

Manchester: Lower Mosley-street.—At the close of last Sunday evening service an interesting gathering was held. Fifty-five persons received their cards of membership, and were welcomed into the Congregational Society, which exists to promote the worship of God. The Rev. A. Cobden Smith, in an earnest address, congratulated them upon their resolve to uplift the real religious life of those schools, and hoped the power of God might continually be made manifest. He trusted the Divine blessing would consecrate their fellowship, strengthen the true bonds of brotherhood, and inspire a living friendship. The cards of membership were then distributed, and an impressive ceremony concluded.

Manchester: Pendleton (Welcome Meeting).—A reception and soirée were held in the schoolroom of the Unitarian Free Church on Saturday, March 12, to welcome the newly-appointed minister, the Rev. Neander Anderton, B.A., and Mrs. Anderton. About 180 members and friends sat down to tea, after which an organ recital was given in the church, followed by the Welcome Meeting in the schoolroom. Mr. I. Wigley, chairman of the church committee, presided. In the official welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Anderton, Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson spoke on behalf of the church, Mr. J. Milner on behalf of the Sunday-school, and Mr. Councillor Robertson on behalf of the affiliated societies of the church and school. Amongst the ministers present were Principal Gordon, the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, P. M. Higginson, Ambrose Bennett, C. J. Street, A. H. Dolphin, W. E. George, W. C. Hall, Charles Roper, F. Allen, Joseph Anderton, T. Lloyd Jones, George Knight, A. J. Pearson, W. Holmshaw, J. Ruddle, and J. W. Bishop; Rev. James Clark (Bible Christian); Rev. J. G. Skemp, M.A. (Baptist); Rev. Donald Fraser (Congregationalist); also Mr. J. P. Thomasson and Mr. Frankland, of Bolton, many of whom, after the chairman's address, made speeches joining in the welcome. A number of letters of apology and congratulation were received, including one from Mr. Percy H. Leigh, president of the governing body of the District Association. The Chairman, in his opening address, rejoiced in the close of a trying interregnum of about eighteen months, during which they had been without a minister, and spoke with much pleasure and hope of the future. They had, meanwhile, succeeded in raising a fund of £500 out of which to liquidate the small debt on current account, reduce or clear off the balance of mortgage, brighten and make the church more attractive, and offer a more liberal stipend to the minister. This had been done by the bazaar held in November last, together with subscriptions of members and outside friends, and grants from the B. and F.U.A. and the Memorial Hall trustees. The lighting of the church had been improved, the seats supplied with new cushions, and the new Essex Hall Hymnal adopted. Rev. Neander Anderton, in response to the welcome, gave an admirable address, full of encouragement, and closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman, the visitors, and others who had contributed to the success of the meeting. This was seconded by the Rev. F. Allen (London), and, after singing a hymn, Rev. P. M. Higginson closed with prayer and benediction.

Manchester.—Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter concluded his course of lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" on Thursday week before a good audience. A marked feature in the composition of the audience has been the large proportion of men, who have all through been in the majority. Various denominations have been represented, and the Nonconformist colleges have sent a considerable number of their students. The average attendance has been 163. On the motion of Mr. W. H. Talbot, town clerk of Manchester, a very hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Carpenter for his most welcome services during the past six weeks.

Merthyr Tydfil (Religious Services for the People).—The second of this series of services was held in the Theatre Royal on Sunday last at 8 p.m., the Rev. John Page Hopps again officiating. In all essential features the service partook of the same character as the first, the attendance being very good, the audience orderly and attentive. The subject of Mr. Hopps' address was: "The Universal God and the Universal Religion." He said that he could not give a definition of God. We get God when we cease to define Him. The greatest of inferences is the existence of God. He said he was more sure of God than of himself. He did not know what God is or how He works—that was beyond his ken. He was bound to infer Him. There are also spiritual indications of God, that is to say, indications of his preferences. It is easier to say what He wishes than to say what He is. Starting from this foundation, the existence of God, he arrived at the conception of God as one. The portraits of God are many. It is a far cry from Juggernaut to Jesus, from Baal to Father—all such discordant portraits were portraits of God. These divergencies exist in the Bible. Calvin and Channing talked of God, but their conceptions of Him were as far removed as Peter the Great from King Alfred. The different names by which God is known are nothing, but the essential characteristics of God are everything. As we emerge from the brutalities of the God idea we perceive the human link uniting the whole. It is time to dismiss the divergent portraits of God, and to unite the God behind them all. The peoples whom we are pleased to call idolaters and heathens have the same longings, hopes and fears as civilised and Christian nations; the same God above us is in power. The ideal God is always emerging, and becomes a little more consistent as our ideas of Him get more beautiful. In speaking of the Universal religion, Mr. Hopps said that it has been the delusion of every church that it is infallible, and in this way Christianity has produced a mob of mutually contending parties. He believed Christianity to be the greatest organisation of religion, and the likeliest to have universal religion in it. In conclusion, he said that man's instinct is to be loyal to that above him, and to what, for the time being, he believes to be the best. Man has emerged from the brute to the human and the divine—all the processes leading to that climax. Religion is the uprising of the human above the brutal, his victory over the lowest stages of his nature. Darwin and Spencer ought to have understood the saying of Paul: "Wherefore if any man is in Christ he is a new creature: the old things are passed away: behold, they are become new." Mr. Hopps also lectured at the Unitarian Chapel, on Thursday, March 10, on "Two of Carlyle's Heroes: Shakespeare and Cromwell." He gave a masterly exposition of Carlyle's idea of "heroes," and entered beautifully into the philosopher's conception of the hero as poet in the person of Shakespeare, and as king in the person of Cromwell. The lecture was highly appreciated by a crowded audience of townspeople reinforced by a contingent of Dowlais friends.

Pontypridd.—The twelfth anniversary services of the Unitarian Church were held at the Lesser Town Hall on Sunday last. The service in the afternoon was conducted by the Rev. John Page Hopps, and in the evening by the Rev. W. Whitaker. Stirring and helpful discourses were given, and the services were well attended, a large number of tracts being distributed at the close.

Portsmouth: High St.—The Rev. Dendy Agate, having visited Southampton and Ringwood on behalf of the B. and F.U.A., preached last Sunday at the High-street Church, taking for his evening subject "What think ye of Christ?" when he had a good and thoroughly appreciative congregation. Tracts and pamphlets were freely distributed from house to house in the neighbourhood.

Ringwood.—On Friday, March 11, the Rev. Dendy Agate, of Altrincham, President of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, conducted a special service, and preached on "A Unitarian's Interpretation of the Gospel" from Matt. xix. 17: "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." This was one of the missionary visits organised by the B. and F.U.A., and our small country congregations are greatly indebted to the Association for the strengthening and encouragement thus afforded. The attendance numbered between forty and fifty, including some from other communions.

Shrewsbury.—On Sunday, the 6th inst., the annual meeting of the High-street congregation was held, when the report and balance-sheet for the year ending December 21 last were presented by the secretary and treasurer (Mr. R. Mansell). The report referred at some length to the great changes which had been made in the Church building and school-room, and to the valuable services rendered by the minister (Rev. James C. Street). Through the generous and unstinting efforts of Mr. Street, the Shrewsbury Congregation have one of the most compact and prettiest churches in the denomination, besides having acquired some adjoining property.

...N INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT

By PROFESSOR A. JÜLICHER.
Translated by JANET PENROSE WARD.

In this work Professor Jülicher gives an account—first, of each separate document of the New Testament, going into such questions as authorship, date, and the circumstances under which it was written; next, of the gradual rise of the canon; and, lastly, of the main features of Textual History. His standpoint throughout is that of the free historical inquirer.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

EASTER falls early this year, and next year will be three weeks later, Good Friday being April 21. That day will be the hundredth anniversary of the birth of James Martineau. Centenary celebrations will, therefore, doubtless be arranged for some other date; but in the churches of which he was the minister, the anniversary will mark the religious services of that day with a special significance.

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD, who had long been in failing health, borne with undaunted courage and sincerity, died on Thursday week, in his seventy-second year. Born in June, 1832, at Gravesend, the second son of Mr. Robert Coles Arnold, a Sussex magistrate, he was at King's College, London, with the late Dean Farrar, and helped to keep order in the lecture room of F. D. Maurice. Proceeding to Oxford he became a scholar of University College, and in 1853 won the Newdigate. From 1856 to 1861 he was Principal of the Government Deccan College, Poona, and was in India through the Mutiny. Coming home on leave in the latter year, he became a leader writer on the Daily Telegraph, and for the rest of his life remained in that service. He was thrice married, his second wife being a daughter of the late Rev. W. H. Channing; his third wife, a Japanese lady, whom he married in 1897, survives him.

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD was a brilliant journalist and an indefatigable author in verse and prose. He was strongly drawn to Oriental modes of thought and life, and his most popular work was "The Light of Asia," a poem telling in the person of a Buddhist votary the story of Prince Gautama, the Buddha. This was first published in 1879, and did much to popularise the Buddhist teaching by its picturesque and vivid presentment of the subject. Sir Edwin's later poem, "The Light of the World," was not so successful as a whole, though it contained some beautiful passages. The following verses, in slightly varying form, occur more than once in the course of the poem:—

Peace beginning to be,
Deep as the sleep of the sea,
When the stars their faces glass
In its blue tranquillity;
Hearts of men upon earth
Never once still from their birth,
To rest as the wild waters rest
With colours of Heaven on their breast.

Love, which is sunlight of peace,
Age by age to increase,
Till Anger and Hate are dead
And Sorrow and Death shall cease:
"Peace on Earth and Goodwill!"
Souls that are gentle and still Hear the first music of this Far-off, infinite bliss!

WE have delayed too long a notice of Mr. Stopford Brooke's new volume of sermons, "The Kingship of Love." (Isbister & Co. 6s.) The twenty-five sermons are those preached in Little Portland-street Chapel during the winter of 1902-3, from the opening sermon after the summer holiday, "From the Sea to the City," through Christmas and the New Year, to Easter, with a final sermon on "The Close of the Year." From this we quote the last sentences:—

Again and again we have had our Calvary, crucified with Christ; again and again our Easter Days, risen with Christ into a new life. Again and again our old year has died in pain; again and again the New Year has given us a fresh impulse, another love, another work, another hope. Each has lifted us forward in inward progress. The soul is now accustomed to Resurrection. Life, indeed, not death, is its native element. And as it rises into life again and again, it comes to know, with innate certainty, that it cannot die. The knowledge deepens year by year, as we draw nigh to age and death. Death changes its aspect. It is not the grisly terror we feared of old. It wears the features of a joyful and happy child. And when we slip into its embrace we hear the voice of Christ: "I am risen; rise with me into the perfect life with God, my Father and your Father. Come and follow me, as on earth, so now in heaven. The old year is dead, the new has dawned."

THE great demonstration in Hyde Park last Saturday showed clearly on which side organised labour stands in the momentous controversy over the Transvaal Labour Importation Ordinance. It would be strange indeed were trade unionists not hostile to a movement which has for its twofold object the exclusion of "that trail of the serpent, the formation of labour unions" among white miners, and the importation of labour at a lower wage than the blacks can be got to accept. It is remarkable how persistently the apologists of the Ordinance ignore these two cardinal elements of the situation. Over and over again they declare that the fact that white men will not work with black is the sole reason why white men cannot be employed except as overseers, though some, it is true, have the candour to add that white labour would be too costly. All, however, ignore the obvious fact that it is not necessary to mix white and black labour in a single mine or a single branch of the work of a mine, and that it would be perfectly easy to have one mine a black one and another a white, or to employ black men below ground and white at the surface.

THEY ignore, too, the fact that exclusively white labour has been employed by Mr Creswell at the Village Main Reef Mine on various surface processes at actually less cost per ton than black labour, but that he was called off by his chairman of directors on the ground of the "feeling" of the Consolidated Gold Fields Company, Messrs. Werner, Beit & Co., and his own board, that a large number of white men employed on the Rand would have the result

That by combination the labour classes will become so strong as to be able to more or less dictate, not only on the question of wages, but also on political questions, by the power of their votes when representative government is established.

Mr. Creswell, by the bye, has since been compelled to resign his position, and his interesting and too instructive experiments have ceased. As to the other motive for the agitation, the desire for cheaper labour than that afforded by the Kaffirs, the thing is made evident (1) by the steady refusal to make good the reduction in Kaffirs' wages which took place after the war, despite the patent fact that it is that reduction which has been the primary cause of such scarcity of labour as exists; and (2) by the offer to the wretched Chinese labourers of only 25s. a month, against the minimum of 30s. a month paid to the Kaffir since the war, and the £4 a month he received before the war.

THESE two facts—the desire of the Randlords to exclude Trade Unionism and political power from Rand labour, and their determination to find creatures who will undersell the Kaffir in the labour market—have sunk deep into the minds of Trade Unionists at home. But there is a third fact—the conditions of labour to be imposed upon the men it is proposed to import. Trade Unionists at home, protected by elaborate factory regulations, truck Acts, electoral rights, and the splendid organisation of their unions, have been appalled at the restrictions which the mine owners seek to impose upon the new immigrants, and the state of utter helplessness and subjection to which these would reduce them. These restrictions are resented first and foremost on grounds of mere humanity, and through a keenly aroused sense of responsibility for the good government of this new province of the Empire which has come under our charge in so terrible a manner. But there is undoubtedly another feeling at work—the conviction that if working men once admit the plea of necessity in justification of cheap servile labour on the Rand gold fields, the same plea may be raised with the same object nearer home, and their power of resisting it be seriously diminished.

Servile labour has, alas! been permitted on the confines of the Empire before now, but not with the active assent of labour at home. We look forward, as a happy by-product of the present agitation, to the material improvement of the lot of coloured workers in the near future in all parts of the British dominion. But the final triumph of the advocates of the new Ordinance in South Africa would now mean that our "Imperial race" at home, composed to so large an extent of manual workers, knew that conditions of slavery existed under their sway, knew the methods by which they were imposed, and accepted both as natural and right. And when once a people deliberately acquiesces in perpetration of tyranny in its name the days of its own freedom are surely numbered. There are abundant signs that the present spirit of reaction, if it goes unchecked, will soon make yet further inroads on the right of combination at home, which, after all, misused though it may have been, is the bulwark of the labouring classes against the tyrannous use of the power of capital.

Political surprises never cease! Less than two years ago an Act of Parliament was passed which offended the mind and conscience of at least half the people of England and two-thirds of the people of Wales; this week the same Government have introduced an Education Bill for Scotland, which embodies nearly all the main principles which leading reformers have been urging upon the attention of the country for many years past. Scotland is accorded powers and privileges which are denied to England and Wales. Enlarged or re-modelled School Boards are to be entrusted with complete public control over elementary and secondary education; they are to be specially elected for this work; and the big towns are to retain their School Boards, only with increased powers. Some day, perhaps, those of us who live south of the Tweed will be permitted to fare as well as those in the North.

Thomas Pargeter's of Foxcote Charity.—The 37th annual meeting of the trustees of this charity was held on the 21st inst. at the offices of Messrs. Harding and Goode, 32, Waterloo-street, Birmingham, the Rev. J. Hardinge Matthews in the chair, the other trustees present being the Revs. J. Worsley Austin, Henry Eachus, E. D. Priestley Evans, J. Bellamy Higham, Henry McKean, A. H. Thomas, Alfred Thompson, and Joseph Wood. The officers appointed for the ensuing year were as follows:—Chairman, the Rev. A. H. Shelley; Treasurer, Mr. F. H. Jordan, of Lloyds Bank, Temple-row; Auditors, the Revs. A. H. Thomas and J. Worsley Austin; Secretary, Mr. Charles Harding; and Deputy Secretary, Mr. C. Copeley Harding. The few vacancies which had arisen during the year in consequence of the deaths of annuitants had been filled up from time to time from the large and ever-increasing list of highly-eligible applicants, many of whom have been on the books for long periods, and whose hope of election is of course remote, the resources of the trust being limited; though it is gratifying to record that a friend of the charity has continued his donation of £100, and by the aid of this gift and the donation of £50 reported at the last annual meeting, the benefit of the charity has been extended beyond the limit necessarily fixed by its normal income as derived from invested funds. At the present time there are altogether 107 recipients on the books; of these 99 receive £20 a year each and the other eight (being sisters) £16 a year each. As may be imagined, the applicants for the charity are exceedingly numerous, and in very many cases most deserving, facts which should be borne in mind by all who intend applying, as the knowledge may prevent the disappointment which usually accompanies the non-success of the applicant. The essential qualifications of applicants for this charity (which has been in active operation since 1868) are:—(a) That they be ladies of not less than 55 years of age who have never been married; (b) That they have received the education and moved in the position of gentlewomen; and (c) That they have made a strenuous but unavailing effort to support themselves. Vacancies are filled up as they arise, and the selection is made without regard to the religious belief or place of residence of applicants.

What, now, is the richest possession of mankind in this twentieth Christian century? Not our material gains, not our liberties and laws, not our arts and sciences, not the rich flowering of literature. It is not even our belief in God. It is our belief in God as the Father; in His boundless, impartial, unpurchased love for us all; in our kinship with Him, and therefore in the greatness and incalculable worth of the soul. It is our belief that, while we have bodies, we are not bodies; because as God is a spirit, so we are spirits; that our life is hidden and safe in His life; that the love in our hearts is His love, that He is the living Head of the family of souls, and that not one of us can ever fall out of His hand.

IN LICHFIELD CATHEDRAL.

Sleep, sleep, sweet children, your enchanted sleep,
By no malignant magic bound!
Oh! never ripple on this marble deep
Be stirred by aweless sound.

They sleep, as sweetly as the snowdrop sleeps
In that small hand, their beauty sleep!
With all so sweet yet loose a clasp, Death keeps
The flowers himself doth reap.

From such dear loving hands in Lethe drenched,
God's youngest angel yields them too!
Oh! bleeding stems whence such sweet buds were wrenched,
How sped the years for you?

E. L. H. Thomas.

In France, as well as nearer home, the idea of a closer union of the Protestant churches seems to be taking practical shape. With us, the Established Church on the one hand, and the heterodox churches on the other, have as a rule been left out of any alliances that have been formed or projected. On the other side of the Channel neither the question of creed nor that of connection with the State is regarded as an insuperable barrier. A provisional committee, representing four of the most important sections of French Protestantism, has drawn up a scheme of federation which is to be submitted for ratification to the next annual meetings of the churches concerned.

The first article of the proposed union declares that "The unofficial General Synod of the Reformed Churches of France, the General Assembly of the Liberal Reformed Churches of France, the Union of Free Evangelical Churches of France, and the Methodist Evangelical Church of France . . . . resolve to form a Protestant Federation. Of the bodies named, the first two represent the Orthodox and Liberal sections of the National Reformed Church, which has been connected with the State for the past hundred years; while the third and fourth are small but vigorous communities, in which the Orthodox type of thought prevails, though the Liberal spirit is by no means absent from the 'Free Evangelical Churches.'" It is further laid down that the Federation shall let the principles, discipline, form of worship, and organisation of each church subsist in their integrity. Its first object will be to defend, whenever necessary, the liberty of Protestant worship and the rights of the federated churches. It will also endeavour to draw Protestant churches and workers into closer relations with one another. The Council of the Protestant Federation is to be composed of two representatives of each denomination, and is only to take action when its members are agreed. It will be the duty of the Council to convene public assemblies as often as may be desirable, to promote the ethical and social aspirations of French Protestantism, and to endeavour to bring the other Protestant churches into the Federation.

BROOKE HERFORD.

By Paul Revere Frothingham.*

Minister at Arlington Street.

The debt that this church owes to Mr. Herford is distinct and very considerable. He must always rank among the noblest and most effective in its long line of able and distinguished ministers. The society was in a weak and almost dejected condition when he came from Chicago to assume the leadership. Indeed, it must have been in much the same "destitute state" that it was when Channing was invited to become the minister. The comparison is interesting and suggestive; for it became Brooke Herford's task to restore, at least in an outward sense, the glories of Channing's days of influence and power. Those of you who remember the change that speedily came with his presence here know something of the magnitude of what he quietly accomplished. We can almost see again the eager, earnest, reverent faces of the people, who looked up to him, and listened gratefully and gladly to his simple, forceful words of practical helpfulness and wisdom.

His Strong Humanity.

We may fairly say of Mr. Herford, as some one wisely said of Browning, that "his human nature was the strongest thing in him." He was a man of large endowment, with deep feelings, a warm heart, and natural and abundant sympathies. When he took you by the hand, you knew that he was interested in your welfare, and that, if you ever needed him, you could count on his assistance. He had, as all of us who knew him well can testify, a remarkable power of winning the confidence of people and learning their needs, and then of speaking the friendly word or doing the kindly act which lent comfort, light, and cheer. His general presence and influence may be best described as "fatherly." He seemed to take you up into the very abundance of his nature, and to fold you around with the warmth of genuine affection. Hence it was that young people in particular were attracted to him. He knew how to interest them, because he first of all was interested in them.

Simplicity and Earnestness.

If we speak of more personal characteristics, it is certain that no man was ever much more free than he from vanity and affectation. He was contented to be simple, earnest, downright, sturdy. He had none of the artificialities of social life, and none of the pretensions and self-assertions of popularity and power. You knew what he thought because he frankly told you, and his convictions were as manifest as his kindliness of spirit.

That he was possessed of deep emotions and impetuous impulses, against which he had to struggle forcibly and constantly, cannot well be doubted. He practised self-restraint. His will was strong; and he liked his own way best, as men of power almost always do. He had no fear of contention, and was bold in giving emphasis to differences of doctrinal belief. He was willing on occasion to force an issue, and could speak strong words in defence of his position. This came from the fact that he was a natural leader of men, and it was also due to the deep and vital nature of his faith. His religious beliefs were exceedingly dear and precious, and they found in him an ever ardent champion and defender.

A Helpful Preacher.

And surely, as we look back now and measure the extent and nature of his influence, we can say that working hours were seldom better or more nobly spent. How clearly we can see, how distinctly we can almost hear him as he stood up in this pulpit to unfold the meaning and the mysteries of the religious life! His power as a preacher was unique. In certain respects—at least in the extent to which he carried one particular quality—I do not think I have ever known his equal. While he was lacking in certain dramatic elements, he excelled in plainness, directness, and simplicity of speech. He never rose on wings of rhetoric to what men understand as eloquence; his feet were firmly planted on the earth. But he did what was better; he called attention to the meaning and the glory of the things around us. He dignified the commonplace, interpreted the simple, and transfigured the evident and prosaic. He met his hearers where they were, and talked to them of things divine that compass each and all of us along the path of daily life. Thus he was helpful, suggestive, stimulating, and wondrously effective.

Reality in Religion.

But more than all else it was true of Mr. Herford, and a secret of his deep and extensive influence, that he made religious life and thought a practical reality and a part of daily existence. As he gave the impression of living his religion out himself to the best of his ability, and with constant prayer and earnest application, so he made more evident to others the natural sacraments of love and hope, of duty, effort, aspiration, and desire. He had the faculty of making people understand that they often were religious when they did not know it. He understood that the unseen things are often the most real, that the heavenly world is near and actual; and he left in people's minds the need and the value of "patient continuance in well-doing." These were among the qualities, these the mental and spiritual powers, that contributed to make him "a faithful minister in the Lord."

At Harvard.

His pulpit powers were such that he had always gained a strong hold over young men. It was natural, therefore, that Harvard College should turn to him; and he was honoured by being appointed one of the University preachers. The impression that he made upon the students was marked and characteristic. They enjoyed his directness and plainness of speech. His services were likewise appreciated by the authorities of the University; and Harvard, who is never careless in the bestowal of her honours, adopted him among her sons, conferring on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

A True Conservative.

Through all this time Mr. Herford was distinctly and avowedly conservative in his religious thought. Indeed, the cast of his mind was almost evangelical. He was a son of the Old World, where institutions are deeply rooted; and he loved with pathetic and contagious fervour old words, old expressions, and interpretations. He was never reconciled to the new and reconstructive religious thinking of his day. The sense of historic continuity was strong within him, and it is said that he described himself as "conservative without apology." Perhaps for that reason there was a tenderness, a fervour, a reality, a deep expressiveness about his faith that was often beautiful and touching. He had convictions, and not sentiments only; deep, heart-felt, life-wrought faiths, and not mere fluttering beliefs. Few men have had more courage, perseverance, or deep trust in things divine than he; and his trust survived the shocks of fortune and the deepest sorrows life can know, while it flowered with new beauty and devoutness in the soil of pain and loss.

In London at the Close.

His strength was spared him for a decade nearly in the London work; and there at home, among the people of his birth, he rounded out full fifty years of active service in his Master's cause. In the meantime he did not forget the people and the church that he had left behind, The letters that came back from the English work to faithful friends, who had regretted most his going, were filled with expressions of affection and good will. "My heart is, as ever, with the old church," he wrote as recently as October, 1900, to the Chairman of the Prudential Committee.

In the early autumn of 1899 I made my way to the Hampstead Chapel, and heard again the familiar voice in prayer and sermon. The church was full. Strong men sat there in the pews, and received with profit the helpful, earnest, candid words which always bespoke such personal faith and encouraged so directly honest, holy, faithful living. But the old-time vigour had departed. The strong and joyous hold on life had gone, and was never to return. The end already could be dimly seen, and from that time on he visibly approached it. The silver cord of energy was slowly loosened, until at last the golden bowl of consecration fell apart.

From all of this, however—from all the pain of parting and the sense of loss—we turn back gladly and with tender, grateful reverence to the "faithful minister in the Lord" as we knew and loved him in this place. We have not lost him, we shall never lose him; for "our dead are never dead to us until we have forgotten them." Neither is he lost or dead to this dear church for which he did so much, and whose welfare never failed until the last to claim his interest and elicit his concern.

The work he did here will abide, and bear fruit in abundance through many an opening year. It is a permanent possession, a spiritual asset, a precious legacy. Loyalty to his memory on the part of the people of this church is the truest evidence they can hope to give of loyalty to others, to the cause of free and spiritual faith, and to that pure and undefiled religion which he made so real and beautiful.

* Passages from a memorial sermon preached in the Arlington-street Church, Boston, Massachusetts. The whole sermon is in the Christian Register of Feb. 4.

RELIGION AND LIFE.

We hope that not a few readers of the Inquirer have made acquaintance with the most suggestive and thoughtful book which has been before the world for some three years: we refer to the "plain essay," entitled "Religion and Life,"* by Mr. Rollo Russell. In one respect the author has not made his readers' task an easy one, for though his book is forcibly and eloquently written, and is evidently the work of a thoughtful and richly-stored mind, he has spread his material through two hundred and ten pages without partition into chapters, without headings or divisions of any sort other than those made by the paragraphs! There can be little doubt that this would have an almost paralysing effect on the efforts of some readers to find their way through a discussion which, notwithstanding, is well worth the attention of all.

The Test of Truth.

The author's theme is "the causes of the failure of doctrine, the gulf between rule and practice" in modern Christendom:—

The really great problem, not only for Churches, but for all humanity to work out, is the assimilation of wisdom by life, the determined and thorough naturalisation of those principles which we know on the highest authority, and in the temple of the undistracted mind, to be the best. It is in this respect that the teachers to whom we naturally look for help afford the least guidance, for they present to us an ideal, and ask us to worship it, but when, in some "present crisis," the test of the cross-bearer approaches, the main body of them tell us to forsake it and flee. Therefore the catastrophes of the city which knew not the things that belonged to her peace are repeated to-day. They are not inevitable, for the power of religion over the future of the world emerges from the "law of the Spirit of life."

Results of Ripe Experience.

The book, Mr. Russell tells us, has been the work, at intervals, of twenty-seven years, has been subject to revision and growth, and expresses the surviving conclusions of periods both of stress and quietness. We do not, therefore, look for any very systematic arrangement of parts. But on this account, its interest, as giving the ripe results of a life's experience, is the greater. However, a number of recurring lines of thought are plainly to be seen; chief among these are a general interpretation of pure or natural religion—its basis in human nature, and its confirmation in the facts and suggestions of the outward world; a drastic criticism of the shortcomings of ecclesiastical Christianity; and a relentless exposure of the social wrongs and vices of civilisation—"high teaching, base practice." In some of the matters spoken of in this latter connection, Mr. Russell has drawn his picture in colours much too dark, simply because he has apparently in his own mind settled certain complex practical questions as if by some immediate intuition, and then assumes that any who see those questions otherwise, do so through moral defects in themselves. But most of what he says is only too well founded in fact. His charge against the Church is fundamental and weighty:—

The exponents of religion in corporations have not been tolerant, nor truthful, nor honest in thought and word. If they had been tolerant, history would have had no persecutions to tell of, and those great societies the Roman, the Russian, and the English Churches would have removed everything from their articles which is exclusive and not essential, and have been ready, as Christ was, to admit all who endeavoured to live righteously. If they had been truthful, they would have welcomed increase of knowledge, encouraged inquiry, studied the advance of mankind in enlightenment, and assented, not to superstitious imaginations, but to the spirit of regeneration; they would have kept the people informed of new discoveries concerning the sacred books, and not have pronounced old tales as if verbally true. If they had been honest before God and man, they would have refused to hold orders for professing what after searching inquiry they could not in their hearts believe. Even now, many of the most thoughtful of the priesthood admit contentedly that they do not believe according to the plain sense of what they profess in public.

Religion rooted in Human Nature.

Mr. Russell's view of the origin, or rather the basis, of religion, is intuitional, but in no narrow sense of the word. Religion is the reaction of the human spirit in the presence of the good (as presented to it in the personal conscience and in the characters of others) and of the beautiful, the orderly, and the sublime, as presented to it through the outward world. God is defined as the unfailing Source of human goodness in its manifold forms, the Endeavourer from whom the vital impulse of endeavour springs, the Intelligence knowing wholly what the highest humanity sees partially. Conscience is the clearest expression of His Spirit. The elements of true religion have ever been present in the heart of man.

The history of the two great traditions, the Christian and the Buddhist, which have obtained more believers than any other, shows that mankind finds peace of soul in the highest known ideal of righteousness. And from the worship of Gautama and Christ, the strange consequence follows that, owing to the grandeur of the conception of the human, and the inadequacy of the surviving conception of the Divine, the human is exalted to the place of divinity, and the Divine occupies a meaner place in affection, or receives faint homage rather as the reflection than as the source of the god-like in man. . . . To unite the highest ideal of human goodness with the Divine Being is the first duty of our age.

Nature of Ethical Theism.

The author has much to say concerning the suggestions, both favourable and the reverse, which physical nature makes regarding an Ethical Theism of this kind; but it is evident that for him these suggestions, whatever they are, could never by themselves be conclusive either way. The real Seat of Authority is human nature at its best. All the paths of human goodness lead at last to God. And when speaking of Nature, he does not touch any of the well-worn philosophical inquiries into the reality of the external world and our knowledge of it; "Nature" means to him what it meant to the Physical Science of the last quarter of the nineteenth century. We are convinced that from the point of view of the average Englishman, Mr. Russell's method of presenting the case for religion is the right one. The average Englishman partly understands the methods of Science, and has complete confidence in them even where he cannot understand them at all; but he neither understands nor trusts the methods of metaphysics; any appeals to him from that side fall on deaf ears. Hence the difficulties, in the way of religion, which arise from the teachings of science, have to be met, not by philosophical criticism of our knowledge of the "material world" (though this is, of course, the root of the whole question), but by emphasising the value and significance (above physical nature) of human nature. It is instructive to notice how it was just this that led the late G. J. Romanes from the extreme agnosticism of his early work, "A Candid Examination of Theism," to the Christian Theism of the posthumously published "Thoughts on Religion," as is shown by his own confession in the latter work. We do not say that the protests and criticisms of the philosophers have been ineffective against the crudities of materialism; on the contrary, they filter through to the laboratories, and even the narrowest student of physical science is unconsciously affected by them to-day; but the public will not take their theories of the world from the philosophers, and they will take them from the men of science. Nevertheless, for the reasons previously mentioned, we should venture to affirm that if faith in man is strong, we may leave faith in God on the one hand, and "Scientific" criticism on the other, to take care of themselves. Let it be our business by every means to promote and create that faith in man. And here the basis of religion becomes one with that of life; for we cannot create Faith in ourselves and our destiny, by Thought alone, without work.

Mr. Herbert Rix; From another Standpoint.

After what we have said of the endeavour to expound theological questions in immediate connection with the metaphysics of the external world, it is only fair that we should commend to the attention of our readers an earnest and thoughtful treatment of these topics in a purely metaphysical manner, which will be found in the recently published volume of addresses by Mr. Herbert Rix, entitled "A Dawning Faith; or, The World as a Spiritual Organism."* The main title is somewhat too ambitious, for Mr. Rix would hardly suppose that the faith of the future will be made by piecing together fragments of nineteenth century metaphysics. The subtitle expresses the real object of the book; it is a courageous attempt to elucidate some of the hardest questions to which belief in God gives rise, by applying the main conclusions of recent idealism. These conclusions are, that the universe is one whole; that it is not merely a heap of parts, but an organic whole; and finally that it is not only an organic but a spiritual whole, which is God. The author would have done well, we think, to have made clearer to himself and his readers (what he occasionally hints at) that these results are only analogies and not proofs. The central position maintained in the book is made more a question of proof; that "matter"—by which is meant the supposed invisible world of atoms, forces, and merely mechanical laws—simply does not exist. We should not venture to say that he has made it much easier for the average man to accept this result, but we hope that his book will be widely read.

Practical Materialism.

It is interesting to find that Mr. Russell does not assign any importance to theoretical materialism among the forces actively hostile to faith to-day. Materialism as a practical attitude is another thing, and is found as much or more among persons professing Christianity as among others. His opinion on this question is worth quoting :—

Faith is undermined by three principal influences in the experience of life. First, by finding that there are many contradictory systems of belief among mankind which must be erroneous, though all are held with equal tenacity, that no superstition is too foolish to be supported by vast masses of men, and that to support mere fancies, the greatest evils and iniquities have been committed in the name of God. Secondly, by realising that in the system of belief in which we have been born, much error, foolishness, and dishonesty is incorporated, that the main principles professed are overgrown by superstitious fancy, and maintained by hypocrisy and worldly ambition or interests, and that weakness and selfishness everywhere prevail. Thirdly, by perceiving the great, the terrible evils of the natural and spiritual world, inconsistent with the being of an all-righteous and all-powerful God.

Divine Omnipotence.

In connection with the world-old problem referred to in the last sentence, Mr. Russell pleads earnestly for the frank abandonment, or rather the complete denial, of the old idea of God's omnipotence: "If we believe the greatest of beliefs, that God is Love, we cannot believe Him to be Almighty." Now it is perfectly true that mere omnipotence, strictly understood, is a notion of no moral or religious value whatever. "The God who evidently exists," says Mr. Craufurd,* "a God who in some mysterious way has to contend with obstacles, seems, after all, to be the God whom man needs. The old crude idea as to the divine omnipotence seems to reduce the Creator almost to the inert condition of the Epicurean deities. There is scarcely anything left for Him to do. Strenuousness would seem to be out of place in such a Divinity. Far more inspiring to us is the old conception of devout Israel, that 'The Lord is a man of War,' and that we are privileged to co-operate in carrying out His purposes." But a little clear thinking is needed as regards the "obstacles" with which the Divine Energy is said to be contending. Either God will in the end overcome the perversity of things, or He will not. If He will not, then the obstacles, whatever they are—time, space, matter, the will of man, &c.—are (to put it plainly) as good as a second god contending on equal terms, and successfully, with the first god. If it is held that the abstacles will in the end be overcome—which is, of course, the position of Mr. Russell and Mr. Craufurd—then we have not a denial, but a new interpretation of the idea of omnipotence, so as to make it necessarily include the progressive fulfilment of purposes in which we human beings are concerned. The mistake of the old idea was to insist that God is "omnipotent" apart from man. It is not open to us to say this. Although man can do nothing, and is nothing, apart from God, yet even God is not omnipotent without man. Otherwise, we should have lost all the value and meaning of that grand and inspiring thought suggested by St. Paul that we men are "fellow-labourers with God," and that it is possible for us really to serve God.

THE BASIS OF RELIGION.

Sir,—I willingly avail myself of your suggestion that I should join with others in an interchange of ideas upon the important subject discussed in Mr. J. H. Wicksteed's able and seasonable letters. I must, however, confess at the outset that I should need a much fuller exposition of Mr. Wicksteed's views before I could comment on them with the clear consciousness that I rightly understood them. Mr. Wicksteed appears to contend that the conception of God as personal, i.e., as standing in intelligent and sympathetic relations with all rational souls, is a conception that is out of harmony with our present intellectual environment, and is therefore a hindrance rather than a help to us in our religious life. Now I fully agree with him that there is much in the common conception of a personal God which is incompatible with the intelligence of the present day, but at the same time I feel assured that the essential element in that idea is not only in complete accord with the best culture of to-day, but is the only view of God which is competent to satisfy the persistent cravings, both of the intellect and of the heart.

For what is the impression which the universe makes upon an educated mind at the present time? Surely it is that of a fundamental self-existent Unity embracing and co-ordinating an immense multiplicity of existences—inorganic, organic, and rational—all of which are related to each other and to the Eternal One in whom their being has its ground. So far as science can penetrate into the nature of matter it appears to consist of centres of force; and, as our only notion of force is derived from our consciousness of personal volition, there would seem to be a great probability that all that we call matter is essentially of a spiritual nature, and that the evolving cosmos is thus constituted of a portion of God's own substance, to which in increasing degrees He imparts a measure of separate existence. As we trace the evolution of the world upwards from its inorganic commencement the most reasonable account of the process appears to be this, that the Creative Spirit who is immanent in each element of the whole is, through the lower stages of biological evolution, preparing the needful physiological conditions for the realisation of the true end of evolution, namely, the advent of a being in whom the Eternal not only acts, but to whom He can progressively reveal Himself. Hence the dawn of rationality and personality; and thus man becomes capable in increasing measure not only of learning, through his senses and his intellect, somewhat of the outward manifestations of God, but also through his rational intuitions, and his æsthetic, ethical, and spiritual ideals, of enjoying what Mr. Wicksteed justly calls a "blessed vision" of the Eternal.

The main question at issue between Mr. Wicksteed and his critics appears to be, whether this vision, which arises from the self-revelation of God in the higher life of man, is the vision of God as He really is, or whether God has hidden His real nature behind a veil impenetrable by human insight.

Now, I venture to think Mr. Wicksteed, whose clear philosophical insight I have often admired, has allowed himself in this particular case to be misled by a false analogy. He seems to hold that God in His reality can be no more like God as He appears to us than the undulations of the ether can be like the sensations of light and colour, to which, through the action of our nervous organism, they give rise. But, surely, there is no real analogy between the cases. The reality of the objects of nature is necessarily known to us only mediately. God, if known at all, must be known immediately, through His own direct self-revelation in the reason, the conscience, and the heart. He is not separated from our inner life as finite objects and persons are. All truths which pertain to the nature of God or absolute reality appeal to us as really being what they appear to us to be. Such are our ideas of Infinity and Eternity. The laws of thought, too, on which the validity of all reasoning depends, are they not laws to which we appeal as final and conclusive? When the philosopher rejoices in the glimpse of a new truth, the moralist in the announcement of a higher moral ideal, the poet and the artist in a clearer and deeper revelation of the beautiful and the divine, do they not all confidently believe that they have reached a truer and fuller insight into the essential nature of the self-existent and eternal reality? Is not the vision of the saint that love belongs to the very essence of God felt to be a true vision of God as He is in Himself? Surely these "blessed visions" would never bring the intense peace and satisfaction which they manifestly do, were they merely the subjective visions of an unknown reality.

But Mr. Wicksteed further urges that when we try to conceive of God, we can only conceive Him under the highest category we have, viz., that of Personality. True; but that in no way proves that we are conceiving Him wholly incorrectly. The word "conceive," as Mr. Wicksteed well knows, has two meanings. It is the fact that I cannot picture or imagine, God save under a personal form, having limitations such as human personalities have; but I can think of God as being personal or self-conscious without attaching to Him any such limitations. Indeed, my rational intuition, which I owe to the self-revelation of the Infinite One in my self-consciousness, assures me that God is not, and cannot be, a finite and dependent personality such as human personalities are. If the idea of personality necessarily carried with it the limitations which are inseparable from human personalities, it could not be appropriately applied to the Eternal. But, as Lotze and many other great thinkers have shown, personality, or self-consciousness, carries with it intrinsically no such limitations, and, therefore, there is no reason at all for calling in question the validity of the religious experience which intuitively attributes personality to God. I am inclined to agree with Dr. Albert Réville that it is better not to speak of the Eternal as "a Person" or "a Mind," for such expressions can hardly be dissociated from the limitations which necessarily attach to human personality, but no such objection can be raised against the speaking of God as personal; for personality is a conception quite accordant with His Self-existence, His Infinity, and His Eternity. And this is virtually what Lotze means when he says that all human personality is necessarily imperfect, and that it is only in the Eternal that Perfect Personality is realised. Hence our enjoyment of personality, so far from being a theological disability, is a high prerogative, giving us, as it does, an imperfect vision of the essential nature of God. And, in confirmation of this, it may be added that it is quite impossible to believe that the Eternal One, out of the depths of whose being countless self-consciousnesses arise, should Himself be devoid of this, the highest feature in the evolving cosmos; or that He, who calls forth in myriads of human hearts the precious attractions of friendship and affection, should have in His own essential being nothing corresponding to these divine experiences. Of this subjective life of God we can, of course, have no direct knowledge, but the vision of the Ideal in our inner life carries with it the conviction that the self-revealing God, the Supreme Reality, sympathises with His sincere worshippers, and enraptures all true lovers of the Ideal with the consciousness of a divine companionship of transcendent power to comfort and to bless. Surely the very essence of Wordsworth's poetry would evaporate and disappear, if we came to believe that the personal sympathy between the poet's spirit and the spirit of nature was but a subjective illusion and no objective reality.

For these reasons, then, it seems to me that there is no valid ground for desiring any revolutionary change in the connotation of the grandest of all words. Theories of evolution have altered our conception of the mode in which the Eternal Ground and Cause progressively reveals Himself in the cosmos; but, so far as I can see, they have only confirmed and enriched that theistic reading of the universe which sees in evolution a perpetual preparation for the advent of rational beings in whom God shall not only be present and active, as He is in the lower animals, but shall gradually make known His presence and His character, take His creatures by degrees into His confidence, so that at length man becomes a true son of God, capable of entering into free, rational, ethical, and spiritual relations with the immanent and yet transcendent Father.

As I said at the commencement, I believe that no other conception of God than this is capable of meeting and satisfying the sublime and unquenchable longings and aspirations of the spirit of man, and that, therefore, this conception must be substantially true, if the evolutionary principle of the final harmony between the creature and its environment is to hold good of man as it holds good of all other cosmical existences.

Charles B. Upton.

We have also received the following notes, in comment on Mr. Wicksteed's letter, by Dr. Mellone:—

1. Mr. Wicksteed says that the "supreme Cosmic Reality" (to the existence of which, in the nature of things, our various religious experiences point) is the "absolute condition" of humanity, and is to human life "what light is to the eye, both its creator and that in which it functions." If we are casting about for an analogy of the relation between the Source of all Being and our little lives, why fix on such a very imperfect one as the ethereal vibrations and the organ of sight which they mechanically stimulate? Why not fix on the analogy of our perception of the uttered thoughts of our fellow-creatures? The words we hear form an experience which has a meaning for us just because the mind revealed by it is the "duplicate or prototype" of our own. And there are better analogies even than this to be found.

2. The principle that the "condition" (source, originating cause or ground) of anything is its "complementary antithesis," would lead to strange results if thought out. I would suggest as an alternative that the source of any form of life cannot contain less (though it may contain infinitely more) than is contained in that which issues from it. The true nature of the cause is only apparent in the highest effect which it produces. This seems to be contemplated by Mr. Wicksteed when he says "we can only know the absolute condition of existence as the highest human nature reveals it to us." Further, it looks very like a contradiction in terms to say that the absolute condition of a thing could be its complementary antithesis.

3. When Mr. Wicksteed asks whether the ordinary theistic account of God as a personal being has any more truth or significance than some of the orthodox doctrines which Unitarians reject he is raising a serious and fundamental question. Those who see in the inheritance of religious thought from the ages nothing more than an accumulation of injurious delusions will doubtless see no difficulty. But their view may be set aside as antiquated and erroneous. We must grant that the description of God which implies personality and the description of God in the traditional doctrine of the Trinity are both merely imperfect adumbrations of a Reality whose full being is infinitely beyond us as we now are. But it does not follow that they are equally imperfect. Those who hold—as Mr. Wicksteed seems to do, and as I do—that the cardinal doctrines of the great Christian Catholic Church are profoundly significant, are not, I think, impaled on the horns of the dilemma: "Either take the main doctrines of orthodoxy in the traditional form, or with them abandon also ordinary Theism (or the language of ordinary Theism)." We abandon the traditional forms of doctrine just because we hold that we can express in a better form the truths which they embodied. The idea of the Trinity, for example, embodies the distinction between God "in himself" and God as revealed in humanity, implying that the latter is our only source of the knowledge of the former, for they are at bottom one. Hence the highest human is the truest picture of the Divine. Yet the outlines of that picture must needs be personal; not, indeed, personal in the superficial sense of that which is merely limited in time or place or power, but personal in the sense of involving Thought, Feeling, and Will in their greatest intensity. It is probable that the personal modes of description will never be abandoned; our thought of God will be raised, not by abandoning the words, but by that elevation of meaning which the words will undergo with the moral and intellectual elevation of humanity, whatever that will be, which the future shall show.

In any case, in our present state, we have no choice but to speak of the Divine by expressions borrowed from the highest human faculties. Or, if we refuse to do this, we have the position of agnostic religious mysticism to fall back upon: but though this mood of mind has found its exponents in the Western world, it is not congenial to the Western mind, and rests on philosophical fallacies which have many times been exploded. We find instances of it in the Oriental sage who gave his highest description of the Divine Being by the utterance of the words "No—no"; or in Erigena, who considered it derogatory to the ineffable dignity of the Divine Being even to say that he (or it) existed: Deus propter excellentiam non immerito nihil vocatur.

"THE INQUIRER" ON POLITICS.

Sir,—The polemical attitude taken up by The Inquirer with regard to the political questions of the day is surely much to be regretted in the best interests of the paper and the Association of the churches it professes to serve.

We are not all advanced Radicals or followers of Sir H. C. Bannerman and Mr. Lloyd George. Some of us think that Lord Milner has served his country well, under circumstances of great stress and difficulty. We even believe that Mr. Chamberlain is an honest man and not a charlatan.

The tone adopted by The Inquirer, chiefly in its short leaders on the first page, puts a strain on us, not easy to bear without raising feelings which diminish one's loyalty to The Inquirer as the representative organ of our body.

A PROTEST.

Sir,—Your report on the meeting of the B. and F. U. Association will cause many of the readers of The Inquirer much sorrow and chagrin, revealing as it does the disastrous disposition to trespass on political ground. Apart from giving rise to congregational dissension, I contend it is not fair to use the term "slavery" to a condition wherein a Chinaman (known to be the most "'cute" of labourers) enters on contract or engagement of his own free will; and, with all due deference to Mr. Tarrant, I am sure that I am not alone in being grieved to find a Unitarian minister stoop to take up a party-biassed interpretation of an Ordinance sanctioned by English law in the case of sailors and apprentices.

All honour is due to Mr. H. B. Lawford, supported by Messrs. Stannus and Percy Preston, for protesting against the thrusting of "party" questions on a meeting for religious discussion.

March 28. H. J. Bakewell.

In this quarter's number of the Hibbert Journal Professor Henry Jones writes on "The Moral Aspect of the Fiscal Question," dealing with a side of the subject which has, perhaps, not received as much attention as it deserves. Sir Oliver Lodge contributes some "Suggestions towards the Re-interpretation of Christian Doctrine," and Canon Hensley Henson writes on "The Resurrection of Jesus Christ," and the Bishop of Ripon on "Gladstone as a Moral and Religious Personality." Other articles are:—"Mr. Meyer's Theory of the Subliminal Self," by Mr. Andrew Lang; "The Axiom of Infinity: A New Presupposition of Thought," by Professor C. J. Keyser; "The Passing of Conviction," by Professor W. Jethro Brown" and "North Arabia and the Bible: A Defence," by Dr. H. Winckler.

At a Conference held in Manchester recently, at which representatives were present from a number of ratepayers' and citizens' associations, it was resolved to form a League to be called "The Local Government Reform League," with the intention of linking together for united effort all local organisations which aim at the purification and improvement of local government and obtaining the co-operation of men and women who agree with the League's objects. The chief objects agreed upon were:—

To protect the rights of citizenship, to promote purity and justice in local government, to separate local government from party politics, to further measures aimed to improve public health, to encourage municipal enterprise whenever necessary for the public benefit, to educate public opinion in the best methods of citizenship, and to obtain equal power of voting and election for women and men in local elections.

The first chairman is Mr. S. Norbury Williams, and Rev. H Bodell Smith, of Mottram, is the secretary.

The great atheists are, indeed, the hypocrites, which are ever handling holy things, but without feeling; so as they must need be cauterised in the end.

EASTER SONGS.

There is something I like to hear in a singer's voice. Of course, it should be true in tune and right in time; but more than that, it should be beautiful. I hope you can understand what I mean, but at any rate that is the best word I can find for it. I would have said it should be happy, but sometimes a sweet song is so tender and touching that we can hardly say it sounds happy—although even sadness that can be sung is not the worst sadness. But you know how you feel when you hear a really lovely piece of music; it may be lively or pathetic, but if you can't say it is beautiful, in either case there is something missing.

Most bird-songs please me—I don't mean the noises of jackdaws and magpies, but real singing, even though it should be the same thing over and over again. The robin's trill is short but very cheerful. Some people say the nightingale's song is sad; it seems to me that not one of its many notes is anything but joyous. I shall listen out for it again this Spring to see if I have been mistaken—I know very well I haven't!

"This Spring!" Yes, although the winds are still cold, that most delightful of seasons has come again. I know it by the fruitbuds in the orchards ready to break out white; I am sure of it by the peeping "lords and ladies," and celandines and coltsfoot. Already our London suburbs are growing gay with pink and white almond blossom. Every day tells a word more of the glad story. The great procession of glorious things is well on the way again before our eyes—if we will only look. No wonder the thrushes pipe so lustily. Bless them, they have been cheering us up all through the Winter months, now and again; but April is at the door, and their welcome is loud and full, like the orchestra's when the Queen is coming in. And with April comes Easter, the festival of life renewed. It is the time to sing morning songs of hope and confidence, happy and earnest, as all our mornings should be.

Do you notice how happy and beautiful the Easter music is in church? I beg your pardon. I am talking to you children as if you were grown-up people who remember all about last year, and the year before that, and so on, for ever such a long time. So I will amend my question, if you please, and say, Will you try to notice the Easter songs this year, and try to join, with beautiful voices, mind, in all that you can? Do, for it is rather too bad to let the birds have the Spring music to do all by themselves.

I said all morning songs ought to be happy and earnest, and that is the kind of music I, for one, want to sing. A Sunday morning song should be specially so; and an Easter Sunday morning song specially specially so, I think; and so do you, I am sure. Sunday, the day for a real happy home-time; a day, too, for seeing friends in church and class or out walking; a day for getting another look into the big bright books, and most of all into those things that tell of our Father's love and wisdom,—why, it is just a weekly birthday that everybody ought to keep up. And Easter Sunday is a birthday kept up once a year, like our very own birthdays; but this one for the whole world, which is renewed in life again after Winter's death. There never will be, I think, anything more worth singing about than the way in which life keeps opening up into newness, even when it seemed to have failed altogether.

The happy and earnest Easter songs are tuned to that most musical thought. We think of our Father's love and wisdom with thankfulness and joy, and with confidence that He cares for us quite as much as for the wild-flowers that are beginning to bloom again. His sunshine wakes them into new life, and the thought of His love will bring new life to us, now and here, if we are really in earnest about it.

And the best of it is that His love is so wide that all children and people belong to Him, and that our friends who live far away, as well as those whom we see, are just as safe with Him as we are. Some of our dearest friends, perhaps—I am sure, some of mine—will never come back to see the flowers and hear the birds in Spring with us; but His love is so wide that it has something beautiful and good for them as well as for us. That is the loveliest thought in all our lovely Easter songs. It helps us to take the Spring as only a foretaste and pledge of something better; it helps us to think of death without being afraid, because though we may go away from earth, we can never go away from Him who has made it our home for a while, full of signs of His love for us.

Jesus, we read, who loved the flowers and birds so much, told his friends before his death to be happy in the thought that he was "going to his Father." When he died they were at first very sad, as we all are when we have to part with our beloved. But they were soon cheered again as they thought of him still and for ever living and still thinking of them and loving them, and longing for them to be true, good, and happy children of his Father and theirs. And so, after the sad hours when they thought they had lost him, they were filled with a new and glorious trust that all was really well with him; and all they wished for was to live worthily of so good and great a friend.

Some of these things you will notice in the Easter songs. Try to think of them as you sing, and, above all, keep one little rule in mind from this Easter onwards. You know that a bad life is not worth living, and if the daisies and buttercups came up dirty instead of fresh and clean and now you would not want to pick them in the fields. It is only the good life that is worth living, and that can look forward to God's greater springtime to come. And this is the rule: If there is any feeling, any thought, any wish, any word, or any deed that you can't sing about sweetly, happily, and earnestly you will be safe to leave it alone. The life that can't go into music isn't worth living—at least, that is what a friend of mine says, and I more than half believe him.

THE HIDDEN GLORY.

Marvellous is the glory of the heavens and the earth in the visible return each year of spring. The light of sunnier days is in the heavens, in the clear depths of the sky. The winds with a breath of gladness sweep over the earth, and the song of a myriad birds tells of the coming glory, thrilling with delight. The early flowers, the fresh green upon the trees, the children's happiness, all blend in the great song of renewal; the earth grows beautiful again with the old loveliness which is ever new, and the heart of man responds to that ancient melody, in which on the first day of such creation the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy.

Nothing can well be more manifest than this wealth of glory and delight poured out over the earth and through all sentient creatures. Yet even in this there is a hidden glory greater still, which stirs the heart to a deeper thankfulness and reverent adoration. At the heart of all creation, source of its unity and unfailing order, is the one Eternal Purpose, manifest in our hearts as Righteousness and as Eternal Goodness. Amid all shadows it is the light which still prevails, and faith and love can make no other confession but that out of the One great Heart have issued all the beauty and the joy. We are told that the eye has come into existence because the sunlight was there, and in living creatures there was a slowly growing response to its appeal. But neither sunlight nor that which was sensitive to light had been there save for that primal energy and purpose of good, of which we speak most simply, yet most profoundly, as God.

So amid the glorious surging tides of the returning spring we watch in silence with the deeper consciousness of One who makes all things beautiful in their season, and every year renews this great word of infinite delight in creation and of unfailing love. The human heart finds its rest only in God, and that man is risen from the dead who, amid the glory of the springtime, thrilling with the joy of life, knows that he is with God, the Giver of all good, at the very source of all the beauty and the joy.

Then does he know something of the secret of eternal life, of which Easter is the great festival on earth. In lowly submission and unutterable thankfulness he is at one with the creative Power, the Wisdom and the Love eternal; he has a place, though it be the very lowest, in the Father's house; his work is given him to do, while he rejoices in that glorious habitation, and his prayer is that the Father's will may be done.

There is a sense in which the man who thus enters into the secret of life is alone with God. He has the witness of truth in his own heart; he can stand alone against the whole world. And yet that is not how things are ordered in the Father's house. A man learns the supreme lesson, indeed, alone with God, but it is that he may enter into the life of larger fellowship. He knows the life which death cannot touch, and then he sees what those first disciples saw, for whom the light broke after the darkness which fell upon the cross of Jesus and their despairing hearts. We may not be able now to recover the whole story of their enlightenment, but the great fact is clear. They entered on the new life, "heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ," knowing love as greatest of all, because though the bitterness of death had seemed for the moment to overshadow their Master, the conviction had possessed their souls with a triumphant joy which nothing could resist, that death could have no dominion over such a one, that out of the shadows of death he had risen and had passed into the eternal light of God.

In the first gatherings of the disciples there was much talk of the speedy return of Christ, in clouds of glory, to establish his kingdom; but as time went on the profounder truth was made clear to those who entered more completely into the spirit of his life. They found that by secret ways he had already come back to them, and his hidden presence in their hearts had brought a new consecration into life, and through their faithfulness was working to redeem the world and establish the divine kingdom in their midst. They knew him as the exalted Son of God, and as a quickening spirit in their own lives. In the Father's house he was the first-born of many brethren.

So the man who has learnt the great secret of the life with God, the life eternal, which death cannot touch, enters into an abiding fellowship with those who have touched his soul to the deeper issues; and the joy of Easter, amid the growing glory of springtime, becomes a home festival, in which he calls to mind all the abiding treasures which love has given. Not in any distant heaven does he seek for that desired fellowship, but in the quietness where he is here, at home in the Father's house, where he is with God in the secret places of his trust and love. Joy he has, deep and abiding, in all that the Father shows to him of the wonder and beauty and delight of life, yet conscious of the infinite depths beyond; and in the quietness those others enter in, and he is aware that they are still of the same household. Thought of distant separation cannot trouble. They are enfolded in the care of the same Eternal Love; that is the bond which unites in close fellowship of spirit, and the love which was of old, which death cannot touch, is still a gracious presence in the heart, rich in new power of blessing; the friend strengthens his friend, and the home love, which unites parent and child, is the deeper for that new and hidden bond. The great teachers and prophets of our race thus live for those who receive from them through personal influence inspiration for the true life, and so Jesus remains for all disciples "chief of faithful souls" and the abiding Friend of all.

A man really and practically looking onwards to an immortal life, on whatever grounds, exhibits to us the human soul in an ennobled attitude.—Whewell.

When we look into ourselves, we find something besides capacities and desires of pleasure. Amidst the selfish and animal principles of our nature there is an awful power, a sense of Right, a voice which speaks of Duty, an idea grander than the largest personal interest, the Idea of Excellence, of Perfection. Here is the seal of Divinity on us; here the sign of our descent from God.—Channing.

There is no law of nature, there are no frosts of time, to shed a snow-blight on the heart. The feelings die out when their objects come to an end; and if there be no future, and the aims of life become shorter and shorter, and its treasures drop off, and its attractions are spent, and a few links only of its hours remain in the hand, well may there be no heart for effort and no eye for beauty, and well may love gather itself up to die. But open perfection to its veneration, and immortality to its step; tell it of one who was, is, and will always be the inspirer of genius, the originator of truth, the life of emotion; assure it that all which is loved shall live for ever, that that which is known shall enlarge for ever, that all which is felt shall grow intenser for ever; and the proximity to death will quicken instead of withering the mind; the eye will grow dim on the open page of knowledge; the hand will be found clasping in death the instruments of human good; and the heart's last pulse will beat with some new emotion of benignity.—James Martineau.

SCENES FROM A PASSION PLAY.

Scene I.

Outside the Walls of Jerusalem.

JUDAS ISCARIOT.

The night within me does but darker grow
As day comes on. Time was when I, a child—
For Judas was a child—was wont to look
To day to rid me of the terrors wild
Which night had gendered; now I would the night
With mantle thick would hide me from the day.
Whom named I then as Judas? He is one
Who now is with me, now is far away,
Known and unknown alike, as when in sleep
The dreamer does another self disclose
Who is, and is not, one with him who wakes.
But Judas wears with me a common shape
To things about us; they account us one.
The very trees do tremble if he pass.
A dog but now, with nose upon the ground,
Ran on his track—flung up—and left the scent
Unclean; by Kidron's edge he stooped to drink,
And Kidron's waters now did run with blood.
Am I that Judas? Then is nothing left
Save to undo the life which Judas loves,
And I do hate; come darker, kinder, night,
The only night secure from staring day,
And, parting, end us both, to both a friend.

(Enter PETER.)

PETER.

A friend? Thou hast a friend? Betray him not.
Better be friendless than a faithless friend.
I come not as a friend—then fear me not.
Thy look is strange, and strange thy action seems:
This murky dawn, that is nor night nor day,
Shows darkest where thou art—or is it I
Who shadow cast on thee?

JUDAS.

O Simon, spare!
'Tis Judas, one that is, or was, so named.

PETER.

Art Judas? Thou? Why do I tremble thus?
For Judas is a man of high esteem;
He bears the bag, and that which is therein,
A faithful steward; gives often to the poor;
Takes thought of things too deep for simple minds;
Speaks little; comes and goes on matters grave;
Aloof, but charged by none.

JUDAS.

Have mercy thou:

PETER:

This night he was the bravest of us all,
Stood forth, confession made, "Hail Master" said,
And kissed His cheek, as good disciple should:
Art thou that Judas? Then with curses deep
I would the coward in thee seize and shame,
I would—the sword again were in my hand—
Thy false heart drain of all its treachery,
Did I not know a traitor worse than thee;
'Tis he deserves the fate that else were thine. (Exit PETER.)

JUDAS.

There is no other, and for one alone
It had been better had he not been born;
Of treachery his name shall be the sign,
And men who "Judas" say shall "traitor" mean:
None shall excuse his deed, and none explain.

Scene II.

The Same.

SIMON OF CYRENE.

Still do I feel the woe that weighed me down,
And with remembrance still the heavier grows.
Another earth I tread, another sun
Shines on me; all around is changed,
And all within; for I am he whose eyes
Have held in closest vision, face to face,
The very Form of Sorrow passing on—
So worn with grief, so wrung with inward pain,
One heart did seem all human ill to hold.
But one I see who comes, with head bent down,
As if he also did a burden bear;
Then will I teach him how it should be borne,
For I have seen, and know.

(Enter PETER.)

PETER.

Good stranger, stay,
And tell me, if thou wilt, what means this gloom
That turns the light to shadow ere it fall,
And fills with trouble every passing sound?
What thing has happened?

SIMON OF CYRENE.

Thou the stranger art,
If this day's story be to thee unknown.

PETER.

Then let me know it; see, I stand to hear.

SIMON OF CYRENE.

No thought of gloom had I this quiet morn,
When to the holy mount I took my way
From village near, the sacred feast to keep;
But when I had approached the northern wall,
A cloud of dust came outward from the gate,
And horsemen soon appeared, as riding on
Some ground beyond to seize, or place prepare.
And after them in line the runners came,
And one of these did say, they ran to see
Three malefactors die, whereof the chief
Was one Barabbas named.

PETER.

Barabbas?

SIMON OF CYRENE:

Then
One came who said that he but now had stood
Before the marble floor, whereon was set
The seat of judgment, and, at Pilate's word,
Barabbas had been freed, and, in his stead,
Another given to be crucified—
A King, so named, and clad in scarlet cloak,
But crowned with thorns.

PETER.

A King? And yet so crowned?

SIMON OF CYRENE.

That shall you hear; whilst yet he spake there came
A company of soldiers, six abreast,
Who in their midst drove on three prisoners;
But one there was so faint with scourging sore,
So spent with watching, that no strength had He
To bear His cross, but staggered 'neath its weight.
Then was I seized and made to bear His load—
But ask no more, I cannot end the tale.

PETER.

I do beseech you, say, how was He named?

SIMON OF CYRENE.

I heard the people cry, who walked beside,
He was of Galilee, from Nazareth,
From whence no prophet, no good thing, can come,
But prophet held by some, and Jesus named:

PETER:

And Jesus named. Enough; I ask no more:
Thy tale is told. And thou? Thy name?

SIMON OF CYRENE.

I come
From Afric's shore; Cyrene was my home;
Am Simon called.

PETER.

Another Simon thou?
Abjure thy name. Nay, cherish it, for thou
Hast made it worthy. Think it not offence
If I do kneel to touch the worthier hand
That did the service Peter should have shown. (Kneels.)

Scene III.

An Orchard.

PETER AND JOHN:

JOHN.

Here will we wait, for hither must they come,
Returning on their way. The morning breaks;
Let this third day new comfort bring to thee.

PETER:

Like sifted wheat, thrown up by tossing fan
Upon the searching wind, I fell away:
But thou didst seek, and find, and bring again;
If I am comforted, it is by thee.

JOHN.

The sifted wheat the gathered seed shal be,
And in good ground bring forth an hundredfold:

Peter.

With me another fell. What hope hath he?

John.

Speak not of him, for he is gone.

Peter.

Is gone?

Is gone from us?

John.

Is gone to his own place
By his own hand.

Peter.

A woeful word is this,
And woeful is the thought within my mind.
On that dread morn I met him, saw him stand
As one o'erwhelmed; with bitter tongue reproached,
And would have slain him—I, apostle named,
Together called—why dealt I not with him
As thou with me?

John.

Not heaven's grace would deal
With him who perished then, perdition's son;
For Judas—hear me—Judas sold his Lord.

Peter.

It rends my heart to hear. Who told thee this?

John.

A damsel, Rhoda named; she kept the door
In Hanan's court—thou knowest?

Peter.

Yea; I know—

John.

How he, for gain, accursed—

Peter.

Nay, judge him not,
Nor think to mark the bounds of heaven's grace.
There is a Judas lurks in every man;
I speak not for him; let him speak in me,
Who have myself been lost, a man undone.
The wrong we do we see not, till it lies
As wreck exposed, left naked to the eye,
And madness from the soul has ebbed away.
It was no common greed that led him on;
It was the shame wrought in him by the look
Which searched him through, with quick discernment sure,
And made him know himself, as he was known.
No charge does so confound the guilt within
As that which springs from love's unangered eyes;
Should I not know?

John.

His guilt was never thine.
But see, she comes, the maid of Magdala,
And comes alone, new trouble in her face,
And fresh alarm. What doth this coming mean?

(Enter Mary Magdalen.)

Mary Magdalen.

Oh, weep, my brothers, weep again with me,
If sorrow yet hath any tears unshed.
Him have they taken, taken hence away,
And laid, I know not where.

John.

Have taken hence?
No mortal hand could do so ill a deed.

Mary Magdalen.

In death itself no rest for Him allowed,
Who never ceased from toil and travail sore,
But walked to-day, to-morrow, doing good.
Oh, shame on shame that this should be the end.

John.

Speak not of end: lift up thine eyes and see
The things made new, the light of yonder sun,
The life that buds in every leaf and stem.
Such gladness now upon the earth revives,
Such hope within my breast, I could believe
That night itself this night had passed away.

Peter.

Look where they beckon from within the wall—
Salome and Joanna.

John.

Mary, too,
Of Clopas; see, they call, and wave their hands,
With sudden joy possessed.

Peter.

What thought is this,
That will not give itself to spoken word,
But darts and leaps unformed within my brain?
Come, let us haste, and hear what they would say.

(Exeunt Peter and John, running.)

Mary Magdalen.

No waving hand shall tempt my sight again.
Too far, too often, hope hath led me on
With idle beckoning and promise vain.
There is a peace which hope no more disturbs—
Despair they call it—let that peace be mine.
My heart is cold, and empty as a tomb
Despoiled by wanton hands. Oh, foolish words,
Untruly said! The heart its treasure holds,
For ever dear, for ever safely sealed.

(Throws herself down, weeping.)

A Voice, singing.

Come, promised day,
Advance thy rising bright:
The morning stars already on thy way
Have spread their light.
The shrouded East
Is now a shining gate,
And flaming clouds, as messengers released,
Thy bidding wait.
"Let there be light,"
Let all creation hear;
And with that word shall sorrow take its flight,
And guilty fear;
And in their stead
Shall peace renew her reign,
And death himself, his stricken power fled,
Himself be slain.
Come, day of days,
Thy glory let us see;
Loose all its bands, and from the earth upraise
The life to be.

NOT HERE—BUT THERE.

"He is not here: : : there shall ye see him," we read in the twenty-eighth chapter of Matthew, and the words are truer now than when first written. There are, generally speaking, two strands to the thread of modern thought upon the question of the Resurrection. The first is that Jesus is personally still living, and the second is that his influence is still living. The believer in immortality can accept the first; the observer, whose view sweeps the ages, and is not darkened by events too near, will assent to the second. The believer in the first will say with Dr. Drummond that "the Christian's faith in God carries with it the assurance of eternal life; for God will not hand over to destruction the children of His love." The believer in the second will say with Mozoomdar, "Christ has lived and grown with the Christian religion. : . . As the seed holds the tree in reserve, as the type unfolds itself in the long course of evolution, so the Galilean has developed into the idea man. : : : What it was possible for him to say, to do, and to become, Christ did say, do, and become in his brief recorded life-time. What was not possible then, he has been uttering and effecting in these two thousand years."

When the early Christian wished to convert his brother Jew to belief in the resurrection of Jesus, he did not appeal to the evidence that it had happened, but to the prophecies from the Old Testament, which were believed to foretell such an event. "Nothing," says Chrysostom, "made so strong an impression on them as an appeal to prophecy. Such an appeal carried more weight than the facts themselves." That was one way of proving the resurrection. But there is a necessity of proving it in a different way to-day—not by appealing to the prophets, but by becoming filled with the light of heaven, the knowledge of God, so that we ourselves become prophets, proclaiming and revealing a new life to the world, a life so different from the life around us, that the world will testify to its being the heavenly life, a life risen out of a dead or darkened world. Then will the world exclaim, "He is not here (where one expected to find him). He is risen : : : there shall ye see him" (in the lives of his disciples).

It is pathetic to read in the early Christian writings (e.g., Clement of Rome), of the expectations of a personal return that were doomed to disappointment. "These things have we heard, and our fathers have told us these things. But, behold, we are grown old, and none of them has happened unto us." And then the reply of encouragement is given: "Of a truth, yet a little while, and his will shall suddenly be accomplished. : : : He shall quickly come and not tarry." But still the time went on, and their expectations were not realised. And the disciples learnt at last what the Crusaders learnt when they had wrested the tomb of Christ from the "infidel." "He is not here, he is risen," and they had to seek for him elsewhere. And where? Risen and living as the moving spirit in all that is best in all the Christian ages. We may see him in the whole impression which he made upon his own generation and that immediately succeeding it. We may see him living in and through the lives of his followers then and now. We may see him as the most potent influence in Christendom; and we may feel the power of his spirit in our own lives.

The seed from which the tree has sprung is dead; it is no longer here with us, but it has issued forth in a great and glorious and enlarged life, in a tree that is to-day the shelter and sustenance of the nations. "We can know what is in the germ only by seeing how it manifests itself in the plant." And so we see this spirit unfolding itself in the life of the disciples, in the struggles they have waged with oppression and wrong, with sin and slavery, with ugliness and tyranny in their thousand varying forms; we see it in the efforts to overcome the world, and in the countless loving and untiring projects to redeem and bless mankind.

And as the angel is reported to have said to the women at the grave, "He goeth before you . . . there shall ye see him"; so shall we find him to-day, going on before, leading men and women, inspiring them with his spirit, with his devotion, and love, working in them a real resurrection, lifting them above the weariness and waywardness of the world into the kingdom of perfection, power, and peace, into the kingdom of God.

E. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS.

THE TOMB IN THE GARDEN.

AT this period Christendom turns to consider anew the world-stirring story of the death, the burial, and the resurrection of its Founder. In that story we seem to be reading the poetry of faith rather than the prose of history. By the cross there is a tomb, but it is a tomb in a garden! It is not a tomb full of the corruptions of many generations, but new, sweet, and clean. The lacerated form of the dead Christ is laid to rest, not on a desolate and barren mountain, but amid the flowers of Easter—tokens of Life, the master-force of the universe. After the dark shadow of night has passed, and the hope-inspiring light of the first morning of the week has dawned, the tomb in the garden is visited. And with varying results. The literalist, the fearful, the doubtful, hasten to peep into the opened tomb—only to find it empty! Loving faith and tender sympathy, looking through tears, behold angels therein! In no garb of despair are they clad, but in garments of joy. Not messengers of wrath are they, but ministers of comfort; not angels of denunciation, but bearers of glad tidings—"He is risen!"

There is surely something significant in these, at first sight, mere coincidences. True, there is also much that perplexes. But how often we find Nature dumbly striving to indicate a way of hope in our time of despair. From the saddening mystery of the grave we turn to meditate on the garden. Every tree is a cross. Autumn is a time of the seemingly cruel sacrifice of nature's best productions. The keen piercing blasts of the north fill the forests with the agony of death. The very best and most beautiful life of a brief summer is shrivelled up into hardened husk of seed. Thus swathed is the promising life laid in the tomb at the foot of the tree on which it has been crucified. The tomb is closed, and by frost and snow it is sealed. But the place of burial is a garden, to which there comes the morn of Easter! By unseen hands the stone is rolled away. The decaying fruit, the dry and withered bulb, the hard seed-shell—that which had no form or comeliness, which we esteemed as stricken, smitten, and afflicted—no longer contain what had been enclosed. The wrappings remain, that which they held is gone. At the entrance to the tomb there now are angels of life. In the snowdrops and the lilies they are clad in white; in the young shoot, the blade of grass, the budding leaf, they are "dressed in living green." So it is invariably that Nature's tomb is in a garden. And the garden is a place of recuperation, not destruction.

Evolution is a long story of numberless crucifixions. It tells also of numberless resurrections. There are empty tombs and grave wrappings in abundance, but life has risen. There is seen rising instinct, rising aspiration, rising intelligence, rising power over environment, rising affection for offspring, rising concern for the weak and neglected, rising love for others manifested through a rising power of self-denial. And, with all this, a rising glory of life. The civilisation of ancient Accadia is laid to rest in the tomb by the Euphrates. But it is a tomb in a garden, for soon the more advanced civilisation of Semitic Babylonia is found in its place. Babylonia, with its polytheism, is crucified and entombed, but Hebrew monotheism is as a young man in white apparel standing at the entrance, and telling of a risen conception of things. A Grecian civilisation, with its love of the beautiful and its care for the treasures of knowledge, is found occupying the garden where had been interred a preceding race of fierce savages who cared for none of these things. The more advanced peoples of Northern Europe are to-day the messengers of progress, sitting at the tomb of Rome-destroying Goth and Vandal, pointing an enquiring age the way to a more exalted life. The Stuarts cast forth into the grave of exile the men of The Mayflower. Favourable winds wafted their frail barque to another garden of the Lord. And, behold, the great, free, advancing nation of the New World.

Not less strikingly is this way of crucifixion, followed by a more beautiful and vigorous life, seen in the history of religious movements. From the tomb in the garden at Jerusalem, there go forth Peter, James, John, Paul, Barnabas, Stephen, Timothy, and others who are nameless, calling on men to cease looking back on the sepulchres of the past for their religious life, and to go forth to meet the Christ in the simpler, holier life of their own Galilee. Most of these in turn were martyred. But their tombs became churches full of a new and advancing life. From time to time new movements for a purified religion have stepped forth from some obscure Nazareth, only to have its leaders crucified by a persecuting hierarchy. But their tombs have been in a garden. The young men of a succeeding generation have been animated with the spirit of the martyred reformers, and the heresy of one generation becomes the orthodoxy of its successors. The men of white apparel at the tomb are always young men. It is the younger and more advanced generation, which is able to do that for which the pioneers could only dare, and die. For during the intervening time the forces making for a wider life of the soul have continued working. Ideas have spread. A greater number have grown up to apprehend the newer conceptions. A minority comes to be a majority. That which was branded as error by prejudice or vested interest, is the accepted truth of to-day.

Progress by crucifixion appears to be Nature's universal method. At first sight it is harsh and unattractive. But man is peculiarly endowed with the intelligence for perceiving Nature's methods, and the power of adopting them, and making them serve his own ends. Every day man is acting on this endowment whereby to lever himself up in the scale of power. But few, we fear, have grasped the importance of self-crucifixion as a means of an advancing personal life. Stress is laid in the Gospels and Epistles on the point that Christ, of his own will, endured the cross. Of the apostles, Paul seems to have most clearly grasped the significance of the Christ-method. He is frequently writing of crucifying self with Christ; of dying daily; of knowing the power of Christ's resurrection. And we find his life to be a series of crucifixions. The money-loving man of Tarsus, the persecuting Pharisee, the apostle of the circumcision, is each in turn crucified. By his cross he ever has a tomb wherein he can effectually leave the things that are behind. But his tomb is always in the garden of aspiration, or of search for truth, or of a feeling after the wider love of God. So there ever springs forth the more enthusiastic, the more humble, the broader-minded, the more lovable Paul.

Would it not be well if this Easter we could get a clearer apprehension of that for which we are apprehended by the Infinite? Might we not do well to culitvate our wills to the strength required to do the will of God? Then we might, in holy, intelligent, and faithful abandon, crucify the imperfect of the present; seal it in the tomb which is in the garden of noble, Godward strivings; and find in its place the angels of a sweeter, more gracious, and more powerful life.

This thought of Nature's processes seems to point a directing finger to a life that is immortal. That complex, intense, and highly concentrated bundle of forces we name personality, is a developing quantity. It gathers power as it develops. It discards one environment for another, and a purer. It allows some organs to atrophy, and cultivates others which are better suited to help in carrying out its advancing purpose. May not, therefore, what we call death be but a leaving behind of a dense and coarse form of matter for a more ethereal one, which shall be more susceptible, more plastic, more effectual in the upward-reaching of the personality? So we are led to think that the force will persist, but the form on which it operates, change; that the personality will continue outflowering in more beautiful and potent ways, as it is enabled to free itself from the binding wrappings of the past.

J. Morley Mills.

IMMORTALITY.

AN ASPECT.

To many persons the thought of immortality is merely that of extended life. The very word "survival," which to-day so often takes the place of "immortality," is a weaker word. To "outlive," with its necessary reference to the life lived now, is a far narrower term than the grand word "undying." Does not the word-difference denote a weaker conception, a less vivid consciousness of the quality of the life so expressed?

Between a journey of seven miles and one of seven thousand the difference is not only one of extent and duration. For the latter we need a different equipment and preparation. If the demand upon our energy is greater, we also draw new supplies of energy from the greater prospect. We experience a thrill which never visits us on setting out on some shorter and familiar track. The initial hardships and preparations are not nearly so difficult. They dwindle as we think of all we are to see and achieve. I have known invalids, ordered on such a voyage, in whom the keen anticipation, the stir and bustle of preparing has restored health before they started.

The immense margin of potential knowledge that surrounds our little area of things known means more for the scientist than the acquisition of fresh facts. It means energy and resolution, "scorn of delights," and "laborious days." Its effects are visible in the smallest details of his life, and his way of regarding a thousand and one things that have no immediate connection with his researches.

The difference between a life of threescore years and ten and a life that is unending cannot be expressed, merely by duration. It is a qualitative difference. We do not merely look out on days and years to be added to "this present"; we perceive days and years, and all else of our present surroundings to be accidents of time and space, and we ourselves units of the all-pervading, unending energy of love. Surely it was this qualitative difference that led Paul to contrast the afflictions of a moment with a weight of glory "eternal"—not future, but eternal, i.e., now and here and hereafter—and, so measured, to account them "light." Such a conception of immortality must of necessity enter into every detail of the life present. It becomes the atmosphere of that life. And if our present life was intended to be lived in this larger consciousness it is no wonder that, without it, the burden of life seems—nay, is—so intolerable, and a sense of fatigue and languor fills the social and intellectual world.

It is said that the notion of immortality—or lack of it—makes little difference to man's estimates and conduct. With many, who have accepted the doctrine, it has only resulted in slackness of moral tone. On the other hand, many great and wise men, from Seneca onwards, have failed to see how the cause of virtue is commended by indefinitely extending its practice. If good be good at all, is it not good here and now? May not the possibility of a future be a negligible quantity? Exactly, a negligible quantity; and it is in its quantitative aspect that it thus fails, fails to attract thoughtful unbelievers, fails to influence shallow believers who receive it as a doctrine merely affecting the future. Expressed as duration, it is comparatively impotent.

Taken, however, in its larger aspect, consider whether it does not make a very marked difference in the quality of the present life. Consider the ordinary limitations, sorrows, vexations, and disappointments that make up so large a part of the "broken arcs." To these two attitudes are broadly discernible among us:—(1) That of rebellion, more or less pronounced; (2) That of surrender to them as inevitable, more or less constrained.

Hedonism, Stoicism—the two great sects into which man, so far as his attitude to suffering, is divided. Whether we consider the Hedonist as a lover of pleasure or a fugitive from pain, whether in the egoistic or altruist sense; whether we take the Stoic in his philosophic or religious aspect, whether moderate or ascetic, these two great types of men's attitude towards life are everywhere, in every religion, in every home.

A good illustration of what I mean is afforded by Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Helbeck." In Laura we have the human spirit ever striving to escape the tyranny of circumstance, and finally seeking it in the river torrent. In her cousin, Herbert Mason, we have the common sensualist, the lowest type of the Hedonist; and in Laura's Cambridge friends a high and very delightful form of cultured Hedonism. And then, against this background of pleasure seeking or pain-eluding life, the art of the author gives us the stern figure of Helbeck—one of the noblest types of religious Stoicism, because so remarkably free from egoism. Wide as is the distance that separates Laura from the Friedlands, and both from the coarse and dissolute cousin, it is nothing to the gulf that separates all from Helbeck in his heroic surrender to the limitations of his life. They stand for rebellion against hardship; he, for surrender to it.

On the actual stage of life the rebellion—in its very many forms—is more common than the surrender, though the latter is not so rare as some would have us think. The point, however, I wish to suggest is, both equally miss the mark as interpretations of life, equally fail as modes of living it; and that their failure lies in their limited conception of life. Alike to the coarse or refined Hedonist, to the Stoic in his noble surrender, there come moments of divine surmise when the joy of a conscious relationship with eternal love lifts him, as it were, out of himself, and gives him a hint of the true temper in which life is to be lived, a calm assurance of victory and serene joy. Possessed of this, endurance takes the place of surrender, and our manifold rebellions become puerile and contemptible.

"Que vivre est difficile, O mon cœur fatigué!" is the exclamation of Amiel. "Non delicata res est vivere," is the similar burden of Roman Stoicism. Both had utterance at a time very like the present, when material ingathering had "fatigued" men's hearts and the sense-life pressed heavily upon them. "Life is a rough business" is a healthy observation compared with the commoner cry nowadays: "How hard it is to live, O weary heart of mine!"—a cry that never seems so pathetic as when it escapes the parched lips of > Pleasure slumberless and pale,

> And Passion with rejected veil;

but contrast both with words like these: "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world"; "My peace I give unto you, not as the world giveth give I unto you; let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid"; "Rejoice and be exceeding glad, because your names are written in heaven."

Those are the words of one who lived this life in the consciousness that he was alive for evermore, "by the power of an endless life." Such consciousness has a "power," an energising, transmuting power, a chastened exultation, an absence of the local colour of finite things—how manifest those know who ponder the Life of limitations in the Galilean hills.

Laura, her poor fluttering spirit going out in the swollen river; the Friedlands with their little round of cultured trivialities; Helbeck, alone in his desperate surrender, his very religion being hardly more than the reflection of it—all of us are somewhere among these. "'Tis life whereof our nerves are scant," and why? Because we live within closed doors, behind shuttered windows. In the dimness we misconceive the objects around us. So we grow narrow, bounded, weighed down with material oppression. One burst of sunshine, one rush of fresh air, how our faded energies would revive. In an atmosphere of such how differently should we live, redeemed alike from the worship of sorrow and the worship of pleasure.

LONDON IN THE REIGNS OF THE GEORGES.*

I was walking the other night along the ridge of Hampstead: below me on the right lay London, subdued by the illusion of the darkness, and merely suggested by the unnumbered lamps that were scattered everywhere across the valley. Turning to the left, countrywards, the effect was almost oppressive, while quite brilliant, of those other groups and lines of light, twinkling evidence of the new towns which annex the broad pasture lands dividing London from the Northern Heights. Such is the city to-day, vast in extent, hardly a city—a great huddle of houses, and, such as it is, chiefly the work of the nineteenth century.

It is a strangely different London we see in the drawings and engravings now on view in Bond-street. We look across the Hampstead reservoir toward London (186) and in front of us is the country; only beyond is the city, which now crowds all the lowland, but then appeared as a belt of houses along the river, a belt, looking from this distant height, almost as tenuous as some fringe of willow trees by a stream. This comparative smallness of London comes to us as a first impression as we move round the rooms. Here is a London after David Cox (100), drawn from a point now in the midst of dense overcrowded population: in the foreground are cattle, and still waters, in the distance the purple dome of St. Paul's. Milbank (98) is quiet country, its windmills looking entirely at home. In the Westminster from Tothill Fields (62) the Abbey is seen springing aloft from a group of houses, and around is the real country even as Salisbury shows to-day when we loiter among the lush grass by its busy streams. St. Pancras (231) is a country parish, even the "noble structure of St. Clement Danes" (40), engraved by Kip, stands in a spacious world of fresh air.

It is very pleasant to linger among these pictures musing of a London that looks so small to us, but which then seemed to the inhabitants so alarmingly big or so magnificently great. We are reminded of the satire of Swift, or, according to our mood, of the faith of Browning, for both refused to admit the common distinction between the little and the large.

For the most part it is the pomp of London, its stately buildings and squares and places, that we see in these engravings. Here are the Cathedral and the Temple Church, the South Sea House of Bubble fame and the College of Heralds, the Royal Academy in its home at Somerset House in the Strand. And we cannot overlook the Lord Mayor's Mansion House with the Monument, that lie in stone. The inscription that falsely recorded how the Creat Fire of London was set agoing by the Roman Catholics has been removed, and it may be that few of those who pass by pause to recollect the libel of religious suspicion of which this is the monument. London was also a city of gardens, pleasure grounds, and parks. Some of them remain, others have vanished, leaving but a name to tell the curious the things that have been. In those that are still we notice a difference. Hyde Park is frequently depicted. We would not miss those grotesque primeval bicyclists, the French hobby-horse riders, scorching along at eight or ten miles an hour, while they upset men and scare squeaking fowl. These two (189 and 189A) are among the most notable things in the exhibition. Here is the drinking-fountain (142). Around is a family group—and family groups are of all time—though with some differences of costume and deportment. Standing at a little distance is a figure, common then, unfamiliar now, the negro servant. This black man spells history. He reminds us of Granville Sharp and the campaign against slavery, which some have fondly supposed to be long ago fought and won. The lot of the Africans brought to London by their masters and often basely deserted was a very hard one. Only a few years before this engraving was made a charitable plan had restored several hundreds of these human derelicts to their native continent in the free colony of Sierra Leone. But many were left, and to possess a black servant served to lend distinction to his patrons. He is brought into the picture to symbolise the really respectable worth of the family group that takes the air and the water in Hyde Park.

To us this solitary black figure brings other suggestions. He reminds us that beside the stately city was another London—the London of strain and stress, of poverty, sickness, squalor, and discontent, and that between these two so inextricably intertwined yet so sharply distinguished cities was erected a great wall, invisible and impenetrable, of injustice. This other London is also represented, the London of Hogarth and others, whose work is removed from mere vulgarity by the savageness of its satire. The Vauxhall Gardens (112) where the two cities are united in a common bond of ignoble pleasure, should not be overlooked. It is a striking, if a disconcerting thing. A view of the Watch House of St. Mary-le-bone sufficiently explains the insecurity of the streets. Those old decrepit watchmen donning their long-skirted coats and taking down their lanterns preparatory to setting out on their rounds are inevitably a spectacle of derision to evildoers. The Pass Room in the old palace of Bridewell (19) was the place where vagrants were confined before being packed off to the parish of their settlement. Several women with children clad in gaudy rags are in the room; at the door stands a virago of a matron who shakes a fist of malediction at a new comer. In the numerous representations of the submerged city we do not find much feeling for the humanity of the poor. Yet during the reigns of the Georges this feeling was growing. Did not popular physicians write notes on beneficence as they rode in their carriages? London was amazed, more so, if that be possible, than even at the present time, with its own philanthropy. For all this the two streams of destitution and affluence flowed side by side, and we feel that these works do after all fairly reflect the temper of the time, and that there is truth in Blake's biting phrase, when he speaks of the city founded "outside of the human heart."

To return from these particulars: the exhibition ministers to our need for the pictorial element in life. It yields us history in an easy form, it reproduces a bygone world, old forms of thought and feeling. But chiefly it gives us what serious people too commonly lack, a vivid presentment of the circumstances of life, its little details, its furniture, so to speak, the things men make, and which are interesting because they make them, but which are also infinitely curious in themselves. The commonplace, wearisome enough in speech, is not without its fruitage of amusement when expressed in the more tangible, though less serious medium of streets and houses, especially when these are idealised, however slightly, by art.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bolton (Bank-street).—The Rev. J. H. Weatherall, M.A., who has succeeded the Rev. C. J. Street in the ministry of Bank-street Chapel, occupied the pulpit for the first time on Sunday last, when he preached both morning and evening to crowded congregations. The services were appropriate, and in the morning the anthem, admirably sung by the choir, was "How Lovely are the Messengers" (Mendelssohn). Choosing for his text the words: "What mean ye by this service" (Exodus xii. 26), Mr. Weatherall emphasised the difference between the spirit of true religion and the distinctive theologies which had come to be associated with the churches of various beliefs. Theology was the music score with all its inequalities and imperfections; religion was the rich melody breathing direct from the living God into the human chambers of the soul. Religion, he said, is real work in a world full of the goodness of God, expressed in selfishness restrained, and in sympathies flowing out in glad tidings to those who mourn. The church was an association of people bound together for the thinking of good thoughts and the doing of good acts. It was neither his purpose nor his function to lay down to them a set of beliefs, but rather to emphasise that their religion must express itself, with God's help, in mutual encouragement, in good thoughts, in kindly actions, and in earnest endeavour to make their lives more blessed to themselves and to others. At the commencement of his ministry, he desired to disclaim anything like superiority or pre-eminence, and to ask for the sympathy and co-operation of his people in mutually striving to be perfect in heart, strong in spirit, and hopeful in mind. The day's services were most impressive and helpful. A welcome meeting is arranged for Wednesday, April 13, at which various ministers and speakers will be present.

Bootle.—On the 22nd ult. a concert arranged by Miss May Major and Mr. A. W. Jefferies (the church organist) was held in the Free Church Hall, in aid of the funds of the church. The audience was the largest ever yet gathered in the hall, and the programme elicited hearty applause. Several of Miss Major's pupils took part, giving selections of violin, mandolin, and pianoforte music very cleverly, supplemented by talented vocalists, a lady reciter, and a charming violin solo by Mr. Wm. Dixon, a young member of the congregation. A hearty vote of thanks to all concerned was carried by acclamation.

Brighton.—The Rev. H. M. Livens terminated his ministry at Christ Church on Sunday last.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission.—The annual meeting was held on Monday, March 28, at the Mission Buildings, Lower Montague-street, Bristol. In the unavoidable absence of Mr. P. J. Worsley, J.P., the chair was taken by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, who, in a few cheerful words, opened the proceedings, and then called upon the missionary, Mr. J. B. Robinson, to present his report. That document proved to be not merely a detailed account of the Mission's work, but full of human interest, giving graphic pictures of numbers of cases in which the Mission had proved a truly beneficent institution, extending wise and generous help where such help was most needed. Incidentally the report contained a vigorous appeal for additional workers in the field, there being abundant opportunity for those who desired to minister to their poorer brethren. The Rev. Dr. Warschauer, hon. sec. to the Mission, next presented the committee's report, and Mr. J. Kenrick Champion, the hon. treasurer, submitted his financial statement. The reports having been adopted, Mr. Blatchford moved, and Mr. Price seconded, a vote of hearty thanks, confidence, and sympathy to be expressed to Mr. and Mrs. Robinson in their strenuous and self-sacrificing labours in the service of the Mission. This was carried by acclamation. The committee and officers for the ensuing year having been appointed, votes of thanks to the officers and chairman closed the proceedings.

Dewsbury.—The congregation has just lost one of its oldest members and most loyal supporters by the death, at the age of seventy-two, of Mr. Joseph Keighley. He had been in unbroken fellowship for a period of about thirty years, during the greater part of which time he had also been superintendent of the Sunday-school, in which capacity his record must surely be almost unique. No one can remember a single occasion, morning or afternoon, on which he was absent from his post, until within a month of his death. When, a little over three years ago, the church was closed for several months, Mr. Keighley rendered a signal service by keeping the Sunday-school together, and so preserving a nucleus around which the resuscitated congregation might gather when the day of resurrection came. His remains were borne to their last resting-place by young men who have grown up in the school under his superintendence; and the service was conducted by the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman in the presence of a representative gathering of present and past members, teachers, and scholars. Memorial services were held in the church and school on Sunday last.

Liverpool: Ancient Chapel of Toxteth (Welcome Meeting).—On Wednesday, March 23, a soirée was held in the meeting-room to offer a welcome to the new minister, the Rev. Charles Craddock, and Mrs. Craddock. Among the letters of greeting was one from the Rev. W. J. Jupp, in which he said:—"I shall always think of the beloved old chapel, and its minister, and its congregation as quietly and strongly witnessing for something which in your vast city is very greatly needed. May its influence grow wider and deeper with advancing time. May the time-honoured traditions of freedom and reverence and religious peace, always associated with the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, be sustained and strengthened under the new ministry." Mr. Philip H. Holt, who was in the chair, offered on behalf of the congregation a cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Craddock, and hoped that those high ideals of freedom, truth, and righteousness for which the chapel had stood would be ever kept in view in the coming days. He thought there were signs of progress, and that they ought not to be discouraged. The Revs. R. A. Armstrong and J. Collins Odgers also joined in the welcome, and Mr. Craddock, in acknowledging the welcome, said that he would like to say a few words in explanation of his acceptance of the pulpit of the Ancient Chapel, after having spent the greater part of his life amongst Congregationalists. In a few words he sketched the course which his religious beliefs had followed. The process which has resulted in his seeking fellowship with our Free Churches began years ago on his learning, mainly from Wordsworth, the truth of the Divine Immanence. That conception gradually altered his relation to the whole round of Christian doctrine. He therefore sought admission into a fellowship in which he might be free to teach what he believed, to be true to himself, without being false to a standard, or supposed to mean more than he said. During the evening the choir sang and the girls' club, who last Saturday week took the first prize at St. George's Hall in the competition, sang their part song conducted by Miss Ella Worrall.

London: Peckham.—The Avondale Band of Hope held its annual meeting on Tuesday, March 22, when prizes were distributed by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards. After tea, to which about sixty members and friends sat down, a well-organised entertainment was given, and the proceedings concluded with an amusing farce. The Avondale Band of Hope, thanks to the exertions of Mrs. W. J. Cooley and other officers, is rapidly regaining its prosperity and influence. A feature of the evening's proceedings was a farewell address by Mr. W. Lawton, who is leaving in the course of a few days for the United States.

Macclesfield.—A memorial service, which was well attended, was held on Sunday evening, March 27, in the ancient chapel in King Edward-street, in memory of the Rev. Joseph Freeston, a former minister of the chapel. The Rev. W. G. Cadman preached an eloquent sermon from 2 Cor. iv. 18. At the conclusion of the sermon Mr. Cadman proposed a vote of condolence with the family of the deceased, which was passed by the congregation standing for some minutes in silent prayer. The service was concluded by the organist playing Beethoven's "Funeral March."

Merthyr Tidfil (Religious Services for the People).—The last of the four special services in the Theatre Royal was held on Sunday evening, March 27, conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis. The service was held at eight o'clock, so as to appeal to members of other churches, as well as non-church-goers, and the officiating minister was on each occasion supported on the platform by the Revs. D. J. Williams, J. Hathren Davies, and J. P. Kane, the Unitarian ministers of Merthyr, Cefn Coed, and Dowlais respectively. The largest congregation assembled on the first night, and the numbers steadily declined; but, at the closing service, it was estimated that, in spite of special counter-attractions on that evening, from 300 to 350 were present, and joined heartily in the service. Mr. Davis took up the subject on which the Rev. J. C. Street was to have spoken on the previous Sunday: "The Glad Message of Unitarianism."

Mottram.—On Saturday, March 26, at a congregational meeting, the Revs. James Harwood and H. E. Dowson, attended as the appointed speakers from the B. & F.U.A., and delivered earnest addresses. It was mentioned that owing to a serious epidemic of measles in the district, the Sunday-school had been closed, and the sale of work announced for April 1 and 2 was postponed to April 22 and 23. On March 13 the Rev. H. Rawlings, of Denton, paid a welcome visit as preacher of the Mission sermons for the East Cheshire Christian Union.

Newcastle-upon-Tyne.—An adjourned special meeting of the congregation of the Church of the Divine Unity was held on March 27 to further consider the Rev. Frank Walters' resignation of his pastorate and to receive the report of the deputation which had waited upon him on behalf of the congregation. There was a large attendance, and the meeting unanimously passed the following resolution:—"That this adjourned meeting of the congregation of the Church of the Divine Unity, held expressly to consider the resignation of the Rev. Frank Walters, after careful consideration and with the knowledge that this step has been taken only after due deliberation, accepts the resignation, with feelings of deep regret. It would also take this opportunity of placing on record its sincere appreciation of the magnificent work accomplished by Mr. Walters during his nineteen years' pastorate; its affectionate recognition of his sterling qualities of heart and mind, and its deep sense of the noble character and lofty idealism of his life and work. This meeting would, furthermore, express its recognition of the great leavening influences brought to bear on Christian thought outside of this church by his forceful utterances; and the pleasure it feels in the knowledge that so many people outside our fold have participated in the fruits of his efforts. Finally, it is the united hope of all that the Rev. Frank Walters may be long spared to successfully promote the cause of Christian truth and righteousness.

North-East Lancashire Sunday-School Union.—On Saturday, March 26, a new departure was entered upon which, it is hoped, may result in an annual gathering of a similar kind. Last year, at a conference held at Accrington, Mr. Thomas Kenyon, of Newchurch, advocated the cultivation of music as being a help to school and church services, and as a result of some of the suggestions made, a musical festival was decided upon, in which all the schools in the Union should take part. Last Saturday's meeting was the practical outcome of Mr. Kenyon's paper, and it was a matter of deep regret to those who gathered at Nazareth Chapel, Padiham, that Mr. Kenyon was no longer amongst them, his death having occurred a few weeks after the delivery of his paper. The festival was an undoubted success. For some weeks the choir and scholars have been rehearsing the special hymns and anthems selected, and Mr. Thomas Marsden, of Padiham, the conductor, visited the various places for practice. Between 500 and 600 scholars, members of choirs, and friends came together under the chairmanship of Mr. S. Holden, of Burnley, president of the Union. Five hymns were sung, and the united choirs sang "And the Glory" (Messiah) and "The Radiant Morn" (Woodward). So well did they acquit themselves that the chorus from the Messiah had to be repeated before the close of the service. Four solos were also sung with excellent taste and feeling, and short and appropriate addresses were delivered by the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas and the Rev. W. H. Burgess. Mr. Thomas remarked that the great mass of people were swayed more by feeling than by intellect, and were influenced more through the heart than the head. They had paid a good deal of attention to developing a reasonable form of faith, it was now time for them to turn their thoughts a little more to the emotional side of their nature that the feelings of the people might be rightly and wisely directed. Such festivals as that in which they were now joining were excellent means to that end. Mr. Burgess said they were engaged in what they hoped would prove the first of many happy meetings for fellowship and praise. Praise and song were the natural expression of certain elemental feelings which the prose of ordinary speech seemed too poor and inadequate to set forth. Mr. Burgess also spoke of the helpful influence in his own experience of the little gatherings in the homes of the people for the singing of the hymns they loved, and concluded by an appeal to all to help the service of praise in their churches. Warm thanks were accorded to the conductor, organist, and secretary for the efforts which had been crowned by so delightful a success. After the service tea was served in the school, which was followed by a social evening, when songs were given by friends from several of the schools in the Union.

Stockport.—During the four Sundays in March the Rev. B. C. Constable delivered a series of Sunday evening discourses on the "Christianity of Christ." The congregations were considerably above the average, and the discourses were listened to with deep attention.

Swansea.—A successful sale of work took place at the Unitarian schoolroom on Thursday, March 24, and was opened by Miss Brock. A large number of ladies belonging to the various denominations attended and helped with the sale. The profits, which, with previous subscriptions, amounted to about £70, were devoted towards the re-roofing of the church.

At the close of his Provincial Letter from Northumberland and Durham, a fortnight ago, Mr. E. H. Coysh quoted the address of welcome from the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association to the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches meeting in Newcastle. The address was read to the Council by the Rev. Thomas Law, the general secretary, who has since sent, as directed by the Council, a cordial acknowledgment, in which he says:—

We greatly appreciate your sympathetic interest. We recognise fully the great work you have done, and are still doing, as an organisation.

On Saturday, March 19, at a meeting of the N. and E. Lancashire Lay Workers' Fraternity, at Colne, a paper on "The Circuit System, its Adaptability to Unitarian Needs" was read by Mr. J. S. Mackie, of Burnley. The greater part of this paper we hope soon to publish in full.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., left London on Wednesday to join the P. and O. s.s. India at Marseilles, on his mission to Australia and New Zealand, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Mr. Hargrove is accompanied by Mrs. Hargrove, and sails by way of Suez and Colombo to Fremantle. After a visit to the Unitarians of Perth he is to proceed to Adelaide, Melbourne, and Sydney, to Tasmania and New Zealand, returning home by way of America. In addition to the official reports of his mission, which he will send to the Association, and part of which, at any rate, we shall be able to make public, we look forward to receiving from Mr. Hargrove a special series of letters, telling of his travels. The good wishes of many friends go with him and Mrs. Hargrove on their way, and a very cordial welcome home will await them in the autumn.

IT is a long time, even in the history of the work of the "forward school" of our Empire builders, since anything quite so atrocious has been perpetrated in the name of the people of Brita n as the "battue," to quote the phrase of the special correspondent of a Ministerialist journal, which took place among the snow-covered mountains of Thibet on Thursday week. A "peaceful mission" has been sent into Thibet to "treat" with the authorities there with regard to certain alleged breaches of trading agreements made between the Indian Government and China on behalf of the Thibetans. But an armed escort has been sent with this peaceful mission, consisting of a large body of Sikhs and Gourkhas, with magazine rifles and Maxim guns. The Thibetans have positively refused to treat with this mission till the armed escort has retired to the Indian frontier. Our response has been to advance instead of to retire, and yet up to Thursday of last week we had met with no opposition, the Thibetans retiring sullenly before us.

BUT on Thursday morning a final demand was made by the Lhassan general that we should retire at least to Yatung. This was refused, and the announcement made that we should, on the contrary, forthwith advance to Guru. We advanced in open order, without firing, and moved the Thibetans from their positions in much the same way as a force of police would clear a London street with their "Pass along, please." But this was not enough. It was decided that it was "necessary to disarm" the Thibetans who remained, although no use had been made by them of the old matchlocks, swords, and spears which served them as weapons. Even to this a large number of these peaceful soldiers submitted—but not all of them. Sir Henry Cotton, the well-known Anglo-Indian authority, commenting on the incident, says:—

> The act of a peaceful mission, in attempting to disarm the Thibetan authorities who objected to their further advance, was a piece of the grossest possible aggression, and could only have resulted in a collision.

And it did. The recalcitrant remnant "obstinately held their places," and though their rear was perfectly open and they could have marched away if they had wished, they "stood together round the Lhassan general in a discontented frame of mind and muttering angry threats."

PRESENTLY they were surrounded by a thin ring of Sikhs with fixed bayonets. Then there was a sudden scuffle in a corner of the ring. The Thibetans began throwing stones and their general shot a Sikh with his revolver. Then the Thibetans "uttered a wild shout, drew their swords, and surged forward in all directions, firing their matchlocks," General Macdonald and those round him narrowly escaping with their lives. Then the "battue" began. The Sikhs opened with a "terrible magazine fire."

> The Thibetans were so huddled together that they were unable either to use their swords or to fire. Many of them probably killed each other in their mad excitement. Finally, the mob surged to the rear, breaking through the ring of Sikhs.

Did the "battue" end then, with the Thibetans dislodged and in retreat? No. They had to be "taught a lesson" as to the consequences which follow resistance to a peaceful British mission.

The Thibetans, though their retreat was still open, disdained to scatter and run. They tramped away slowly, steadily, sullen and solemn, followed by a perfect hail of bullets. The mountain battery came into action and tore their line with shrapnel. A terrible trail of dead and dying marked their line of march. Finally the last wounded Thibetan limped round the corner, about 400 yards away. The grim tragedy was over.

Or so at least the special correspondent of Reuter's Agency supposed. But General Macdonald adds the significant statement that "the 2nd Mounted Infantry were despatched in pursuit, and the balance of the troops, reforming, pushed on to Guru."

The two eastern Guru villages were evacuated, but the western one was held, and, after being shelled, was taken by the 2nd Mounted Infantry and Gourkhas, the garrison surrendering. This ended the engagement, except that the 1st Mounted Infantry continued the pursuit for some miles further.

ON Easter Sunday Colonel Younghusband, the head of the Mission which General Macdonald is escorting, visited the wounded Thibetans, "and told them that their own folly in provoking a fight had brought them to their present position," adding that "the Mission was still peaceful, and only wanted to treat with the Thibetans." This is the same Colonel Younghusband concerning whom Lord Curzon reported on Jan. 12 of this year that he > Says he will make every effort to bring about a settlement by peaceful means, but sees no chance of a settlement being effected until the power of the monks at Lhassa is broken.

What can that mean but annexation, pure and simple? And this is the man who speaks, in our name, to men who fell defending their country against an armed invasion, of "their folly in provoking a fight." Be it noted that the usual all-sufficient excuse for such abominable butchery as that described above, the excuse that "this is war," is absent in the present case. It was the escort of a "peaceful mission," in the process of forcibly disarming the troops of a friendly Power within its own territory, by which this butchery was perpetrated. Such hypocritical makebelief would be beyond comprehension were it not for the existence of Section 55 of the Government of India Act, 1858, which provides that—

> Except for the purpose of preventing or repelling actual invasion of Her Majesty's Indian possessions, or under other sudden urgent necessity, the revenues of India shall not, without the consent of both Houses of Parliament, be applicable to defray the expenses of any military operation carried on beyond the external frontiers of such possessions.

We are face to face, then, with a deliberate usurpation of the authority of the Imperial Parliament on the part of the Indian Government, acquiesced in against their better judgment, as Mr. Brodrick's despatches plainly show, by the Ministers of that Imperial Parliament at home. The present House of Commons has done much to weaken the authority which the Constitution reposes in it, but it is difficult to imagine that it will submit to so flagrant an infringement of its rights and the rights of the people it represents.

The Bishop of Rochester presided over the Macedonian Conference at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, on Tuesday week, and declared that Great Britain was pledged up to the hilt to take action in this matter. The following were the resolutions passed:—

That this Conference, composed of delegates from all parts of the United Kingdom and from France and Italy, declares that the continuance of Turkish misrule in Macedonia and Armenia is a disgrace to civilised Europe, and records its condemnation of the horrors and atrocities that have been committed by the Turks in that province.

That having regard to the failure of Russia and Austria-Hungary during the past fourteen months to effect any improvement in the condition of the inhabitants of Macedonia, or to avert the danger of renewed insurrection, this Conference declares that the only satisfactory solution of the Macedonian question is the appointment of a Governor independent of the Sultan and responsible only to the Great Powers of Europe.

Lord Aberdeen, Mr. James Bryce, Mr. T. Hodgkin, Mr. Nevinson, and Dr. Monro Gibson were among the speakers, as were also the Editor of the Revue de Paris, Signor Agnoletti, M. Quillard, who was charged with a message from M. de Pressensé, and Mme. Karavelof, widow of the late Prime Minister of Bulgaria.

The unifying of the interests of all the peoples of the world has been curiously and painfully illustrated in the last few weeks. The Italian Minister of Finance, Signor Luzzatti, had hoped this year, by a conversion of the National Debt, to reduce the expenditure, and by this means to cancel or at least reduce the salt tax, which in Italy, as in India, is one of the curses of the peasantry. The outbreak of the Russo-Japanese war, by tightening the money market, has rendered this conversion impracticable, and has thus postponed a most urgent reform.

Unsuccessful in this, Signor Luzzatti has decided upon a very different reform. The grants to parish priests will be raised to £36 or £40 a year! The turn of the country schoolmaster may perhaps come next. In the province of Teramo he may still be found working for the proverbial "penny a day." Even in the provinces of Florence and Perugia the minimum salary is fourpence a day. Little wonder that, after the Portuguese, the Italians are the most illiterate of the peoples of Western Europe. As an observer says, a mass is better paid in Italy than eight or ten hours of teaching. We understand that Signor Orlando is introducing a measure to raise the salary of the teachers in country schools to £30 or even £38 a year, a modest figure, surely! The Italians are at last beginning to understand that the happiness and prosperity of the country is bound up with educational reform.

A Ruskin exhibition of great interest has been opened in the City Art Gallery at Manchester, and is now freely available by the public. It contains large numbers of Ruskin's own drawings, and pictures by those of whom he wrote and by whom he was chiefly influenced. There is a fine collection of Turner drawings and paintings, and of works by Holman Hunt and others of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, some well known, others rarely seen. A number of copies of early Italian paintings made for Ruskin, and many illustrations of Venetian and other beautiful architecture are included, as well as manuscripts and early editions of Ruskin's works and portraits and other Ruskiniana. Mrs. Arthur Severn spoke at the opening ceremony, giving several interesting reminiscences of Ruskin, and the chief address was given by the Vice-Chancellor of the Victoria University of Manchester. The admirable arrangement of the exhibits is due in large measure to Mr. Collingwood, Ruskin's private secretary and biographer, and Mr. J. Ernest Phythian. It is not likely that there will ever be a better opportunity of studying Ruskin in his relation to art and natural scenery.

The scheme for a United Congregational Church or for a reconstitution of the Congregational Union, initiated by the late Dr. Parker, has been under discussion for a considerable period, and the approach of the May meetings brings it very much to the front. The columns of the Examiner, which contain discussions of the proposals, show that there is not yet a complete consensus of opinion. The old Independents, who are probably a dwindling number, view the newer policy with misgiving, and doubt whether anything better than an indifferently regulated Methodism will be the result if the proposed new constitution is carried into effect. The dangers apprehended seem to be twofold, the one as to the personnel of the ministry, the other as to the status of the individual churches.

One object of the proposals for a closer union is to exclude undesirable men from the pastorate. There is a fear that desirable may come to mean college trained. The scheme has been described as one to keep out of the ministry sons of labourers and such like. But if that were indeed the purpose it would be doomed to failure. Independency owes too much to the men whose training has been one of manual labour. Is the new constitution to operate in such a way as to exclude the stonemason and the tinker, or the dalesman pastor of a shepherd congregation? Even if such be not the intention, that, it is feared, may be the effect.

A second objection to the new proposals is that they will weaken the authority of the individual churches; and that they will also lessen the interest and dignity of the Assembly which is directly representative of the churches. This latter effect is probably inevitable. A large enthusiastic gathering held only twice a year cannot in the nature of things exercise control over the details of administration. That must more and more fall into the hands of experts. This is exactly the problem of the Trade Union world over again. But it hardly seems to follow that because concerns of common moment to a large denomination are to be treated by a smaller body less directly representative of the units, that, therefore, they will necessarily be less well managed. Every Congregationalist believes that where two or three are met together as a church Christ is present, and some of the fear of the old Independents seems to rest on the supposition that he is less likely to be present in a council meeting of two or three hundred. We cannot but follow these constitutional problems of a religious democracy with deep interest. And in this connection one disconcerting thought presents itself, viz., whether these discussions of constitutional questions do not indicate a certain weakening of vital force. The reflection has not to do with the Congregationalists more than with other denominations, our own included. It might be that the very vigour of life in the units of religious society would call for a more intimate confederation. But, on the other hand, the supposed need for mutual support may spring from a reduced strength. And if churches that are too feeble to stand alone essay to keep one another up, the result must be a doubtful one.

The Association of the Friends' Adult and other Sunday-schools has been holding its annual meeting at Sheffield. It reports an increase of 6,000 in its membership during the year. This is the more remarkable as this section of the movement seemed to have come to a standstill three years ago. One of the most hopeful features is the increasing part taken in the movement by women. The women's adult schools, like the Co-operative Guilds, are becoming in many places real centres of social regeneration.

All great virtues bear the impress of self-denial; and were God's present constitution of our nature and life so reversed as to demand no renunciation of desire, the chief interest and glory of our present being would pass away. There would be nothing in history to thrill us with admiration. We should have no consciousness of the power and greatness of the soul. We should love feebly and coldly, for we should find nothing in one another to love earnestly. Let us not, then, complain of Providence because it has made self-denial necessary; or complain of religion because it summons us to this work. Religion and nature here hold one language. Our own souls bear witness to the teaching of Christ, that it is the "narrow way" of self-denial "which leadeth unto life."

THE CHINESE ORDINANCE.

SIR,—My action in moving the resolution on this subject at the meeting of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, March 22, is called in question by Mr. Bakewell in your issue of April 2. The grounds of censure are:—(1) That it was an introduction of "politics"; (2) that, though a "Christian minister," I moved a "party-biassed motion"; and (3) that the term "slavery" is not a proper one to apply to the conditions set up under the Ordinance. In view of the importance of the subjects thus raised, I beg space for this reply:—

(1) Politics.—Let me ask, once for all, if it is to be a rule that as soon as any subject has come before Parliament it ceases to be proper for us, as an Association of religious people, to express an opinion upon it? That matters are introduced into Parliament which are distinctly remote from our interests as religious people every one will admit, and no one, I suppose, will wish to refer to them in our meetings. But upon such subjects, e.g., as temperance, gambling, vice, education, war and peace, it would seem that Christians, whether Unitarian or otherwise, ought to have something to say; yet the rule which appears to be implied would exclude them from our deliberations at the very moment when some step vitally important in regard to them is before the country. Would a proposal to set up the old system of "domestic slavery" in our colonies, or even at home, be ruled out of our legitimate purview, if it were embodied in a Bill, or if some political leader advocated it? There must surely be limits to our self-imposed silence. What does Mr. Bakewell take Christianity to mean, if it does not include a permanent interest in social and individual amelioration—permanent and manifest—whatever may be the fluctuations of political life?

(2) Party-bias.—It is a grief to our friend that a "Christian minister" should seem to be influenced by this. Certainly, of all men the Christian minister should be careful to avoid so mean a prejudice. For what is "party-bias" but the tendency to pervert truth in the interests of men seeking power and place in the State? Perhaps there is one thing worse, viz., the perversion of the truth in the interests of men who seek merely pelf, no matter at what cost to others—a "bias" which is, unhappily, only too evident in the journalistic world just now. But, as regards the motion submitted by me, if my censor thinks it departs from the facts he is fully justified in trying to correct me, and I shall look with interest to any rectification he may propose. If he thinks, however, that, in substance or in form, the motion owed anything to the supposed interests of any party—but one—the mistake is his. Since he makes this thus far a personal matter, I may be allowed to say that there never was a time in my adult life when I cared less than now for the prospects of any set of politicians as such. There may be a bias in my mind, I admit, in favour of the policy of "civil and religious liberty all the world over," which Unitarians, in the past at least, were not slow to maintain. Any other bias I repudiate, and even this, I trust, I yield to, not as an indulgence, but as a dictate of conscientious conviction.

But Christianity is appealed to. Mr. Bakewell evidently has an ideal of the duties of a "Christian minister." I do not covet that title, I will cheerfully renounce it, if those duties do not include making protest, and something more, against all proposals and plans which tend to injure and degrade men of any race whatever. In my deliberate judgment this Ordinance is such a plan. The Bishop of Hereford says: "In plain English, it comes to this, that we say to the Chinese that we will not have them in the Transvaal as men, but that we will import them as animated implements." Again, he says, "Plain men are saying, whether we agree with the description or not, that the Ordinance is nothing else than iniquitous and non-Christian." But I am aware that the Bishop of Hereford has been accused of speaking rashly. I turn, therefore, to the speech of the Archbishop of Canterbury—his latest speech on the subject in the House of Lords—which must be taken as representing the result of very careful thought, and at any rate he cannot be suspected of "party bias" against the Ordinance. The Archbishop says he is surprised at the view in its favour taken by the Transvaal authorities. He thinks that if he were there he would be found in the small minority that regards this introduction of Chinese labour as dangerous and inexpedient. He is "not altogether easy as to the working of the safeguards about the moral question," and, though he leaves the responsibility to those on the spot, it is, he confesses, "with no small measure of anxiety of heart." What the courtly prelate so regards, the simple citizen may be permitted to suspect greatly.

(3) The Ordinance.—Is it "of the nature of slavery"? The Bishop maintains it is; Mr. Bakewell thinks not. Let us examine it. What it provides is set out in twelve or thirteen pages of the Blue-book (including the dependent Regulations). It studiously avoids naming the Chinese, but everyone, from Lord Milner downward, knows that it refers to them; and its provisions are moulded by the peculiar character attributed to the Chinese people. There is a curious twofold aspect in which these people are regarded, and, according as one or the other side is kept prominent, the policy adopted changes its tone. In the one case, they are regarded as poor creatures existing on the verge of starvation, and in status considerably below the level of Europeans. In the other they are feared as "'cute" persons, easily capable of learning the mechanical arts, and instinct with business enterprise. While the former view prevails, the terms offered as to transit, maintenance and pay, though below the Kaffir standard, seem almost a benevolence; but when the latter presents itself the restrictions enforced appear to be the minimum that should be exacted in order to keep a dangerous competitor out of the labour market of South Africa, and, perhaps, a tainting influence out of the life of the people at large. The question of the duty owing towards them, if they are to be admitted into a British community, is one which does not seem to have entered much, if at all, into the mind of the promoters of the scheme; the main consideration in the debates in the Transvaal Council has been financial. It will be clear, however, to intelligent, not to say Christian people, that, if the Chinaman is a miserable and half-developed wretch, who will think himself blest to secure subsistence at any cost, any man or men to whom he is engaged should stand towards him almost in loco parentis, and should take care for his whole well-being, moral and physical. It is needless to say any indication that this is meant by the Ordinance is conspicuously absent. On the other hand, if the Chinaman is, in spite of his poverty, a human being so advanced in development that he is capable of proving himself the rival and perhaps the victor of the European in matters involving skill, industry, business foresight and self-restraining prudence, his claim to be treated consistently with his own self-respect, and the dangers, moral and social, of treating him otherwise rise immeasurably. The Ordinance policy alternating between the conception of him, now as a dull and servile being, now as a dangerous, because dexterous, competitor, manages to involve the maximum of evil and incongruity.

It prescribes that from the date of signing the contract of engagement the labourer is to be absolutely and solely under the direction of his "importer," or other person to whom, "with his consent," he may be assigned. He is under liability to severe penalties, if he so much as leaves the premises of the mine to which he is attached, unless he does so under a "permit," which may be granted, but by no means must, and which may be for forty-eight hours at a time, but, again, may be for as short a time as the "importer" may like. He must carry a passport, or be subject to arrest. He may return to China if he does not like the conditions when he has experienced them; but in order to do so he must repay the cost of transit (the mine agents estimate it at £20 per head out and home) and reasonable "damages" to the importer. Remember he is a person so poor that the chance of bare living is a prize to him, that his pay may be a shilling a day (no minimum is fixed, but this has been officially suggested) in a land where commodities are now at very high prieces, and that he is strictly forbidden to try to earn money either by petty trade or at any more lucrative occupation in the mines than that of an unskilled labourer. He is very likely, is he not, to have £20 to spare! A long list of offences with corresponding penalties warn him how completely he is to surrender his personal freedom. Mr. Chamberlain has admitted that the Kaffirs have been indifferently treated in the mines. Will the Chinaman fare better or worse? But the Kaffir could easily get away. Should the Chinaman run away and find a friendly succourer, the latter as well as himself is liable to imprisonment. Anything more hopeless than the condition of a hapless runaway cannot be conceived. This drastic "engagement" is to be for three years, renewable for three years more, and it is estimated by its promoters that, should it be "successful" (of course, from the employer's point of view), the term may be indefinitely prolonged by a subsequent Ordinance. If not extended the term of engagement ends in repatriation in China.

Now, Mr. Bakewell sees nothing in all this seriously different from the engagement under which, for example, a British soldier serves. Well, our mining lads in Durham and Yorkshire contribute a large quota to the troops; they know what mining means and what service in our army means. Let, however, some agent of the gold mines propose similar terms to them and see what answer he would get! On paper things may look very innocent that in practice are far otherwise. There is that stipulation, for example, that a labourer is not to be transferred to another employer without his consent — could anything be more generous and fair? No, but first remember that the people on the spot, who will have the working of the Ordinance, strenuously resisted this provision, and only yielded on pain of losing the whole thing if they did not; and, secondly, think of the condition of this poor, despised labourer, thousands of miles from home, bewildered with new circumstances, often reduced to physical exhaustion, and subject to all kinds of personal pressure, being asked to "consent" to his transference from A to B, neither of whom, probably, he ever sees, but only their agents. And, again, all is to be explained to the labourer before embarking, and his consent is to be obtained in writing. How admirable! But Sir Percy Fitzpatrick, a keen supporter of the policy, has, honestly enough, poured scorn on the notion of making these contracts with "uncivilised, illiterate people, who presumably will come by thousands." He evidently has in view, not the individual man, intelligent to observe all the bearings of things and with rights to be jealously guarded, but a horde of "animated implements," who will drift hither and thither at the interest of their temporary owners. Sir George Farrar, another prominent promoter, thinks 10,000 will do for a first importation, though the estimated shortage of labour is four or five times that number. If the scheme pays, they can easily go on to get the remainder, and, in fact, there is nothing in the Ordinance to prevent the regular engagement of a very large body of Chinese labourers as a permanent element in the industrial life, but not the civil life, of South Africa. It must be left to economists to estimate the effect on our industrial system of the entry of this formidable new factor into the field hitherto occupied by labourers at least fairly free, and enjoying the ordinary privileges of the rest of the community. What I wish to emphasise here is the enormous perils involved in massing and confining together so many people under conditions paralysing to the better side of human nature. The British Indian Government, alive to these perils, has insisted that no British Indian subjects (many of whom are as poor, certainly, as any Chinese can be) shall be imported by Ordinance to any country where they are to be deprived of the rights of British citizenship. What is not good enough for Indians the Chinese Government will probably approve—at a price—for Chinese; but no price ought to induce us, who were once proud of the boast of English liberty, to be willing to accept this blot on our civilisation. Even the soldier, pace Mr. Bakewell, is a British subject. These Chinese are not to be by any means or exertion admitted to the citizenship of our Empire. They are just good enough to do our drudgery, but not good enough to share our birthright. Of course it is not the old form of "slavery"—servitude upon capture or purchase—that is proposed; still, we want a name for it. Shall we call it, then, "honourable service" or "manly co-operation"? One more test—let somebody propose to recruit from our East-end slums a ragged regiment upon exactly such terms—heaven knows there are some of our London poor who would be glad enough to have victuals and shelter secured for them. But, even if they would "consent," the law of England would not consent that they should sign away their freedom like this. The mind and heart of England would insist on protecting the poor, weak, and ignorant against the iron pressure of the strong and grasping men who have really no human interest in their workers.

There lies the source of the abhorrence with which some of us, at least, regard this latest manifestation that the spirit of Christianity is set aside in our dealings with one another, and especially with the coloured populations. We remember the awful consequences that inevitably follow the neglect of moral principles and the human tie. It is not only the Chinese that will suffer in the carrying out of this sordid and shameful policy of setting up a "plantation" in the midst of a free community. The most cunning politicians cannot circumvent nature, and this unnatural and retrograde step will incur heavy penalties, social and physical, moral and religious. Already, it seems to me, a blight has fallen on the religious life of our people. Otherwise there would have been a cry, far more powerful than any I can raise, against our having part or lot in this abomination. Let us not adopt the plea, which seems good enough for an Archbishop, that, in spite of our qualms and uneasiness, the responsibility is on the people out there. As I ventured to say at the Council, I believe the hearts of our people are as one in this matter, and, if only we could see the essential principles involved, we should speak with one voice against so flagrant a breach of the law of doing to others as we would they should do unto us. But perhaps all this is very old-fashioned. Channing, with his prophetic claim for the dignity of man as man, is out of date, and only interests us now as a theorist on the uni-personality of the Godhead. Perhaps we ought to be content at our Association to vote money to churches where God will be worshipped and man not served, to issue copious books and tracts—polemical, theological, but strictly "non-political"—and to commission special preachers to preach the Gospel to the masses, carefully avoiding any reference to life as it is in the world to-day. I hope not.

But let me, in concluding, apologise very sincerely if any word here seems ill-considered, or unjust. I said of my motion that, if its expressions seemed strong, our feelings were strong, and required strong utterance. I believed, and still believe, that there are times when to keep silent is wrong, and that this is one of them. May our churches never flinch from the duty of speaking out, cost what it may. There has been too much timid temporising and halting speech, and too little practical Christianity about us.

W. G. Tarrant.

"THE INQUIRER" ON POLITICS.

Sir,—I was very glad to see in The Inquirer of Saturday the letters from Mr. Dowson and Mr. Bakewell, as they showed that the resolution respecting Chinese labour, proposed by Mr. Tarrant at a meeting of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was by no means approved. There were others at the meeting, besides the names given, who were opposed to it, amongst whom I was one. I voted against it, and had intended speaking, but so many kind things had been said of my late brother that I did not feel able to enter on any controversial subject.

Mr. Tarrant must be aware that there are two sides to the question, and that as many who are equally capable of giving an opinion can be found on either side.

The fact, however, is that it has been made a party question, and anything that it is thought will discredit the present Government is seized upon by The Inquirer, but that such a strongly-worded resolution passed at a meeting where there were certainly not more than twenty-five present should be put forth as representing the views of Unitarians as a body appears to me quite beyond the province of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and also of the paper which is supposed to represent the Unitarian body. I am not alone in feeling that for some time The Inquirer has taken a very false step in being so political, and I cannot help thinking that if continued it will have a serious effect on its circulation.

Stanton Wm. Preston.

April 4.

Sir,—I am not surprised that the circulation of The Inquirer does not increase, for the spirit shown towards anyone not seeing eye to eye with those responsible for the paper is not compatible with liberty and freedom of speech.

There are many who think, like Mr. Lawford, Mr. Stannus, and myself, about the impropriety of raising the question of the importation of Chinese coolies into South Africa, at the late Council Meeting, and more especially when only a score of persons were present to express an opinion on the subject, and yet a resolution condemning the Government is passed, as though representing the opinions of Unitarians generally. Percy Preston.

Sir,—I can think of nothing more damaging to the Unitarian cause than the political leaderettes in The Inquirer. When my subscription is out, I shall give up the paper, and have two copies of the Life instead. Though no Conservative, I would rather see a Republic, than Bannerman, Morley, and Bryce in command. John Waddingham.

Guiting Grange, Lower Guiting, Cheltenham, April 4, 1904.

Sir,—As you admit letters from those whose views differ from your own, may I say in your columns that I cordially agree with the letters from Mr. Dowson and Mr. Bakewell which appear in your issue of this day's date? It seems to me that strongly to assert certain political views is the function of the party politician, and not of "a journal of liberal religious thought and life," or of "the British and Foreign Unitarian Association," and that such dealing with politics, either by the one or the other, is not only not right in itself, but is well calculated to hinder the increase of our denomination, in numbers and influence, by suggesting the idea that all Unitarians are Radicals. Liberality, as I understand the term, requires the belief that views very different from those of the writer or speaker may be conscientiously held. Dennis B. Squire.

Sidmouth, April 2.

Sir,—The remarks of Messrs. Lawford and Preston at the recent Council Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and your correspondents in this week's Inquirer, open up two questions of vital importance.

(1) Are all questions of righteousness to be ruled out of order for fear of upsetting the political feelings of one side or the other?

(2) Are our ministers to be confined in a mental "compound" for fear of the same reason, especially when a wealthy contributor objects to some of his pet theories being called in question.

I am old enough to remember the time when our forefathers were made of sterner stuff, and were not afraid to range themselves on the side of freedom, irrespective of colour.

Here in Bristol I was as a child brought under the influence of the late Mary Carpenter and her saintly sister, Anna Thomas, whose work with others in the anti-slavery movement was an inspiration which has followed me to this hour.

I fear that our present-day Unitarian lacks the robustness of those of the time I refer to, otherwise how can we account for the apathy shown by so many professing our liberal faith?

Some years ago I attended a large and influential meeting on the Zanzibar slavery question, presided over by J. Storrs Fry, who was supported by leading ministers and laymen of all denominations, when I was surprised to find myself the only Unitarian in the room.

It is useless for a paper any more than an individual to try and please all parties, for the contempt of all right-thinking men and women awaits such a course. After all, it is rather slow to only read the echo of your own thoughts.

It is refreshing to find a man like Mr. Tarrant, in these days of compromise and traitorous silence, as well as yourself, standing shoulder to shoulder with that true apostle of righteousness, the Bishop of Hereford. W. Channing Watkins.

72, Alma-road, Bristol, April 4, 1904.

Sir,—I am unable to understand your correspondent, Mr. H. J. Bakewell, writing of a "disastrous disposition to trespass on political ground," unless he is labouring under the delusion only too common that politics are necessarily "party" politics. A disposition to discuss politics on party grounds could, of course, never be anything else but "disastrous."

I should like to ask Mr. Bakewell where such questions as the introduction of Chinese labour into South Africa ought to be discussed if not at a religious meeting. Would he have us divorce our religion from our politics? Such a disposition might truly be termed "disastrous." Unless our religion and our politics are inseparably bound up the less we have to say on either subject the better.

I for one rejoice at the action of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in this matter, and also strongly approve the attitude The Inquirer invariably takes on all questions touching national righteousness. Percival M. Lee.

Torquay, April 4.

"SOCIAL ECONOMICS."

Sir,—I am afraid I must have expressed myself rather unfortunately in my comments on Mrs. Bosanquet's admirable articles that have been appearing under the general title of "Social Economics." I certainly did, if I conveyed the impression that I intended to slight or disparage this lady's work. I believe and recognised the importance of the subject, and said that Mrs. Bosanquet wrote wisely and well. My protest, of course, was merely against the heading, which, to tell you the truth, I thought was probably the handiwork of the Editor. It may be, too, that I wrote under the influence of some little disappointment. I know Congregational churches in the North of England where they have been forming adult Sunday-school classes for the careful and systematic study of the social problem, and when I saw one of these articles I pricked up attention, thinking that perhaps some Unitarian churches might be contemplating something of the kind, and that this was the beginning. I found, however, that, as I said, they were purely charitable studies, and I was disappointed, not in the articles, which were excellent, but in the subject of them.

Mrs. Bosanquet tells us that political economy is the housekeeping of the State, and that social economy is the housekeeping of Society, of which work in the parish is a very important part. It must very much depend, I think, upon what you mean by housekeeping. Political economy is generally understood to be the science of the production and distribution of wealth in relation to the different countries of the world. Social economy is the same thing within our own borders. It is a science dealing only with great views, and knows nothing of charity or parishes. No doubt missions and charities may have their effect on production and distribution, just as human digestive organs may have. The better my digestive powers, the better I can work, the more wealth I can produce and the more there is for distribution. Yet I think, if I were to send you a short treatise on the digestive process, and the best means of promoting its efficiency, and were to head it "Social Economics," you would think it hardly appropriate.

Mrs. Bosanquet says that I am one of the people who would gladly see society reformed and evils abolished, if it could be done at no cost to themselves. That is a little severe, and, if I may say so, not quite true. While I heartily appreciate the kind of work in which Mrs. Bosanquet is so earnestly engaged, and to which she brings so rare an intelligence, I am anxious to see the Christian churches devoting attention also to the false principles and pernicious practices in our commercial and industrial system, out of which arises the necessity for so much of this charitable effort. During the greater part of my life I have devoted a great amount of time to the investigation of the life conditions of the poorer classes of London, and I think there are probably few men who have written more newspaper columns on the subject than I have done, and I am aweary of it, I am aweary of it—all this outpouring of charity, all this time and thought and effort and money squandered in remedying evils, and so little serious concern about the true principles of healthy "social housekeeping." I heartily wish God-speed to all the charities of the churches, but I want to see them also trying to bring their principles to bear upon the causes which render so much of this philanthropy necessary, instead of leaving that application to people outside the churches, and many of them hostile to the churches.

I should like to say a little on Dr. Warschauer's last letter, but I am very much occupied just now, and, if I were not, I could hardly ask you to allow me to trespass further on your space at present; but, if you will permit me to do so, I will endeavour to say a little in reply to Dr. Warschauer's letter next week. G. F. Millin.

Brixton, March 25.

EVIL VERSUS DIVINE GOODNESS.

Sir,—My gratitude to Mr. Millin for his valuable work on behalf of Socialism makes me wish to have him on my side in theology. And, as each one of us must "have his say, his scheme of the weal and woe," I want to put before him the ideas which seem to me satisfactory on the question—so critical for Unitarians—which he has raised.

Dr. Warschauer seems to me to have quite cleared up the question of a personal or spiritual principle of evil, or a multiplicity of such principles, and, if even the hypothesis were not vulnerable at the points indicated by Dr. Warschauer, it is difficult to see how it would help us. It only drives the problem one stage further back. I know that the problem is thought by some (e.g., by Martineau) to be lightened, if certain evils can be shown to have arisen through the agency of human wills, "planted out" and made answerable for their own actions, which are independent of the Divine will, and if this argument is held to be good then it will apply also to other than human wills. But all such devices seem to me, and, I think, to an increasing number of men, rather ingenious than profound, for the original question, "Why was the scheme of things so arranged?" still remains.

But why has such a question arisen? It has arisen from our preoccupation with a ready-made, pseudo-scientific formula for God. It has arisen from our forsaking the devout agnosticism of the religious heart in all ages. There is no God such as that which gives rise to the awkward alternative—either not All-Good or not Omnipotent. We have to bring two charges against any such conception: (1) It is not the pure product of the religious consciousness, but of an awakened theoretical impulse, the impulse to philosophise in its infancy. Of course, it is true that the religious consciousness always must have some kind of formula; but the religious consciousness as such is easily put off with the feeblest explanations on the intellectual side (that God is conditioned by the nature of primordial matter, &c.). (2) Such a conception, while not purely religious, is very imperfect philosophy. The "attributes" of theological text-books are akin to very early attempts at cosmology. If people will not be satisfied with religion (which is a universal and simple matter), but insist on having philosophy (which is a matter for specialised intellectual endeavour), they should be in earnest about it. Now, a great deal of work has been done in philosophy towards dissolving away those antinomies, half-views, blind alleys, into which the intellect is ever running. And I maintain that as soon as a man is dissatisfied with the picture-thinking of ordinary theodicy he is prepared to begin philosophy—he should be turned on to Illingworth's Bampton Lectures (now price 6d.) or the last section of Pfleiderer's "History of the Philosophy of Religion," or Lotze's Lectures, for a start.

Then, when our reading has enabled us to get rid of our futile and otiose notions of omnipotence and omniscience (see the last part of that very live book, "Anticipations," by H. G. Wells), we shall be prepared to understand that the best way with all these ultimate problems is to begin with human experience, with the "small end of great subjects." Now, I believe that the religious consciousness (unlike philosophy) never tries to answer the question "Why does evil exist?" because it never asks it. With regard to all the terrible facts of irremediable pain, the religious heart simply seeks to transmute them into an offering of love. The "mystery of the Cross" has effected that much for the consciousness of modern men. This is a fact verified in a thousand thousand lives. And it does seem to us, when we have this experience, as "Eleanor" found at the end of Mrs. Ward's book, that the meaning of the world is delivered up to us. And, as Mr. F. H. Bradley has told us in a well-known pointed sentence, this is enough until we begin to try to prove it, then it seems less than enough. But what "proving" (i.e., philosophy) can do, is to clear away the obstacles placed in the way of this assurance by the figments and after-thoughts of a half-philosophy. The truth that is contained in James Hinton's theories about "The Mystery of Pain" is, surely, that pain, accepted and passed through the fire of a consecrating love, no longer seems an obstacle to faith. We cannot be blind to this deliverance of our most refined sense, which at once shows us that pain is in some way part of the very being and purpose of God, and also that our spirits have power to transmute this fact into a God-revealing experience. Possibly Hinton over-estimates the power of the human will to efface the sense of suffering, but the value of this first-hand unsophisticated experience of the religious mind can scarcely be exaggerated as an index to the meaning of our life. Now, God is a fact that corresponds to this experience, and as such He is Our Father, whatever else He may be. The trouble, therefore, arises from trying to make the facts of the world fit a ready-made formula of God, instead of fitting the formula to the facts. For this reason I hail the (in the best sense) amateur theologising of Mr. Wells, although I think he does not give full weight to all the facts. His notion of God fits more or less the consciousness of the modern man of science, but not that of the religious mind in all ages.

THE LATE REV. JOSEPH FREESTON.

Sir,—The admirable sketch of the career of the late Mr. Freeston, which appeared in your last issue, must have revivified in many minds, as it did in mine, the memory of years of precious intercourse with that singularly noble personality and generous heart. So winsome was his nature that none could be in his presence, even for a few minutes, without being attracted by his frankness and overflowing tenderness. I have known several instances where this fact has been experienced. But to those who were privileged, as I was, to come into closer relationship with him, the first impressions of admiration soon grew into deeper feelings of love and reverence. I first knew him during eight of the "most strenuous years of his life," at Stalybridge. His life during those eight years will ever be to me the ideal of what a Christian minister should be. He was unceasing in all good works. The tale of those years will never be told, but hundreds, I know, will bless God that they were brought under his influence at a time when he was in the zenith of his power, and when the thought of God seemed to possess him and use him as its instrument for good. I, at any rate, can trace my spiritual re-birth to his ministry, Never shall I forget the hours he spared me out of a life all too strenuous; how he guided my reading and shaped my thought, criticised my faults, and bore with my foolish fancies and my doubts, and continued his paternal interest in me until the end. The inner experiences of the spirit cannot be laid bare in cold print; they are not for the common gaze; but this I will say, that after knowing him I can understand how Crossman, the dying gasfitter, could say of Robert Elsmere: "You've been God to me. I've seen Him in you." Perhaps this all too meagre tribute may encourage other ministers to cast their bread freely upon the waters, and to be tenderly tactful, as he ever was, in nurturing the young lives which come under their spiritual oversight. Albert Thornhill,

Oxford, March 28, 1904.

OBITUARY.

WILLIAM THORNELY.

A long and honourable life came to an end on March 28, when Mr. William Thornely breathed his last at Hampstead, at the great age of eighty-five.

Mr. Thornely was born in Liverpool in 1819, the eldest son of a large family. A younger brother, the late James Thornely, died in December, 1898. Their father, John Daniel Thornely, was a well-known merchant in Liverpool. Their uncle, Thomas Thornely, M.P. for Wolverhampton, was one of those who voted for the Dissenters' Chapels Bill in 1844, and in many other ways served the cause of civil and religious liberty. As in the case of many Nonconformist families in those days, William Thornely's education took place at home and at a day-school. Brought up under the ministry of the Rev. John Hamilton Thom at Renshaw-street Chapel, as a young man he came also under the influence of Dr. Martineau, and was not only among his earliest, but also one of his most attached pupils. As a youth of seventeen, Mr. Thornely was studying the philosophy of mind with Dr. Martineau at Mount-street, and in 1845 he still attended a similar class which then met at seven in the morning, at Park Nook, the house to which Mr. Martineau had just moved, in Princes Park.

More than thirty years later, while Dr. Martineau was still lecturing on the "Grounds and Truths of Religion," in Manchester New College, London, Mr. Thornely again took his place among the students, to listen once more to the familiar voice of his early teacher, for whom he always entertained the utmost affection and veneration. Of Manchester College he had been a Trustee since 1848.

Mr. Thornely's business career began in his father's office in Liverpool, where he was trained as a merchant. During this period he paid two visits to the United States—the first in 1842. Subsequently he was appointed to the responsible post of Stamp Distributor at Liverpool, which he held for ten years. In 1866 he went to reside at Windermere, and later came to Hampstead, where, in 1886, he built the beautiful house in which he has since lived with his sister, Miss Isabella Thornely.

Mr. Thornely was a man of wide interests and sympathies, ranging over, though not restricted to, the affairs of the several branches of his own family. His mind was ever ready to welcome new light on great subjects, and with a literary bent he possessed a keen appreciation of classical music, besides retaining a lively interest in current affairs. Upright and scrupulous in his conduct, generous in response to any worthy appeal, but avoiding ostentation in his benefactions, his loss will be regretted by all who knew him and mourned by many old and dear friends, including several among the Rosslyn Hill congregation, of which he was a faithful member for twenty-five years.

The end came at his home in Hampstead, but so peacefully as more to resemble sleep than death, while his mind remained clear to the last.

Preaching in Rosslyn Hill Chapel on Sunday morning, the Rev. Henry Gow referred to Mr. Thornely's long connection with that chapel, his association with Dr. Martineau, his simplicity and old-world courtesy, his open-mindedness, and the respect entertained for him by all who knew him.

FLORIAN:
AN EASTER CHILD.

BESIDE our nursling's snowy bed
Our Easter flower beside,
"Thou miracle of Love!" we said,
"Thank God for Life!" we cried.

Upon his weary, pain-tossed bed,
'Neath wintry moaning skies,
Worn and forlorn, with drooping head,
Our tender flow'ret lies.

In Mother Earth's soft snow-spread bed
Our darling's form doth lie:
"Dear little shrunken seed—not dead!"
"Thank God for life!" we cry.

Boston, Mass. W. H. W.

Now, when the sword has pierced your soul, you say: "I will go away; I cannot bear my sorrow." And you think nothing of the sorrow and the wrong that are within the walls of the city where you dwell; you would leave your place empty when it ought to be filled with your pity and your labour. If there is wickedness in the streets, your steps should shine with the light of purity; if there is a cry of anguish, you, because you know the meaning of the cry, should be there to still it. George Eliot.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE SMILE.

I AM writing to you from a little Italian town on the Riviera. I am sitting by the shores of the Mediterranean Sea, watching the constant changes of its wonderfully varied colours—all shades, from the deepest purple and brilliant blue, to the palest transparent green and snowy white foam. Behind me in the far distance are the white peaks of the snow-capped Apennines, whilst near the shore are the olive-crowned hills. The little town nestles among the lower slopes, and is half hidden by groves of orange and lemon trees, and still more by the abundant and beautiful palms. All this is crowned with a cloudless blue sky, and bathed in brilliant sunlight. What a beautiful gift from God, and how grateful must all feel who have the privilege of enjoying it!

When you are enjoying something very much—a holiday in the country, for instance, or a long-looked-forward-to treat—does it ever make you think of the thousands and thousands of people who never have these pleasures?—people whose lives seem so full of toil and sadness, and so empty of many of the blessings and joys which are ours?

At the English church here a few Sundays ago, a clergyman, who works and lives among some of the very poor in London, was telling us something about the work that he and his helpers are trying to do. He also asked us to help, and suggested many ways in which we might help, not only the poor among whom he was working, but indeed any in our own villages or cities. There were some children in the congregation, and I wondered at the time whether they were thinking of any ways in which they could help. I felt that the clergyman's suggestions were too difficult for some of us to carry out, when, all at once, I called to mind a children's sermon that I had listened to when I was about twelve years old. I will try to tell it to you, because I think it shows that even the youngest among us can do something to help.

"Good-bye, mother," said a little girl of about nine years old, as she ran down the garden path waving her hand and laughing gaily. She felt particularly happy that morning; she did not know why, but she was so; and as she ran along the lane towards her school her little face was quite beaming with smiles. Presently she met a poor man sitting by the roadside, looking very miserable. On she tripped gaily, and with a merry "Good morning" and a bright smile on her face, she passed him. The poor man had noticed her, and now he was craning his neck to get a last peep of her before she turned the corner.

What was it that had fascinated him? He picked up his bundle of sticks that he had been gathering from the neighbouring wood and began to trudge homewards. But he no longer looked miserable. There gradually came a thoughtful look on his face and a new light in his eyes, as he remembered the rosy cheeks and beaming smile of the little girl. With this picture in his mind he reached his home, one of the barest and most neglected-looking cottages in the village. His daughter, so tired and sad-looking, was busy in the little back room.

The man entered and began to speak, but at the sound of his voice his daughter started, and looked at him in surprise. Why were his words so cheerful, his manners so kind, she wondered. She bent over her work again, but as she listened to her father her face gradually lost its sad look, and her heart felt lighter than for many a day. Presently she heard someone calling her from upstairs, so she went up the dark, narrow staircase and opened the door of her mother's room. She was a cripple, and unable to leave her bed. Long years of suffering had made her impatient and sometimes very difficult to please. At the sound of her daughter's step she turned towards the door, and uttered a few angry words to scold the girl for not having brought something she had asked for. She did not get the usual sharp or sulky answer in return, but instead a gentle "I am very sorry, mother," and at the same time she felt her pillows being smoothed and arranged more comfortably for her. That afternoon, when some neighbours came in, they were surprised to be greeted by sounds of happy talking and laughing up in the sick chamber. What a change they found in that home! and how had that change come about?

The innocent, happy smile of the little girl was the beginning of it. I wonder how many people caught the infection of that smile! We have seen its results in one home, but who knows where its influence ended? And the owner of this smile was, like Pippa, in one of Robert Browning's poems, quite unconscious of the good she was doing. But I think she must have been a happy child by nature. Let us try to cultivate the habit of being cheerful and bright, even when it feels very difficult to be so, else we shall not be ready, when the opportunity comes, to help, either consciously or unconsciously, with a cheery word or a bright smile.

A LITTLE CHILD.

O little child, whence came those lovely eyes?
I think God plucked two stars, and gave them thee,
That, through the mists that dim these earthly ways,
His holy light unclouded thou might'st see.

O little child, whence came those baby hands?
I think it was God's love that made them fair,
That they might learn one day to work His will,
And folded be each night in silent prayer.

O little child, whence came that pure white soul?
I think God gave it thee long, long ago,
That thou might'st keep it shining in the world,
Then take it back to Him still white as snow.

FRANCES POWER COBBE.

Less than two years ago it was our happiness to offer in these columns a birthday greeting to Miss Frances Power Cobbe, on the summit of her eighty years, and to print the address presented to her on that birthday, Dec. 4, 1902, which bore the signatures of Florence Nightingale, Josephine Butler, George Frederick Watts, the Bishop of Hereford, the Master of Balliol, and many other distinguished men and women. Only a fortnight ago we published a letter which we had received from Miss Cobbe, and which proves now to have been her last appeal in the cause to which for forty years her life was so earnestly devoted, an appeal to the Protestant Churches of this country to take up the systematic teaching of the duty of kindness to dumb creatures, "to tell all their members that to deal cruelly with their humbler fellow-creatures is not only an 'offence' against the law of England, but a sin against the law of God."

We knew her indomitable spirit and the tireless faithfulness of her generous heart. It was pleasant to think of the evening of her busy and strenuous life spent in that beautiful home amid the hills of Wales, which she had so long shared with her closest friend, and from which she also is now bidden to depart. For the ultimate message of peace has come for her, suddenly, as she wished it might; and while on Monday she drove out as usual, and in the evening talked long with a friendly visitor, in the quiet of the night that other silent Friend of whom she had no fear touched her, and in the morning she was gone.

As we write these words we seem to see Hengwrt, the beautiful old house, and the quiet train which passes across the valley to the burial-ground of the little country church, and to hear the words of faith spoken there by the graveside by her friend the Rev. Estlin Carpenter. There is much which might now be said at the close of her beneficent and honourable life, but at the moment we will simply repeat here what we wrote in that birthday greeting, with the pleasant remembrance that she herself found pleasure in the words :—

"We owe much to Miss Cobbe. She has told the story of her lonely struggles in early life, what it cost her to break away, in solitary fidelity to truth, from the evangelical faith in which she had been reared, and to which she was bound by every affection and association of her life. She proved, as Robertson of Brighton afterwards proved in his hour of utter loneliness, that in righteousness there is the sure foundation, and so the soul may be brought back to faith in the living God. Miss Cobbe found her own way back into the sunlight of the Eternal Goodness, and in time also to a new and deeper faith in the immortal life. In this she was strengthened by the word of Theodore Parker, and after his death, we owe to her the standard English edition of his works. Through her own writings she became a helper of many to a new and happier faith in God, and an earnest devotion of life to the service of righteousness.

"More than forty years ago Miss Cobbe became the companion of Mary Carpenter at Bristol, in her work among the neglected poor. For nearly five years, until crippled by an accident, in school, in workhouse, and the city slums, she gained experience of the darker and more pathetic side of the people's life, which has been put to noble use in her eloquent and earnest advocacy of social and moral reform. An early champion of women's rights and women's duties, she took her full share in securing that great moral advance which has come with the enlarged opportunities of women, both in education and in many forms of public service.

"Of her work as an opponent of Vivisection, which has brought to her the heaviest and most painful burden of her life, we must not speak further here than to say that we honour its devotion and look upon it with profound sympathy. It is based on deep moral conviction of what is demanded by the highest interest of our own manhood no less than by the claims of humanity towards helpless and dependent animals. Into the heat of the controversy we do not enter. We offer our earnest tribute to a veteran, in whose labours we recognise a noble courage and self-sacrifice, for whom, even amid the pain of conflict, there must surely be the quiet confidence and happiness of work well done."

From the address presented to Miss Cobbe on her eightieth birthday we will also recall these passages :—

You were among the first publicly to urge the right of women to University degrees, and your powerful pen has done much to advance that movement towards equality of treatment for them, in educational and other matters, which is one of the distinguishing marks of our time.

In social amelioration, such as ragged schools and workhouse reform, you did the work of a pioneer. By your lucid and thoughtful works on religion and ethics you have contributed in no small degree to that broader and more humane view which has so greatly influenced modern theology in all creeds and all schools of thought.

But it is your chief distinction that you were practically the first to explore the dark continent of our relations to our dumb fellow-creatures, to let in light on their wrongs, and to base on the firm foundation of the moral law their rights and our duty towards them. They cannot thank you, but we can.

The story of her life Miss Cobbe has told us in a delightful autobiography, a record full of sunlight and cheerful courage, manifold in its interests, admitting us to the secrets of her early struggles and the victory of her faith. She spoke many helpful words, and bore a brave witness. Two years ago she re-issued her first and chief work on "Intuitive Morals," with a new preface and appendix, from which we may now listen to her final testimony to the ultimate realities of faith. "I have known," she then wrote, "great and long happiness; and also great sorrow. And now, on the verge of the final experience of mortality, I can humbly testify that my early faith in God's absolute goodness and in a blessed life hereafter has not failed me or broken down."

And at the end of the book she adds: "With all humility I can but give the reader, as the results of the thoughts of a lifetime, this conclusion: I believe that 'God is with mortals by conscience'; that conscience is truly the meeting-ground of the Divine Spirit with the finite spirits of which He is the Father: and I believe God to be absolutely just, absolutely good, whatsoever hindrances to that perfect faith this world of sin and sorrows may present. I do so for this reason above all others: that His voice in our consciences lays upon us the law of justice and of goodness."

One other exhortation of hers let us recall from the conclusion of her lectures on the "Duties of Women":—

"We are many of us, in these days, wandering far and wide in despairing search for some bread of life whereby we may sustain our souls, some Holy Grail wherein we may drink salvation from doubt and sin. It may be a long, long quest ere we find it; but one thing is ready to our hands. It is Duty. Let us turn to that in simple fidelity, and labour to act up to our own highest ideal, to be the very best and purest and truest we know how, and to do around us every work of love which our hands and hearts may reach. When we have lived and laboured like this, then I believe that the light will come to us as to many another doubting soul; and it will prove true once more that 'they who do God's will shall know of His doctrine,' and they who strive to advance His Kingdom here will gain faith in another divine realm beyond the dark river, where Virtue shall ascend into Holiness, and Duty be transfigured into Joy."

RELIGION IN POLITICS.

Once more we are called upon to face this perennial question, whether our religion is rightly concerned with questions of politics or not, and whether The Inquirer as a Journal "of Liberal Religious Thought and Life" ought to touch upon such questions. We published last week, without comment, a letter from Mr. Benjamin Dowson, of Nottingham, complaining of the polemical attitude taken up by The Inquirer with regard to questions of the day, and a further protest from Mr. H. J. Bakewell against the passing of a resolution at the Council Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on the question of Chinese Labour for the Transvaal. With the position taken up by Mr. Bakewell and others, Mr. Tarrant deals fully in a letter this week, for which we are greatly indebted to him, and with which we desire unreservedly to associate ourselves. As to Mr. Dowson's letter, we must refer in passing to its middle paragraph. Complaining of the tone adopted by The Inquirer, he says: "We are not all advanced Radicals. . . . We even believe that Mr. Chamberlain is an honest man, and not a charlatan." We are not aware that a single word has appeared in the editorial columns of The Inquirer since the beginning of the South African War to justify the insinuation of that sentence. It only shows how difficult it is even for our critic to write with fairness on this subject.

A further instalment of letters—only a selection of those received, on both sides of the controversy—is published this week, and we might perhaps be satisfied to leave them to answer one another; but on the main issue there must not be any mistake as to our position.

Since the beginning of the present year we have dealt, in notes or leading articles, with such subjects as the war between Russia and Japan, the Turkish oppression of Macedonia, the British Mission to Thibet, Chinese Labour for the Transvaal, Arbitration and the Reduction of Armaments, National Education, the religious difficulty and Passive Resistance, Licensing Reform or Retrogression, the Issues of the County Council Election for London, the Free Trade and Tariff Controversy, the question of the Unemployed and the Cotton Crisis. Such questions are, no doubt, "political" in varying degree, and do not all equally involve the danger of party animosity. But they are all, we maintain, questions with which citizens of this country must be concerned, and on which they must seek to the best of their ability to form a just judgment. It is perfectly true that on many such questions opinions are divided, and members of the same church conscientiously take different sides; but that is no reason for refusing to take counsel together, in the light of religious faith and the highest moral ideals, on subjects which, after all, belong to the true ordering of the Kingdom of God on earth. What we desire chiefly to protest against is the degradation of politics implied in the suggestion that when we touch upon such public questions, vitally affecting national honour and welfare, it must be as partisans misled by unworthy motives, judging, not simply as justice and honour demand, but in the selfish interest of some party.

For our own part we cannot recognise any line of separation between religion and politics, but would rather plead for a yet broader conception of religion and a loftier view of politics. Questions of national and social well-being must be dealt with in the light of our faith in the Eternal Righteousness and Love, on principles of Christian brotherhood; and, if our religion is to maintain its vitality and rise to greater effectiveness, we are convinced that it must be more and more through the exercise of a practical helpfulness in the affairs of the world. It is too much the reproach of the churches that they care for none of these things, and that denominational interests are set above public duty and the welfare of the people.

The churches must nurture faithful citizens, and surely a religious newspaper must not shut out from its interests the great questions of social and national life which occupy the minds of all earnest men, and demand to be dealt with on the highest principles. It is inevitable, in judging of such matters, that differences, often very vehement differences, should arise; and, unfortunately, in political, no less than in theological controversy, personal antagonisms and personal loyalties, and other less worthy interests and tempers, are only too apt to interfere with a single-minded pursuit of truth and justice. What we have constantly to endeavour—and this we say, not only for ourselves, but for our critics also—is to maintain the level of our judgment, and the tone of our comments on the highest plane, above the reach, on either side, of the imputation of unworthy motive, simply devoted to the interests of justice and humanity, in Christian brotherhood, as citizens pledged to seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness.

That we have never fallen short of that ideal we are very far from claiming, but we refuse of our own will to cease from the endeavour. So far as the present Editor is concerned, he may be ill-equipped, and unworthy of the trust placed in his hands, and for many reasons he would be glad enough to be relieved of what is often a very thankless task. But The Inquirer, throughout the course of its more than sixty years, has never consented to be silenced on questions of public interest, and we hold that to adopt such a course would be an abandonment of the best traditions of our churches, and of the true ideal of religious life.

TO CHARLES BARNES UPTON,
Emeritus Professor of Philosophy.

If Philosophy, Upton, hath her saints,
And that High Wisdom loves, which is, said one,
"A loving spirit," then thee, not alone
As thinker of her Word—with wise restraints,
And golden mean, whose lack else sorely taints
Her Sacred Aim—she honours as her own,
But canonizes for sweet deeds, all sown
In that High Wisdom's love, that never faints.
Wayside and rock and thorn-patch took thine eye!
And though the birds and sun and brambles shirk
No whit their harvest, there thou too didst spy
Some silverweed or golden stonecrop lurk,
In the mere dust, the scorner passes by,
And on the thorn, God's starlike handiwork.

E. L. H. Thomas.

April, 1904.

A writer in the Christian World, in the course of an article on the efficiency of theological colleges, finds abundant material for criticism of these institutions. The complaint is that the colleges do little to fit men to be either preachers or pastors, and that the culture of the spiritual life is generally neglected. It is further pointed out that almost nothing is done to confirm the students in the principles of Congregationalism, and in this connection an interesting statement is made:—

> During the last ten years sixty-five men have left the Congregational ministry for other denominations, and of these twenty-three abjured Dissent. It is not too much to say that, including our losses, not only to the Church of England but to other sects, we lose every ten years the equivalent of one year's ministerial output of our combined colleges.
> A loss of 10 per cent. is certainly considerable, but we are not sure that this interchange is a bad thing. All denominations are pleased to receive a convert as a testimony to their own outstanding worth, even if they do commonly think rather harshly of the pervert from their ranks. These words convert and pervert, by the way, have become about equivalent to immigrant and emigrant, and as immigrants are good for nations so probably converts are good for churches. Our opinion may possibly be a partial one, since our own ministry is more largely recruited by those who come from, than depleted by those who go to other denominations.

The purest thought is possible only to the purest mind. Every trace of selfishness hides the divine generosity. The falsities which darken the mind, the passions which becloud reason, the coarse and low or frivolous interests which occupy our attention, the selfishness which cuts off or interrupts our human connection with God and man,—these are the shadows that eclipse the divine light within us, and leave us wandering in darkness, as if there were no God.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

The annual meetings were held at Liverpool on Good Friday. In the morning a very large congregation assembled in the Ullet-road Church, Sefton Park, where a sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., of Moss Side, from the text, Proverbs i. 7: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge; but the foolish despise wisdom and instruction."

In the course of his sermon the preacher said that as teachers and parents they were convinced that God desired, and the welfare of humanity needed, the training of the young to be conducted in all its branches in a truly religious spirit. He excluded from his view all arbitrary division between secular and sacred in connection with the education of children. True religion was true life. The man who claimed to be religious must show himself to be a good man, and a man whose intellectual powers were developed proportionately to his opportunities. Whenever the type of the perfect man prevailed on earth he would be as wise as he was good, and as good as he was wise. The Sunday-school teacher rightly associated his special responsibility pre-eminently with the first clause of the text: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge." Not fear of Him as an avenging deity, as a cruel and wrathful taskmaster; but fear of causing Him pain, fear of falling short of what He expected of them, fear of proving ungrateful of His fatherly love and care, fear of not fully appreciating the life He had bestowed upon them, and of not fully living it in accordance with His laws. The fear that was meant was synonymous with highest love. The one they truly loved they feared to disobey, or provoke, or disappoint.

They knew from experience how much more profitable their efforts in moral and religious instruction were when the intellectual life of the child had been awakened; when they could guide its thought from the manifestation of God in His works and in history to His characteristics as the loving, interested Father of all men. Hence theirs was no narrow outlook; to them the Sunday-school was only one small department in the great university of human education, though the most important next to the home; consequently they, Unitarians, who held rational views of religion, knew well enough that it was education which resulted in higher and more ennobling conceptions of God and human duty. Religion was largely a matter of intellectual development, though not altogether. They could trace the various stages through which it had passed from the gross superstitions of the savage to the refined theism of a Martineau: and there was no fact clearer than that its evolution had been proportionate to the increase of human knowledge. It is surely a historic fact that man's view of life is determined, practically speaking, by his education; but they at any rate would recognise that the education referred to involved the training of body, mind and heart. Where that fact was lost sight of the education question was seriously misunderstood. People who were anxious for the right understanding and full appreciation of religion should be most desirous of promoting the spread of knowledge and of securing a general cultivation of intellect. Life was more worth living, and therefore more truly religious, when there was a strong intellectual as well as moral interest running through it. There were many youths who could only be stirred to seek a self-improvement by being shown how a knowledge of languages or science might increase their earning powers. Yet they would only half succeed in truly educating their children if they led them to suppose that the only aim of a trained intellect and a stored mind was to earn more money, and to get their rival's neck under their foot in business competition and in diplomacy. First and foremost let it be fully realised that education is desirable for its own sake; because it makes a better, a more real, man or woman of them; more like what God intended them to be; more godlike!

Not long ago the Prime Minister declared that the boys of seventeen and eighteen, who have to be educated in our public and secondary schools "do not care a farthing about the world they live in except in so far as it concerns the cricket field, or the football field, or the river." The truth of this was one of the greatest possible discouragements a man has to face who really desires to help his fellow men to higher and truer life. There were a few young men who were eager to avail themselves of any opportunity for self improvement; but the vast majority of them would just turn up their noses when invited to a feast whose merit was that it was intellectual. Another critic said "So many young men are careless, thoughtless, weak, with no ambition or grit. If they make enough money to pay for their lodgings, clothes, tobacco, and amusements, they are content, and have no desire to win any of the prizes which involve struggle and stress and sacrifice." Then when they reached full manhood they formed the large army of pessimists and grumblers who wanted to share the possessions of others who had been moved by higher ambitions and had succeeded; they stood in the way of good progress; they took no enlightened interest in politics; they were advocates of a false economy in the advancement of the community's truest interests; and they allied themselves on the side of anarchy and distrust. There was no worse enemy to human well-being in the world than the man who had neglected his opportunities as a youth, preferred ease and pleasure to a plodding, persistent self-improvement, and who as a result had become cynical, suspicious, and discontented. Religion was affected in this way:—Such men did not blame themselves as they should, but they denied that there was a good God ruling throughout the universe, because He had not strewn their path with roses, had not in their individual cases suspended that supreme and wise law that "whatsoever a man sows that also shall he reap." And those men tried to convince others that their jaundiced view of things on earth and in heaven was correct.

From the religious Sunday-school teacher's point of view there was nothing more disastrous than to allow to grow the conception that education was simply technical equipment, "whereby a man may serve himself at the expense of his neighbour, and mount by means of the ladder of knowledge, as it is called, to greater heights of fortune and of power"; to allow young men to imagine that their sphere of action and influence could be limited by their private concerns, morally; that with personal advancement or the attainment of wealth their mission as sons of God was fulfilled, and that it was not the business of society to consider how they might be fitted to take part in its larger life. As teachers and parents they must impress their children with a love of education for its own sake, and for its religious significance.

In conclusion, the preacher said:—

"Friends and comrades in Sunday-school work, these being our ideals, we must not relax our efforts, but continue to struggle with our tasks undauntedly. We who do appreciate the real value of education must not tire in our endeavour to promote it. Its cost, however great, must be regarded as nothing compared with the blessings accruing from it. It is not for us to be content with things as they are, but to constantly make our educational machinery more and more perfect; to cultivate within our fellows a growing appreciation of wisdom and knowledge, and in every possible way strengthen the foundations and purify the sources of our national life. Think of the child who is brought up in the knowledge and love of God, of nature, and of man! His mind stored with the wonders revealed by science—the great things of stellar space, and the small things in a drop of water; the making of planets and suns and the growth of a leaf; the building up of his own body cell by cell, and the unfolding and enriching of his mind with all its mysterious wealth of affection and memory and insight; his recognition of the stupendous fact that all the threads of life and being run to one centre, infinite in its power and intelligence, and which for want of a better name we call God! Then, at the same time, encourage him to read the best books that men have written on history and biography and poetry, and what we call the humanities, so that all along as his mind becomes enriched, so also will his heart, to the end that you will have a perfectly balanced man, conscious that he stands in the presence of a greater Power than his own, that all men are his brethren, and that within the conception that all life is one, there is involved the necessity that in our social life there should be a true community of interests, and that nothing selfish is pardonable in a world whose blessings are intended equally for all. This is a glorious ideal, which beckons us teachers on to renewed and consecrated devotion to our work. Let us not grow weary or faint-hearted, but press on nobly and cheerfully, with the full assurance that if by our influence and example we make our children more ambitious to become perfect men and women, we also bring them nearer to the mind of Christ, of whose loving service we are reminded this day, and thus more and more into harmony with the will and law of God our heavenly Father."

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

The business meeting was held in the afternoon in the chapel of the Domestic Mission, Mill-street. Mr. J. Wigley (Manchester), the president of the Association, was in the chair.

The PRESIDENT, before beginning the business, made reference to the loss sustained by the Association, and by many of their number personally, in the death of the Rev. Joseph Freeston, and a resolution moved by the Rev. W. HARRISON, seconded by the Rev. J. C. HIRST and supported by the Mr. J. CHADWICK and the Rev. J. RUDDLE, was adopted, which placed on record their deep sense of the value of the services rendered by Mr. Freeston to the Association, and its appreciation of the aid he gave effectively to education in its various branches, and his zeal in the work of the Christian ministry. The resolution expressed the sympathy of the Association with his sons in the loss they had sustained.

THE REPORT.

The report for the year 1903-4 stated that the work of the Association had been carried on with vigour. The field of work continued to extend. It was manifest that the means whereby the Association might help the affiliated schools was far from being exhausted; the only limit was that imposed by the restricted staff of voluntary workers and the financial means of the Association. There was, perhaps, no more urgent need at the present time than that of a body of voluntary lecturers willing to visit the schools on Sundays and to give addresses on religious and moral subjects and on methods of teaching. The Holiday Home at Great Hucklow had been put upon a good business basis, and a scheme for the greater use of the Convalescent Home at Blackpool by girls up to twenty-one years of age was on temporary trial. The temperance section needed greater assistance to enable it to develop in the schools stronger and less intermittent work. The Association had affiliated itself with the Anti-Gambling Society, and efforts were to be made by means of this connection to aid the schools to resist the temptations to gambling among young people. Reference was made to the loss sustained by the Association in the deaths of Dr. Brooke Herford and Mr. Alderman Rawson. In the 26th annual examination of the scholars in prescribed subjects, 105 candidates took part. Eighty-four passed the examination—25 in the honours division, 32 in the first class, and 27 in the second class. Twenty-one failed. An appeal was made for increased support for the Association's Convalescent Home at Blackpool. During the year, the Great Hucklow home was used by 1,061 persons, of whom 400 were adults. The accounts showed a balance on the year's working of £48. On the seaside home there was an adverse balance of £24. The number of schools on the roll for the year ended December 31 was 81, the same as in the previous year. Teachers numbered 1,466, classes 877, scholars 15,274, and scholars above 16 years of age 4,998.

The PRESIDENT, in a review of the work of the year, said there was nothing in the report that disappointed him so much as the manner in which the list of schools entering for the examinations and the number of pupils who submitted themselves had been reduced from the highest point, which was between 600 and 700 in 1880, to the present number of 105. He was quite aware that it was not possible to submit all the work of the Sunday-school to the test of examination, but a great deal of good might be effected by presenting that work on the basis of preparation for examination.

The education question was by no means settled. They might not all be "passive resisters," in the sense of refusing to pay a portion of their rate, but every man and woman amongst them was a resister of the Act as it now stood upon the statute-book. It was intolerable that any sect, however powerful, should attempt to monopolise the educational machinery, and that it should have for its object—to say nothing of its chief object—the proselytising of the children. That they could not and would not bear. They felt that there was an increasing need for effort on the part of their churches on behalf of the distinctive and earnest religious education of the young, and surely the present was a time when all men and women in connection with their churches who had ability and leisure should come forward and help in this great work. He moved the adoption of the report.

The Rev. P. M. HIGGINSON seconded the motion, and in doing so he reviewed at length the history of the publication of "Hymns and Choral Songs," outlining what the committee had in their minds with regard to the future. The hymns have all been gathered into one book, and the tunes into another, for use in the Sunday-schools.

Mr. W. CANNING moved, and the Rev. J. E. STEAD seconded, the election of the Rev. T. P. Spedding, of Rochdale, as President of the Association for 1904-5.

The Rev. T. P. SPEDDING said his fear for the future of education in this country was that Nonconformists were going to be betrayed into a compromise. Standing as they did for a distinctly secular platform in the national day-schools, they realised more and more the danger that was before them when they saw that the day-schools were to be proselytised, and to be open to the introduction of sectarian dogma. It seemed to him that there was all the more reason for Unitarians to buckle on their armour in defence of their rights. He moved a vote of thanks to the Rev. C. Roper for his sermon in the morning.

Mr. T. F. ROBINSON seconded the motion, which was passed, and Mr. ROPER replied.

A welcome was given by the Association to representatives of kindred Associations. These included Miss Pritchard and Mr. Ion Pritchard (the Sunday School Association), the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A. (North Midland Sunday School Association), the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman (Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union), Mr. John Harrison (the London Sunday School Society), the Rev. F. Allen (South-Eastern Sunday School Union), and Mr. Dyson (Midland Sunday School Association). All these representatives replied to the resolution.

The Rev. J. RUDDLE moved, and Mr. ISAAC BARROW seconded, a vote of thanks to Mr. J. Wigley for his services as president for the past two years, which was passed.

THE EVENING MEETING.

Both luncheon and tea were served in the spacious buildings of the Domestic Mission, and in the evening a meeting was held in the Hope-street Church, Mr. Harold Coventry in the chair. There was again a very large attendance.

The CHAIRMAN, in his opening address, spoke as follows:—

Dr. John Watson, of Sefton Park Church, speaking some few weeks ago (March 8) to the National Free Church Council, deplored the fact of the "coarsening of the national imagination and the failure of national ideals." He instanced the recent sanctioning by Parliament of a measure for creating a body of serfs within the British Empire; the "moral scandal of the power of Parliament being used to hinder magistrates from removing the most deadly temptation which besets the life of our people"; the exaggerated love of sport and athletics, not for their own physical advantages, but in order to indulge the brute craving for excitement and partisanship; the modern inordinate love of luxury; and the carelessness of serious matters. All these were held up, and rightly, as evidences of a danger that lies about us, and we owe a debt of gratitude to those who would rouse us from our apathy or carelessness.

The press of a country is to a large extent an index of the people's moral standard. How many of our newspapers realise their responsibility in the matter? How many are conducted chiefly with an eye to the public good? Do editors and managers ask themselves, "How can we make our paper a power for right?" or is it, "How can we swell the dividends of our shareholders?"

I am afraid most of them would smile if it were suggested that the Sermon on the Mount had any practical relation to modern journalism—and, in fact, the very conjunction of the two sounds somewhat incongruous. We should be told that journalism on such lines would not pay, and that is quite sufficient, with the great majority, to settle the question, without even making the experiment.

I know that there are brilliant exceptions to this general rule—exceptions such as the Manchester Guardian and the London Daily News, and I devoutly wish that we in Liverpool had a paper that would give a clearer lead on great questions of public policy, without considering vested interests, and regardless of the opinions of any outsiders, even though they happen to be shareholders. A paper whose chief aim in its leading columns is not to offend subscribers of varying opinions does not stand any chance of becoming a really living power.

This want of a high moral standard, as it seems to me, among too great a section of the public press, is another illustration of the fact that the general moral or ethical atmosphere of our country is not as high as it ought to be, and shows us the direction which I think the teaching in our Sunday-schools, especially as regards our elder scholars, ought to take.

We want to turn out good and true citizens and real patriots, and we must make our teaching practical. Surely, no matter what political party we may belong to, we must all marvel at the ideas of right and justice which have received exemplification at the hands of the present Government. The glaring injustice of the Education Act (to mention only one or two instances) has been capped by the most uncalled-for and shameless surrender to the liquor trade by the nominal leader of the party. But the country has been roused, the recent party dividing lines are already to some extent obliterated, and many of us are looking forward to a change which will give us at no distant date a body of men at the head of affairs who will show that they are imbued with true Christianity rather than ecclesiasticism, and whose great aim will be the good of the people rather than to curry favour with a trade of notorious character at home, or an industry run to a large extent by grasping aliens abroad.

But in all this let us not, even if we are party men and women, look forward to a party advantage, so much as to the raising of the tone of public life. And this is just where we can bring influence to bear on our elder scholars.

We can rouse and quicken within them the sense that we are each one responsible to some extent for the government of our town and our country; that we cannot, if we would be true to our high principles, to Unitarianism as I understand it, take refuge in soul-destroying apathy; that it is our duty to contribute towards the solution of problems that are waiting to be solved.

We want to train the young people of our churches to grow up into useful men and women, citizens who will make their influence felt in civic life, who will be conspicuous for their genuine patriotism: not the patriotism that falls down blindly, and worships idols of brass and gold, whether made in Birmingham or elsewhere, that puts banking accounts before brotherly love, dividends before duty, but the patriotism that tries to think justly rather than imperially, and that insists on this great and fundamental fact—that there is not one law for individuals and another for nations, but the action of a people must be guided by appeal to moral principles and must be attuned to the highest moral standard. Nations are apt to forget that to appropriate a continent may be as indefensible morally as to pick a pocket. We want to bring about a higher and better atmosphere; our churches and Sunday-schools are doing much, and might do more, in this respect.
